DEDICATION OF THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION.

TO WARREN HASTINGS, ESQ.,

LATE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF BENGAL, ETC.

SIR,—AFTER the labour of several years, and if I might be allowed to express a hope I am at last enabled to present you with a translation of the HEDAYA. upon the subject, it is, that its future beneficial effects, in facilitating the administration of Justice throughout our Asiatic territories, and uniting us still more closely with our Mussulman subjects, may reflect some additional lustre on your Administration.—

To you, SIR, I feel it incumbent on me to inscribe a work originally projected by yourself, and for some time carried on under your immediate patronage.—However humble the translator's abilities, and however imperfect the execution of these volumes may be, yet the design itself does honour to the wisdom and benevolence by which it was suggested ; I have the honour to be, with the utmost respect, and the most lively gratitude and esteem,

SIR,

Your most obedient,

And most humble Servant,

CHARLES HAMILTON.

INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS

BY THE

COMPOSERS OF THE PERSIAN VERSION.

PRAISE and glory unbounded is due to that adorable Being, in the investigation of whose ways, through their several mazes, the most learned theologians are exhausted, and the most contemplative philosophers, in the wilderness of research, find the foot of comprehension shackled with the fetters of amazement!—Duly to return thanks for his favours (which to offer is a duty indispensably incumbent on every existent being) is impossible; and to touch the skirt of his intelligence (which exceeds the power of the finger of diligence) by force of reason and study, impracticable!—Salutations innumerable are also to be presented at the tribunal of HIM who is seated on the elect throne, to follow whose infallible institutes is a certain means of attaining the Divine favour, and whose world-illuminating Lamp of LAW derives its sacred light from the morning beams of the Day of Judgment.—All honour and blessing upon him, and upon his holy family, and his worthy COMPANIONS!—Upon the tablets of the hearts of those who adorn the exordium of the book of knowledge and wisdom, and upon the minds of those who expound the collected mysteries of the creation, it is impressed,—that, from the day that the delightful region of BENGAL was cheered by the rays of Government of the Nawab Governor-General, Mr. WARREN HASTINGS, the whole of his wise and prudent attention was occupied and directed to this point,—that the care and protection of the country, and the administration of public affairs, should be placed on such a footing, that the community, being sheltered from the scorching heat of the sun of violence and tyranny, might find the gates closed against injustice and oppression; and that the range of sedition in those who deviate from the road of truth might be limited and shortened:—and since this hope must be fulfilled through the influence of the holy LAW of the PROPHET, and the injunctions and inhibitions of the chosen sect,—this denizen of the kingdom of humility and solitude, named GHOLAM YEHEE, was therefore instructed and empowered, together with Molla TAJ-ADDEEN, Meer MOHAMMED HOSSEIN, and Molla SHAR-BEEAT OOLLA, to translate from the Arabic language into the Persian idiom certain treatises upon the LAW, but particularly that excellent work the HEDAYA (which from its great subtlety, and the closeness of its style, is a species of miracle),—to which, accordingly, with their assistance, applying his attention, the Arabic text was, as much as it would admit, reduced into a Persian version; which they have entitled the HEDAYA FARSEE [Persian Guide],—hoping that mankind may thereby find their wants supplied, and that profit and advantage may thence accrue.

FROM those who travel in this fruitful garden let it not be concealed, that where, in the course of their investigation, the word Sheikhine [the two Elders] is mentioned, it signifies the two renowned Doctors, Imam ABOO HANEEFA, and the most illustrious of his disciples, Imam ABOO YOUSAF:—where the word Tirrafine [the two extremes] is written, it imports the sublime name of ABOO HANEEFA (on whom be the peace of God) and Imam MOHAMMED, who stands next in rank to the two Elders; and by the term Sahibine [the two disciples] are intended the two scholars of HANEEFA, upon both of whom be the blessing of God!

A HOPE is indulged, from the benevolence of those who shall peruse the following pages, that if, in passing over the valleys and the hills of this long journey, it should happen that the foot of meditation has anywhere slipped from its place, they will not treat it with severity, nor expose it to the finger of scorn or reprehension.—The guidance is with God!

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE SECOND EDITION.

IN further pursuance of the design to which I alluded in my Preface to the Third Edition of Ménu's Institutes, I now present to the profession the Second Edition of the HEDAYA. As this work has been made a text-book by the Council of Legal Education, for the examination of the students of the Inns of Court, who are qualifying themselves for call to the English Bar, with a view of practising in India; as the First Edition, by Hamilton, has been some time out of print; its bulk (four quarto volumes) is not calculated to assist reference to its pages; and its price had increased in proportion to the difficulty of obtaining it, I felt it a duty to publish a new Edition, in order to bring it somewhat more within the reach of the student, not only with reference to its size, but its cost. I have accordingly, therefore, prepared this Edition for those enterprising Publishers, Messrs. W. H. Allen and Co. A large portion of the work having become obsolete, in consequence of the abolition of slavery, and from other causes, I have expunged the Books containing those portions from the present Edition, they being more interesting to the antiquarian (who can consult the First Edition) than useful to the student or practitioner, and their insertion would not only have increased the bulk of the volume, but its expense also. I have, however, retained in the "Introductory Discourse" the translator's epitome of those books from which the object and scope of the obsolete law may be learned. Where portions of the expunged subjects have been incidentally mixed up with others, I have been constrained to retain such portions lest the context might, by their omission, be involved in obscurity. The second edition is now comprised in one volume, printed in double columns, and in smaller type than the original, with a view of comprising it within that compass, but, as the type is clear, it is conceived that no disadvantage will result from this. Wherever any subject is omitted, I have inserted a note, expressing my reasons for expunging it. A large portion of the original translation had been printed in Italic letters. For the sake of uniformity and clearness, this plan has not been adopted in the present Edition. I have added a very copious Index, which will facilitate reference to the context; and I should have embodied in foot-notes, references to the cases that have been decided upon the various subjects of which the work treats, but that I have already done so in that portion of my work on "the Mahommedan Law of Inheritance and Contract," in which the same subjects are discussed, and where those cases will be found collected.

Although the present Edition has been published with a view of assisting the student to prosecute his studies, yet the hope is entertained that the Judge, as well as the Practitioner, will find it useful, particularly in those provinces where the Mahommedan law demands a great portion of the attention of the judicial, as well as that of the practitioner. It is hoped, also, that it may be found useful in promoting the study of the law in the several Universities in India, it being advisable to assimilate the curriculum in both countries as much as possible.

PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE,

BY THE TRANSLATOR.

THE diffusion of useful knowledge, and the eradication of prejudice, though not among the most brilliant consequences of extended empire and commerce, are certainly the least important.—To open and to clear the road to science; to provide for its reception in whatever form it may appear, whatever language it may be conveyed: these are advantages which in part atone for the guilt of conquest, and in many cases compensate for the evils which the acquisition of dominion too often inflicts.

PERHAPS the history of the world does not furnish an example of any nation to whom the opportunity of acquiring this knowledge, communicating those advantages, has been afforded in so eminent a degree as GREAT BRITAIN.—To the people of this island the accession of a vast empire, in the form of ASIA, inhabited, not by hordes of barbarians, but by men far advanced in all the arts of civilized life, has opened a field of investigation equally curious and instructive.—Such researches must ever be pleasing to the speculative philosopher, who, unbiassed by the selfish motives of interest or ambition, delights in perusing the great and variegated volume of SOCIETY:—but to us they come recommended by no ordinary inducements; knowing, and feeling, as we ought, how much the preservation of what we have obtained depends upon the proper use of our power; and upon the right application of those means which PROVIDENCE has placed in our hands for continuing, and perhaps increasing, the happiness of a large portion of the human race.

THE permanency of any foreign dominion, and indeed, the justification of holding such dominion) requires that a strict attention be paid to the ease and advantage, not only of the governors, but of the governed; and to this great end nothing can so effectually contribute as preserving to the latter their ancient established practices, civil and religious, and protecting them in the exercise of their own institutes; for however defective or absurd these may in many instances appear, still they must be infinitely more acceptable than any which we could offer; since they are supported by the accumulated prejudice of ages, and, in the opinion of their followers, derive their origin from the Divinity himself.

THIS salutary maxim was wisely adopted by the servants of the EAST INDIA COMPANY on the first acquisition of our BENGAL territories; and to a steady adherence to it much of the present flourishing state of those provinces must be attributed.

THE judicial regulations both of the Hindoos and the Mohammedans are, in fact, so intimately blended with their religion, that any attempts to change the former would be felt by them as a violation of the latter; and should the wisdom of the British legislature ever suggest the expediency of introducing an uniform system of jurisprudence among them, it will, at the same time, dictate the necessity of preserving sacred and unaffected an infinite number of usages, essential to the ease and happiness of a people differing from us as widely in customs, manners, and habits of thinking, as in climate, complexion, or language.—Towards the accomplishment of such an important system, every effort which may tend to develop their Laws is undoubtedly a step, and therefore carries with it its own recommendation.—It was this more remote consideration, as well as the immediate advantages to be derived from it, which dictated the compilation of the HINDOO CODE: and it was the same motive which gave rise to the present publication.

MANY centuries have elapsed since the Mussulman conquerors of INDIA established in it, together with their religion, and general maxims of government, the practice of their courts of justice.—From that period the MUSSULMAN CODE has been the standard of judicial determination throughout those countries of INDIA which were subjugated by the Mohammedan princes, and have since remained under their dominion. In one particular, indeed, the conduct of the conquerors materially differed from what has been generally considered in Europe (how unjustly will appear from many passages in this work) as an invariable principle of all Mussulman governments; namely, a rigid and undeviating adherence to their own LAW, not only with respect to themselves, but also with respect to all who were subject to their dominion.—In all spiritual matters, those who submitted were allowed to follow the dictates of their own faith, and were even protected in points of which, with respect to a Mussulman, the LAW would take no cognizance.—In other particulars, indeed, of a temporal nature, they were considered as having bound themselves to pay obedience to the ordinances of the LAW, and were of course constrained to submit to its decrees.—Hence the HINDOOS enjoyed, under the Mussulman government, a complete indulgence with regard to the rites and ceremonies of their religion, as well as with respect to the various privileges and immunities, personal and collateral, involved in that singular compound of allegory and superstition.—In matters of property, on the contrary, and in all other temporal concerns (but more especially in the criminal jurisdiction), the Mussulman law gave the rule of decision, excepting where both parties were HINDOOS, in which case the point was referred to the judgment of the Pundits, or Hindoo Lawyers.—It is true, this statement rather accords with the spirit of the Mohammedan laws, than with the practice of them; for it too frequently happened that little regard was paid either to judicial ordinance or natural equity.—Where avarice and bigotry are united with despotic power, such a combination will occasion abuses, and corrupt the streams of justice.—Accordingly, the Hindoo were in many instances exposed to unfair and partial decisions, but more particularly where a Mussulman was concerned, in which case the law of MOHAMMED was doubtless often misinterpreted, and wrested to the purposes of injustice, or (which was an evil of equal magnitude) the decree was the result of a bargain between the magistrate and the highest bidder.—Still, however, these abuses did not alter the spirit of the law, which continued unvaried in its ostensible operation; the Mussulman courts determining in all matters of a criminal nature, without exception, and in every case of Mussulman property; and admitting of appeals to the Hindoo Lawyers (for there are no regular Hindoo courts of justice) only in cases where the Mussulman law had made no provision, or in which no Mohammedan had any interest.

SUCH was the state of jurisprudence in the BENGAL provinces, when a wonderful revolution threw the government of them into the hands of the ENGLISH.

LITTLE acquainted with the forms, and still less with the elementary principles, of the native administration of justice in their newly acquired territories, the British government determined to introduce as few innovations in those particulars as were consistent with prudence; and the only material alteration which, in course of time, took place, was the appointment of Company's servants to superintend and decide, as Judges in the civil Mussulman courts, and as Magistrates with respect to the criminal jurisdiction.—An important change was indeed effected in the administration of both justice and revenue, so far as affected the distinctions hitherto maintained between Mussulmans and Hindoos. Of these latter had always been subject to double taxes and imposts of every denomination, levied on principles which are fully explained in the course of the present work: and they also laboured under particular inconveniences and disadvantages in every judicial process (especially where the litigating adversary was a Mussulman) some of which have been already noticed.—By the British government both have been placed, in these points, upon an exact equality; and the Hindoo and Mussulman, respectively, have their property secured to them under that system which each is taught to believe possessed of paramount authority: but where their interests clash in the same cause, the matter is necessarily determined by the principles of the

PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE.

Mussulman law, to which long usage, supported by the policy of the Mogul government, has given a sort of prescriptive superiority.—Still, however, though much was effected, much remained to be done.—The gentlemen who were appointed to superintend the proceedings of the courts, having had no opportunity of studying the languages in which the laws are written, were constrained, in their determinations, to be guided by the advice of the native officers—men sometimes themselves too ill informed to be capable of judging, and generally open to corruption.—Hence appeared the necessity of procuring some certain rule whereby those gentlemen might be guided, without being exposed to the misconstructions of ignorance or interest, and which might enable them to determine for themselves, by a direct appeal to the Mussulman or Hindoo authority on the ground of which they were to decide.—A compilation was accordingly formed, under the inspection of the most learned Pundits (Hindoo Lawyers), containing an abstract of the Hindoo laws, the translation of which into English was committed to Mr. HALHED; and, shortly after this was accomplished, a number of the principal Mohammedan professors in Bengal were employed in translating from the Arabic into the Persian tongue a commentary upon the Mussulman law, called the HEDAYA, or Guide, a work held in high estimation among the people of that persuasion. The English version of that commentary is now submitted to the public.

BEFORE the translator proceeds to give an account of this work, it may be proper to say something concerning the LAWS of which it treats.

THE Mussulman LAW proceeds, in its determinations, upon two ground; the text of the KORAN, and the Sonna, or oral law, corresponding with the Mishna of the Jews.

THE KORAN (or, as it is more commonly termed, AL KORAN) is considered by the Mussulmans as the basis of their law; and is therefore, when applied to judicial matters, entitled, by way of distinction, al Sharra, or THE LAW, in the same manner as the Pentateuch is distinguished by the Jews.

WHO was the real Author of this extraordinary compound of declamation and precept, must for ever remain a matter of uncertainty, since on this point much difference of opinion obtained, even among the earliest opponents of MOHAMMED and his pretended mission.—That this extraordinary person, however, was himself the principal projector, is beyond dispute, although it be probable that he received much assistance from others in the composition of it.—By all orthodox Mussulmans the original is believed to have existed from eternity, inscribed on the tablet of the divine decrees, which stands close by the throne of God, and contains the predestined fate of MEN and things.—From this tablet a copy of it is supposed to have been taken by the angel GABRIEL, and conveyed to the Simma Asfi, or lowest heaven, where it was by him revealed to the Prophet in various portions, and at different times.—In fact, it was delivered by Mohammed piecemeal to his followers, according as the occasion dictated, or as any particular emergency required; nor was it arranged together, in its present form, until the reign of his friend and successor, the Khalif ABOO BEKR, who ordered the whole to be collected from the leaves or skins on which the passages had been written, and also from the mouths of such of the surviving companions of the Prophet as had committed them to memory, and inserted in one volume, but without any regard to the order of their original promulgation.—Much difference, however, was soon perceptible in the several copies of this work; wherefore OTHMAN, the second succeeding Khalif, to remedy the growing evil, directed a number of copies to be transcribed from this of ABOO BEKR, and ordered all others to be destroyed.—The precepts of the KORAN are of two descriptions, prohibitory and injunctive. In the application of them to practice they are always considered as unquestionable and irrefragable, except where one passage has been contradicted, and consequently repealed, by a subsequent passage, some instances of which are cited in the course of this Commentary.

SONNA is a word which (among a variety of other senses) signifies custom, regulation, or institute. The Sonna (or, as it is expressed among the Arabs, by way of distinction, Al-Sonna) stands next to the KORAN in point of authority, being considered as a kind of supplement to that book. It forms the body of what is termed the oral law, because it never was committed to writing by the Arabian Legislator, being deduced solely from his traditionary precepts or adjudications, preserved from hand to hand, by authorized persons, and which apply to many points of both a spiritual and temporal nature, not mentioned or but slightly touched upon in the KORAN.—These traditions* are divided, by the Mussulman commentators, into two classes: I. the simple sayings of the Prophet from his own uninspired judgment; II. sayings from divine inspiration. The former are termed Hadees Nabwee, or traditions of the Prophet; the latter Hadees Koodsee, or divine traditions; and both have the force of laws. —After MOHAMMED's death, they were at first quoted by his companions merely in order to decide occasional disputes, or to restrain men from certain actions which the Prophet had prohibited: and thus, in process of time, they became a standard of judicial determination. The first collection of them was made in the Khalifat of ALEE; and, in after times, many pious men employed themselves in making those collections. —There are, besides these, a multitude of traditions cited by the Mussulman commentators, concerning the acts and sayings, not only of their Prophet, but also of his COMPANIONS and immediate successors; which, though not of equal authority, are nevertheless admitted to have some weight as precedents in judicial decisions, when not repugnant to reason, or contradicted either by the KORAN or the SONNA. Upon the Sonna a great number of volumes have been written, under the titles of Sonna,† Rawayat,‡ and Hawadees,§ several of which are quoted in the course of this work, and will be more particularly mentioned when we come to treat of authorities.*

PRACTICAL DIVINITY, also, is admitted to have its due weight in judicial determinations, even among the orthodox. As used by the Mussulman Lawyers, it chiefly consists of casuistry, and analogous applications to, or deductions from, cases already determined upon by the more certain standards of the KORAN or Sonna; the nature of which will be more fully explained by the perusal of a single page of the work than by any illustration that could be offered.

HAVING stated thus much with respect to the foundations of the Mussulman Law, we shall next endeavour to account for those varieties which at present appear in the superstructure;—but before we proceed to this it will be proper to enter into a short detail of the events in which originated the first great schism among the followers of MOHAMMED.

HAD the impostor of Mecca left, at his decease, any male heirs, it is possible that the distinction to which he rose would have been transmitted without question to his posterity. In this however he was disappointed, his five sons having all died in their infancy.—He had indeed four daughters by his first wife KHADIJA, of whom one alone survived him, his favourite FATIMA, the wife of ALEE; but a female was universally deemed incompetent to be the leader of the FAITHFUL.

ALEE,* as the nearest relation of the prophet, the husband of his daughter, and the lineal chief of his family, aspired to the succession, with hopes founded not less on his personal merit than his conjugal and hereditary claims.—When MOHAMMED was seized with his last illness, his son-in-law probably expected a nomination in his favour.—His views however were frustrated, and his pretensions for the present defeated. —AYSHA,† the stepmother of FATIMA, had always entertained an antipathy against him; and, by exerting her influence with the dying Prophet, easily prevented him from making any declaration which might determine the Mussulmans in favour of the descendant of HASHIM.—From this circumstance, on the decease of MOHAMMED, his followers became divided into several factions.—The people of Medina were desirous of raising SAAD, one of their countrymen, to the dignity of Imam, or chief; whilst the Meccanites, considering his advancement as subjecting them to a foreign domination,

* The translator, speaking of the Sonna, uses the word traditions, in compliance with custom, which, among Europeans, has applied this term to all the oral precepts, &c., of MOHAMMED.—Hadees (pronounced, among the Arabs, Hadeeth) properly signifies an occurrence or event. Some Mussulman commentators define it to mean “an emanation,” and understand it particularly in this sense when applied to the sayings or actions of their Prophet.

declared their intention of electing a chief among themselves.—Had such a design been carried into effect, it must, in its consequences, have destroyed altogether the newly established religion; and by crushing the rising empire of Islamism in its infancy, would have restored the Arabs to their primitive barbarism and idolatry.—The prudence or policy of OMAR, and some other of the principal companions, interfered; and they proposed, in order to avoid the dangerous schism which this must occasion among the Mussulmans, that all parties should, without distinction, unite in the election of a successor to the Prophet, who as such should be universally obeyed.—The matter was not settled without much contention: but at length ABOO BEKR, the father-in-law of MOHAMMED, who had exerted himself as a mediator among the disputants, was unanimously elected by the elders, and acknowledged by the people.—It was in vain that the Hashimees, and other partizans of ALEE, vehemently opposed this defeasance of his right, and obstinately maintained that he alone had an indisputable and exclusive claim to succeed, as well on account of his near relation to MOHAMMED, as because of a declaration of the latter to that effect.*—Their remonstrances were disregarded, their clamours drowned amidst the acclamations of the multitude, and they were compelled to remain satisfied with refusing to acknowledge the Khalif.

ALEE himself retired from the scene of his mortification, and sustained the disappointment of his ambition with silent disgust; nor did he pay his homage to the appointed "COMMANDER OF THE FAITHFUL" until some time after, when the death of his wife Fatima had weakened his party, and he perceived that a perseverance in his dissent might indeed create strife, but could not be productive of advantage.

WITHIN little more than two years after his elevation, Aboo Bekr, finding himself attacked by a mortal distemper, nominated Omar to be his successor, who accordingly assumed the title without opposition, and after a most successful and victorious reign of above ten years, died of a wound he received from one Firooz, a Persian slave, whom he had offended by a sarcastic observation concerning a suit which the slave had referred to his tribunal.—When dying, OMAR refused to appoint any particular successor, declaring the Khalifat to rest among six persons, who should succeed to each other agreeably to the order of their election or ballot; namely, ALEE, OTHMAN, SAAD, ABDULRIHMAN, TALHA, and ZOBAIR. Of these ABDULRIHMAN agreed to forego his right altogether, provided he might have the privilege of naming the successor to OMAR; a proposal to which all his colleagues assented, except only ALEE, who took this opportunity to urge his superior and exclusive pretensions to the Khalifat. ABDULRIHMAN, however, notwithstanding his opposition, being supported by his four other colleagues, offered the Khalifat to OTHMAN, and he was proclaimed and recognized as successor to the PROPHET, and sovereign of the Mussulmans. ALEE, on this second defeat, acted with a moderation which, however laudable in itself, was much blamed by some of his adherents. He paid his homage to OTHMAN without murmuring, and appeared content to submit to the success of his competitor.

IF OTHMAN was really desirous of the rank which he had thus attained, he exhibited a powerful instance of the delusions of ambition! Whilst his armies were extending the empire of Islam in every direction, and penetrating into Khorasan and Mauritania, the venerable Khalif found his reign disturbed by intestine commotions, and his person exposed to the violence of faction. His declining age had unnerved his arm; he was unable to hold the reins of dominion with the steady hand of his predecessors; and he, perhaps too late, discovered that he had undertaken a task to which he was unequal.—The governors of his provinces, encouraged by the growing imbecility of their prince, plundered and oppressed those whom it was their duty to cherish and protect.—He had disobliterated AYSHA, "the Mother of the FAITHFUL," who excited a powerful cabal against him at Mecca, whilst ALEE and his discontented Hashimites connived at, perhaps inflamed, these disorders. The malcontents at length being joined by the deputies from the oppressed subjects of Egypt and Syria took to arms, and OTHMAN found himself besieged in his own palace.—Superstition and respect for a time withheld the assailants. Their scruples, however, were soon overcome: they forced the gates; and the unfortunate Khalif expired his errors or his weakness by his blood.

THE insurgents, upon the murder of OTHMAN, made ALEE an offer of the Khalifat; which, with the consent of his colleagues TALHA and ZOBAIR (already mentioned), he accepted.—He was publicly proclaimed Khalif within a short time after, and at the distance of twenty-four years from the period of his first aspiring to that dignity.

In obtaining, however, this long-sought object, ALEE soon found himself embarked upon a tempestuous ocean, and the storm ended only with his life.—Conscious that the concern he was generally, and perhaps justly, suspected to have in the death of OTHMAN would not fail to alienate from him all those who were connected with that Khalif, or whom he had advanced, one his first steps was, to effect a general removal of the governors who had been appointed by his predecessor. This bold and dangerous measure excited much disgust in all the provinces, but more particularly in Syria, where MOAVIAH, to whom the care of that region had been entrusted by OTHMAN, and who was nearly related to him, excited a strong party against ALEE, and openly declared his resolution of avenging upon him the death of his kinsman. At the same time TALHA and ZOBAIR were disgusted with ALEE, because of his having refused to them the governments of Koofa and Basra; and understanding that AYSHA, the widow of Mohammed, had retired from Medina (then the seat of the Khalifat) to Mecca, followed her thither. At Mecca a powerful faction was excited against Alee, particularly among the tribe of OMMIAH; and these being joined by the dismissed governors of the provinces, and having Aysha at their head, collected a powerful army, determining to depose ALEE by force, and set up MOAVIAH as Khalif in his room.—Thus was excited the first civil war among the Mussulmans; and hence originated the dissensions which have ever since obtained between the opponents of ALEE and his adherents.

ALEE, with undaunted resolution, faced, and for the present repelled, the threatening storm. He met the insurgents, and, after a bloody conflict, gave them a complete overthrow, in which TALHA and ZOBAIR were slain, and AYSHA taken prisoner, whom the Khalif treated with the utmost respect, and sent her back, with honourable attendance, to Mecca.

AFTER this victory, ALEE remained complete master of Arabia. But he still found himself opposed by a powerful party in Syria; for MOAVIAH, having retired to Damascus, and being there joined by all the relations of OTHMAN, was publicly acknowledged by those as Khalif and Commander of the FAITHFUL.

PERHAPS the mere effort of a faction at Damascus would not, of itself, have availed to shake the throne of ALEE, confirmed as it was by his recent signal success. But the pretensions of his competitor were supported, on this occasion, by the celebrated AMROO ibn al As, the most puissant and popular of all the Mussulman commanders. This chieftain had conquered Egypt during the Khalifat of OMAR; had afterwards been recalled by OTHMAN; and, at the period of his death, and the investiture of ALEE, commanded Palestine.

To gratify some particular resentment against the son-in-law of the Prophet, or, more probably, induced by his attachment to the house of OMMIAH, he repaired from Jerusalem to Damascus, and took the oaths to MOAVIAH. He pledged himself to obey and maintain the usurper as the only true and legitimate leader of the FAITHFUL. Such was his influence that the multitude immediately joined their acclamations, and flocked to the standard of the Syrian Khalif. The civil war was thus rekindled. The armies of the contending Khalifs prepared for battle, and ALEE was once more on the point of defeating his enemies, when they were saved by the stratagem of fastening some KORANS to the ends of their spears: for the troops of ALEE, beholding the sacred volumes thus exposed, could not be prevailed upon to advance to the encounter. Soon after these proceedings a truce was agreed upon, and the competitors engaged to retire to their respective capitals, Koofa and Damascus, leaving their claims to be decided by a reference, to the award of which each party bound himself to adhere.

AMROO was appointed referee on the part of MOAVIAH, and the less artful ABOO MOOSA on that of ALEE. In the course of their conferences, AMROO had the address to persuade his co-arbiter that, in order to restore peace to the Mussulmans, it was absolutely necessary to depose both their principals, and to elect a Khalif who should meet the approbation of all parties: and for this purpose a tribunal was erected between the two armies. ABOO MOOSA first mounted, and proclaimed the deposition of ALEE and MOAVIAH. AMROO succeeded him, and announced MOAVIAH "as the legal Khalif, who had been nominated by OTHMAN, and stood pledged to revenge his blood." The friends of ALEE, supposing this to be done with his connivance, retired from the place astonished and discouraged. When recovered from their confusion and surprise, the compromise was declared void. Each party proceeded to villify and excommunicate the other; and the anathemas uttered on this occasion have continued to be solemnly repeated ever since, in the mosques of the respective sects, as one of the offices of religion. The war was resumed with greater fury than ever. AMROO was dispatched into Egypt with a considerable force, and seized the government of that province in the name of MOAVIAH. The Mussulmans, instead of seeking foreign enemies, turned their swords against each other's breasts; and the power of their empire was likely to perish by an internal disease, when an event took place which, for the present, put an end to the contest, and restored peace, if not unity, among them.

THREE of the Kharegites (insurgents against ALEE) happening to meet at the temple of MECCA, discoursed concerning the many friends and companions they had lost in this fruitless war, and deplored their deaths, as well as the danger which threatened the general cause from a continuance of these unhappy divisions.—One of them at length, in an extasy of fanaticism and despair, proposed to end these troubles at once by death of ALEE, MOAVIAH, and his friend AMROO.—His two comrades immediately agreed to take their share in this desperate enterprize.—They prepared their daggers, and proceeded,—one for Damascus, another for Egypt, and the third for Koofa; each fully resolved to sacrifice his allotted victim.—The event proved that their determination was as firm as their undertaking was desperate: but one only succeeded.—The first, having arrived in Egypt, mistook the person of AMROO, and stabbed another who happened to preside that day in the character of Imam in his stead;—and on being conducted to punishment, satisfied himself with exclaiming, "I intended to strike AMROO, but God willed it should another."—The second repaired to Damascus, there wounded MOAVIAH, but not mortally, and was suffered to live long enough to discover the conspiracy.—The third accomplished his sanguinary purpose.—Having arrived at Koofa, and engaged two assistants, he, on Friday the 17th of Ramzan, A.H. 40, waylaid the Khalif as he was going to the Mosque, and gave him a wound, of which he soon after died.

THUS perished ALEE, after a short and turbulent reign of four years and nine months.—His partizans, however, were not dismayed by this event.—The murdered Khalif left several children by nine different wives; the two eldest, HASSAN and HOOSEIN, by FATIMA the daughter of Mohammed, during whose lifetime he contracted no other marriage.

HASSAN was by his adherents proclaimed Khalif on the death of his father; but MOAVIAH, who had assumed the dignity of Khalif in Egypt and Syria some time before, was in possession of those countries, and refused to acknowledge him on account of the suspicion which attached to him as being concerned in the death of OTHMAN.—Hence a new competition arose, which could not have failed to rekindle the flame of war, had not HASSAN, who inherited more the piety than the valour of his predecessor, and was more ambitious to distinguish himself in the performance of religious ceremonies than in the support of his regal pretensions, agreed to relinquish his claim in favour of his rival; and thus was transferred the dignity of the Khalifat from the tribe of HASHIM to that of OMMIAH.

HASSAN, upon resigning the Khalifat, retired to Medina, and there lived in privacy until A.H. 49, when he died, poisoned, as the Shiya allege, by his wife, at the instance of MOAVIAH, who dreaded the possibility of his renewing his pretensions.

HOOSEIN possessed a larger portion of the martial spirit of ALEE than his elder brother; but his fate was not more fortunate.—On the death of MOAVIAH, having refused to acknowledge his son YEZEED (who succeeded to the Khalifat, A.H. 60), he was constrained to retire for safety from Medina to Mecca, whither the people of Koofa, who were strongly attached to the family of ALEE, sent him an invitation to join their standard, after having proclaimed him the only lawful Khalif, and declared YEZEED to be an usurper.—YEZEED, understanding that HOOSEIN had accepted this invitation, and set out from Mecca for Koofa, dispatched OBEYDOOLA one of his commanders to intercept him; and OBEYDOOLA, meeting him passing over the plain of Kerball, with only seventy-three of his family and attendants, cut to pieces the grandson of the Prophet and the whole of his feeble party.—In this indiscriminate massacre also perished four other sons of ALEE, namely, ABDOOLA, ABBAS, OTHMAN, and JAFIR, together with one or more of his daughters.—The wretched remains of his family were afterwards brought before YEZEED, who was advised to seize the present opportunity, and to cut off all future causes of disturbance, by extirpating this remnant of the Prophet's descendants.—This flagitious proposal filled the Khalif with horror. He repented of the blood which had been already shed, execrated the sanguinary obedience of OBEYDOOLA, and dismissed the captives with honour to the tomb of their father at KOOFA.

FROM this period the posterity of ALEE sunk into obscurity and insignificance, except in the eyes of their sectaries.—Their descendants, however, under the title of Seyids, have spread over India, Persia, Turkey, and the northern coast of AFRICA, are held in veneration by the multitude as inheriting the blood of the Prophet, and have frequently excited the jealousy of the reigning princes of Arabia and Turkey.—In Persia and India, particularly, the memory of ALEE and his sons is cherished, among the people, with a veneration approaching to idolatry; and the latter country exhibits some striking instances of the force of this partiality, which possibly a long lapse of time, instead of weakening, has rather contributed to strengthen.—The Mussulman Princes of HINDOSTAN are, in general, Soonis, as well as most of their chief men, the heads of the law, or the ministers of state, whilst the great body of Mohammedans, being descended from a Persian stock, or from the proselytes of the first Mohammedan conquerors, adhere rigidly to the principles of the Shi'as.—The 'Nizam, one of the most powerful and independent of those princes, cannot attend public worship in the Jama mosque of his capital (Hydrabad) because of the Anathemas weekly uttered there against the usurping Khalifs of the house of Ommiah.—At Lucknow, on the tenth of Moharrim, the effigy of Omar (who, as being the first proposer of an elective Khalifat, in prejudice to the right of ALEE, is regarded by his adherents with particular abhorrence), is set up, filled with sweetmeats, as a mark to shoot arrows at; and, after being used with every species of indignity, is torn to pieces, and its contents devoured by the enthusiastic votaries of ALEE.—This day is throughout these regions observed as the anniversary of the death of Hoossein and his brethren, and celebrated by songs and processions. The magnificent Mausoleums erected to the memory of these illustrious martyrs are still visited by their adherents, who regard this token of respect as scarcely less meritorious than a pilgrimage to the Kaba itself; and the real or fictitious descendants from this sacred stock have, at different times, made their affinity to the Prophet a pretext for assuming the regal or pontifical authority in Syria and Africa.—They claim, moreover, a certain pre-eminence, and exclusive privileges, to some of which they are admitted, even in Turkey, where the memory of ALEE is least respected, and the pretensions of his line to the Khalifat utterly denied.—A few slight traces of their assumed superiority, may be discovered in this commentary.

THUS early divided on a subject which involved at once the interests of individuals, and the prejudices of superstition, it was not to be expected that the followers of MOHAMMED should long continue to observe an uniformity of practice or of doctrine.—The first controversies began, of course, between the retainers of ALEE and their opponents. When the contending parties proceeded openly to anathematize each other, the mutual change of heterodoxy was not confined merely to the appointment of an Imam, but soon advanced to comprehend the expositions of the LAW in other matters both of spiritual and temporal concern. Each faction reproached the other with disbelieving, perverting or misunderstanding, the sacred text of the KORAN.—Notwithstanding the pious attempt of the Khalif OTHMAN to restore a literal uniformity in the several copies of this work (as already noticed), still, from the nature of the composition, as well as from the character in which it was preserved, there was abundance of room in many places for a variety of constructions, independent of any particular interest which might mislead the understanding, or at least the inclinations, of mankind.—Its contents are distinguished under two heads, the محکمات or perspicuous, and the منشبات or enigmatical, the latter of which each commentator might explain in the way most agreeable to himself, or best coinciding with the tenets of his particular sect.—The whole was, moreover, committed to writing in the Koreish character, the Arabic, into which it was afterwards transcribed, being of later invention; and as this last was destitute of vowels, the sense of course depended much on the pronunciation of the Mokris, or readers, whence, upon the introduction of the vocal points, a variation took place in the copies, according to the manner of the reader upon whose authority these were inserted.

THE traditions also opened a copious field for disputation. No authentic collections of them having been compiled until all or most of the Prophet's companions were dead, they existed, for above a century, merely in the memories of the Arabians. Thousands were of course promulgated by their leaders as the occasion or the passion of the moment happened to dictate: they swelled into a number exceeding all possibility of belief: every collector assumed the right of erecting to himself a standard of selection: none would or could believe in all; and some boldly disregarded or rejected them in toto, as affording no authentic rules for faith or conduct.

FROM these circumstances attending their authorities, the disputants found an ample field on which to exercise their polemical talents.—This literary warfare was indeed, for some time, confined to the original causes of their disagreement; and, excepting those, they touched merely on points of a speculative description.—This, however, opened the way to the various heterodoxies of the scholastic divines. Abstracted subtleties and metaphysical distinctions were, by degrees, substituted for the precepts of the Law; and the controversial factions became divided and subdivided into parties innumerable.

It is proper, however, to remark, that a difference of tenets did not enter into judicial decisions until upwards of a century after the death of ALËE, when it was occasioned by the defection of HANEËFA from the party of the Shiyas, of which more shall be said *when we come to speak of that doctor.

In stating thus much, we have endeavoured to give a summary view of the first great schisms* in Islamism; but we have only ventured to sketch an outline of the picture, without any reference to collateral events, the recital of which is more properly the province of the historian.—Having dismissed this topic, we proceed to give some account of those eminent persons whose discussions occupy a considerable portion of this work, and whose doctrines and opinions are generally admitted as of binding authority at the present day.

In every system of religion ORTHODOXY and HERESY are merely relative terms. Mankind, however, have in general agreed to confine these distinctions to points of spiritual doctrine.

THE Mussulmans who assume to themselves the distinction of orthodox,* are such as maintain the most obvious interpretation of the KORAN, and the obligatory force of the traditions, in opposition to the innovations of the sectaries: whence they are termed Soonis, or traditionists.—Although differing considerably in their legal conclusions, and in the application of the KORAN and the SONNA to temporal matters, yet they unite in rejecting the speculations of the scholastic divines;—and some of them condemn the use of scholastic divinity altogether, as tending to destroy the foundations of religious belief.—Concerning these we shall be somewhat more particular, as their discussions occupy a considerable part of this work, and it is their opinion alone which is admitted to have any weight in the determinations of jurisprudence.

THE orthodox sects are four in number—the Haneefites, the Malekites, the Shafeites, and the Hanbalites—who are all Soonis, or traditionists. But although they equally assume the name of traditionists, they do not all equally adhere to the Sonna; for there is this characteristic distinction among them, that the first, in determining upon cases where the KORAN affords them no positive precept, are guided principally by their own judgment, examining and deciding, in most of these instances, according to the rules of practical divinity; whereas the

* ABI DAOOD has left a selection of 40,000 out of 500,000; and IBN HANBAL gives us, in his Moseuneid, 37,000 out of 750,000 of those real or pretended precepts of the Prophet.

* The word orthodox, as here used, is confined purely to a justness of thinking in spiritual matters, concerning which the opinions of those four sects perfectly coincide, the differences among them relating solely to their expositions of the temporal three others adhere more tenaciously to the precedents left them by the Prophet. On this account the Haneefites are by some writers, for distinction sake, termed Ahl Kecaas, or the followers of reason, and the others Ahl Sonna, or the followers of tradition.

THE founder of the first sect was Imam ABOO HANEEFA NAOMAN BIN SABIT, who was born at KOOFA, the ancient capital of IRAK, A. H. 80, A. C. 702, at which time four of the Prophet's companions were still alive,* from whom, however, it is related, that he never received any instructions or traditional knowledge.

HANEEFA is considered, by the MOHAMMEDANS, as the great oracle of jurisprudence, he being the first among them who attempted to argue abstractedly upon points of LAW, and to apply the reason of men to the investigation of temporal concerns.—They are accordingly lavish in his praise. They even trace the origin of his eminence to a period antecedent to his birth, and suppose him to have been assisted by the peculiar favour and influence of Heaven; for it is related by the learned

HAMED, that his father, when yet a child, being presented to ALEE, received his blessing, the Commander of the Faithful at the same time declaring, that “from his body should spring a light, which should diffuse its rays throughout all the regions of ISLAMISM.”—However well or ill founded this anecdote may be, his early youth is said to have been marked by a strong predilection for study, an uncommon acuteness of understanding, and an unremitting but cheerful piety, equally removed from the gloomy austerity of the bigot, and the frigid indifference of the sensualist.—HANEEFA was educated in the tenets of the Shiyas. He received his first instructions in jurisprudence at Bagdad, from a Imam ABOO JAFIR, an eminent doctor of that sect, and heard traditions chiefly from ABOOOLA IBN AL MOBARICK, both of whose authorities he frequently quotes.—After having finished his studies, and gained considerable reputation at Bagdad, he returned to Koofa, and there distinguished himself by succeeding from his master ABOO JAFIR, and teaching civil law on principles repugnant to those inculcated by that doctor. His defection indeed is, by the Shiyas, attributed to motives which, if true, divest him of the merit of proceeding in this upon internal conviction. They relate that ABOO JAFIR's eminent piety, learning, and austerity of manners, having attached to him a considerable number of followers, the increase of his reputation alarmed the reigning Khalif, who, in order to destroy his credit, gained over HANEEFA, by promising to support, with all the influence of government, his opinions and decisions against those of JAFIR; and that HANEEFA, allured by the offer, quitted his preceptor, and instituted a school in opposition to him. Whether they be correct in this statement or not, it is certain that the dissension which took place between these eminent lawyers is considered as the origin of the different tenets of the Shiyas and Soonis in jurisprudence; and as the habits of mind most early acquired are seldom to be entirely subdued, the little attention which (comparatively with the other Soonis) HANEEFA pays to the precepts of the oral law may perhaps be attributed to the instructions which in his youth he imbibed from ABOO JAFIR.—He is described of a middling stature, a comely countenance, and pleasant conversation; harmonious in his voice, of an open and ingenuous disposition, and kind to excess to his relations and friends, admitting none to his society but of the best character. Such a disposition and conduct necessarily secured to him the universal esteem, whilst his polemical abilities gained him the reverence and admiration of his disciples; as may be collected from an anecdote which is recorded by SHAFEI, in the introduction to his Osook, where he relates that, inquiring of MALIK, “Whether he had ever seen HANEEFA?” he was answered by that doctor, “Yes; and he is such a person that if he were to assert a wooden pillar was made of gold, he would prove it to you by argument.”—Shafei himself, although differing materially from him in his legal decisions, says, in another part of the same work, that “No study whatever could enable any man to rival HANEEFA in the knowledge of the law.”—It appears, indeed, from the best authorities, that he was a man eminently endowed with science, both speculative and practical; of a mild disposition and tolerating principles; pious, abstinent, charitable, and accomplished beyond all others in legal knowledge.—His diffidence is said to have increased with the extent of his acquirements; and he has indeed afforded an instance of insurmountable and scrupulous modesty, such as has been seldom recorded, but which twice exposed him to the most severe treatment from his superiors, and probably, in the end, shortened his life. It is related that HOOBEYRA, the governor of Koofa, importuned him to accept the office of Kazee or judge, and, upon his persisting in refusing it, caused him to be scourged for ten days successively, with ten stripes a day, until at length, being convinced of his inflexibility, he released him: and, some years after, the Khalif al MANSOOR, having invited him to Bagdad, tried to prevail on him to accept the same office, which declining as before he was thrown into prison, and there confined until he died, A. H. 150.—He wrote several treatises both of a civil and religious nature.—The principal of his speculative works are, I. the Filk-al-elm, meaning the support, prop, or pillar, in which are established all the essential points of Islamism, on the authority of the KORAN and the traditions; II. the Filk-al-elm, or orbit of science, a treatise on scholastic theology, in which he exposes the various errors and contradictions of the heterodox; and, III. Moallim, or the teacher, a sort of catechism, showing the superior excellence and efficacy of FAITH. His principal scholars were Imam ABOO YOOSEF, and Imam MOHAMMED, of whom we shall presently have occasion to speak more particularly.—The sect of HANEEFA at first prevailed chiefly in Irak; but his doctrines afterwards spread into Assyria, Africa, and Transoxania; and his authority with respect to jurisprudence is at present generally received throughout Turkey, Tartary, and Hindostan.

The founder of the second orthodox sect was Imam ABOO ABDoola MALIK BIN ANS, who was born at Medina, A. H. 94, A. C. 716.—Living in the same place with, and receiving his earliest impressions from SIHL IBN SAAD, the almost sole surviving COMPANION of MOHAMMED, an ear witness of his precepts, and a participator in his dangers and exploits, MALIK acquired the utmost veneration for the traditions, to which he afterwards paid an implicit regard through life.—He was indeed considered, as the most learned man of his time in that species of knowledge, and exerted his utmost endeavours to procure reverence and respect to those posthumous precepts of the PROPHET.—His self-denial and abstinence were remarkable, insomuch that he generally fasted four days in the week, during which he denied himself even the most ordinary indulgencies.—He enjoyed the advantages of a personal acquaintance and familiar intercourse with HANEEFA, although differing from him with respect to the absolute authority of the traditions.—His pride, however, was at least equal to his literary endowments.—In proof of this it is related of him that when the great Khalif HAROON AL RASHEED came to Medina, to visit the tomb of the PROPHET, MALIK having gone forth to meet him, the Khalif addressed him, “O MALIK! I intreat, as a favour, that you will come every day to me and my two sons AMEEN and MAIMOON, and instruct us in traditional knowledge;” to which the sage haughtily replied, “O KHALIF! science is of a dignified nature, and instead of going to any person, requires that all should come to it.”—The story further says that the sovereign, with much humility, asked his pardon, acknowledged the truth of his remark, and sent both his sons to MALIK, who seated them among his other scholars without any distinction.—With regard to the traditions, his authority is generally quoted as decisive.—In fact, he considered those as altogether superseding the judgment of a MAN; and on his death-bed severely condemned himself for the many decisions he had presumed to give on the mere suggestion of his own reason.—The KORAN and the SONNA excepted, the study to which he applied himself, in his latter days, was the contemplation of the DEITY; and his mind was at length so much absorbed in the immensity of the divine attributes and perfections, as to lose sight of all more insignificant Objects!—Hence he gradually withdrew himself from the world, became indifferent to its concerns, and after some years of complete retirement, died at Medina, A. H. 179, A. C. 801.—His authority is at present chiefly received in Barbary, and the other northern states of Africa.—Of his works, the only one upon record is the Matta, which contains a review of the most remarkable adjudications of the Prophet.—His principal scholars were SHAFEE (who afterwards himself gave the name to a sect), ABOO LAIS, and the learned IBN SIREEH.

The founder of the third orthodox sect Imam MOHAMMED IBN EDREES AL , who was born at Askala in Palestine, A.H. 156, A.C. 772.—He was of the same stock with MOHAMMED, and is distinguished by the appellation of Imam al Motlebi, or Koreish Motlebi, because of his descent from the Prophet's grandfather ABDAL MOTLEB.—He derived his patronymic title, or surname, SHAFEI, from his great grandfather SHAFEI IBN SAHIR.—His family were at first among the most inveterate of Mohammed's enemies, and his father, carrying the standard of the tribe of HASHIM, at the battle of Beder, was taken prisoner by the Mussulmans, but released on ransom, and afterwards became a convert to the faith.—SHAFEI is reported, by the Mussulman writers, to be the most accurate of all the traditionists; and if their accounts be well founded, nature had indeed endowed him with extraordinary talents for excelling in that species of literature.—It is said, that at seven years of age he had got the whole KORAN by rote: at ten he had committed to memory the MATTA of Malik; and at fifteen he obtained from the college of Mecca the degree of a MOOFTEE, which gave him the privilege of passing decisions on the most difficult cases.—He passed the earlier part of his life at Gaza in Palestine (which has occasioned many to think he was born in that place), there completed his education, afterwards removed to Mecca, and came to Bagdad, A.H. 195, where he gave lectures on the traditions and composed his first work, entitled the Osool.—From Bagdad he went on a pilgrimage to Mecca, and thence afterwards passed into Egypt, where he met with Malik.—It does not appear that he ever returned from that country, but spent the remainder of his life there, dividing his time between the exercises of religion, the instruction of the ignorant, and the composition of his latter works. He died at Cairo, A.H. 204, A.C. 826. Although he was forty-seven years of age before he began to publish, and died at fifty-four, his works are more voluminous than those of any other Mussulman doctor.—He was a great enemy to the scholastic divines, and most of his productions (especially upon theology) were written with a view to expose their absurdities, and explode their doctrines.—He is said to have been the first who reduced the science of jurisprudence into a regular system, and made a discriminatory collection of traditions.—ABMED HANBAL remarks that, "until the time of SHAFEI, men did not know how to distinguish between the traditions that were in force and those that were cancelled."—His first work was (as before mentioned) the Osool, or fundamentals, containing all the principles of the Mussulman civil and canon law.—His next literary productions were the Ummal and the Mesned, both treatises on the traditional law, which are held in high estimation among the orthodox.—His works upon practical divinity are various; and those upon theology consist of fourteen volumes.—His tomb is still to be seen at Cairo, where the famous SELAH-AD-DEEN*, afterwards (A.H. 587) founded a college for the preservation of his works and the propagation of his doctrines.—The magnificent mosque and college at Herat in Khorasan were also founded for the same purpose, by the Sultan GHEEAS AD DEEN, at the instance of the Shafeites, who at one time were very numerous in the northern provinces of Persia.—The sect is at present chiefly confined to Egypt and Arabia; and however highly they may deem of his authority, it will appear in the course of the present work that his decisions in civil and criminal jurisprudence are seldom quoted by the doctors of Persia or India but with a view to be refuted or rejected.—He first studied jurisprudence under the learned MOOSLIM BIN KHALID, head Mooftee of Mecca, and accomplished himself in the knowledge of traditions from MALIK in Egypt.—His principal scholars were HANBAL and ZOHARI, the former of whom afterwards gave his name to a sect.—SHAFEI is said to have been a person of acute discernment and agreeable conversation.—His reverence for God was such, that he never was heard to mention his name except in prayer.—His manners were mild and ingratiating, and he reprobated all unnecessary moroseness or severity in a teacher, it being at saying of his, that "whoever advised his brother tenderly, and in private, did him a service; but that public reproof could only operate as a reproach."

THE founder of the fourth orthodox sect is Imam ABOO ABDŪLA-AHMED IBN HANBAL, surnamed Shaban al Maroozee.* He was born at Bagdad A.H. 164 (A.C. 786), where he received his education under YEZEED BIN-HAROON and YEHEEYA BIN SEYID. — On SHAFFI coming to Bagdad (A.H. 195), IBN HANBAL attended the lectures delivered there by that doctor, and was instructed by him in the traditions. In process of time he acquired a high reputation† from his profound knowledge of both the civil and spiritual law, and particularly for the extent of his erudition with respect to the precepts of the PROPHET, of which it is said that he could repeat above a million. His fame began to spread just at the time when the disputes ran highest concerning the nature of the KORAN, which some held to have existed from eternity, whilst others maintained it to be created. Unfortunately for IBN HANBAL, the Khalif MOTASIM was of the latter opinion, to which this doctor refusing to subscribe, he was imprisoned and severely scourged by the Khalif's order. For this hard usage, indeed, he afterwards received some satisfaction from MOOTWAKKIL, the son of MOTASIM, who, upon succeeding to the Khalifat, issued a decree of general toleration, leaving every person at liberty to judge for himself upon this point. This tolerant Khalif set the persecuted doctor at liberty, receiving him at his court with the most honourable marks of distinction, and offering him a compensatory present of 1,000 pieces of gold, which, however, he refused to accept. — After having attained the rank of a Mooktiddee† and Peishwa,‡ he retired from the world, and led a recluse life for several years. He died A.H. 241, A.C. 863, aged 77.—He obtained so high a reputation for sanctity, that his funeral was attended by a train of 800,000 men and 60,000 women; and it is asserted as a kind of miracle, that on the day of his decease no fewer than 20,000 Jews and Christians embraced the faith.—For about a century after his death, the sect of HANBAL were numerous and even powerful, and uniting to their zeal a large proportion of fanaticism, became at length so turbulent and troublesome as to require the strong arm of government to keep them in order.—Like most other fanatical sects, they dwindled away in process of time, and are now to be met with only in a few parts of Arabia. Although orthodox in their other tenets, there was one point on which they differed from the rest of the Mussulmans; for they asserted that God had actually set MOHAMMED upon his throne, and constituted him his substitute in the government of the universe; an assertion which was regarded with horror, as an impious blasphemy, and which brought them into great disrepute.—This, however, did not happen until many years after IBN HANBAL's decease, and is in no degree attributed to him. He published only two works of note, one entitled the Mosannid, which is said to contain above 30,000 traditions, selected from 750,000; and another, a collection of apothegms, or proverbs, containing many admirable precepts upon the government of the passions.—He had several eminent scholars, particularly ISMAEL BOKHAREE, and MOOSLIM IBN DAQOOD. His authority is but seldom quoted by any of the modern commentators on jurisprudence.

FROM the disciples and followers of these four great leaders have proceeded an immense number of commentaries at different times, some treating of the civil, some of canon, law; some comprehending the applications both of the KORAN and the SONNA, others confined solely to the former, and others, again, treating purely of the traditions; but all differing on a variety of points in their constructions, although coinciding in their general principles.

THE Mussulman courts of justice, when not actuated by any undue influence, in deciding upon causes consult, first the KORAN, then the traditions preserved in those collections, which are generally admitted to be authentic, and, next to those, the opinions of their most approved civilians. The two former lay down the principles, and the commentators give the application. Without these last, indeed, the presiding magistrates must be often at a loss, or must depend solely on their own judgment; as it is impossible, in the infinite variety of human affairs, that the text of the KORAN, or the traditional precepts of the Prophet, should extend to every particular case, or strictly suit all possible emergencies. Hence the necessity of Mooftees, whose particular office it is to expound the law and apply it to cases. The uncertainty of this science, in its judicial operation, is unhappily proverbial in all countries. In some, which enjoy the advantage of an established legislature, competent at all times to alter or amend, to make or to revoke laws, as the change of manners may require, or incidental occurrences render necessary, this uncertainty arises pretty much from the unavoidable mutability in the principles of decision.—Of the Mussulman code, on the contrary, the principles are fixed; and being intimately and inseparably blended with the religion of the people, must remain so, as long as they shall endure. Here, of course, the uncertainty is owing solely to the application of the principle, which will necessarily vary according to the different tenets or judgment of the expositors. In the Mussulman courts, therefore, the works of their great commentators are particularly necessary, both in order to give a surer stability to property, and also, that the magistrate may avail himself, in his decisions, of the collected wisdom of ages.

THE expositions of the Mussulman law are, in general, of three descriptions; the first termed Osool, treating of the fundamental principles of the law in matters both spiritual and temporal, as derived from the KORAN,—the second Sonnan, treating of the traditions, and of the rules and precepts of jurisprudence with respect to points not touched upon in the KORAN,—and the third Fatavec, consisting simply of a recital of decisions upon cases. Under these, and a variety of other appellations, some thousands of volumes have appeared at different times. Their authority is of weight according to the supposed merit of the work, or the rank and character of the author. Each, however, has its peculiar characteristic, being (generally speaking) confined to some one branch of jurisprudence, or receiving, in its conclusions, an unavoidable tinge from the particular tenets under the influence of which it was composed.

To attempt a distinct analysis of the various interpretations contained in the comments of even the orthodox writers, would require more time and labour than the translator has at present an opportunity of bestowing on it. He has indeed to lament that the short sketch here exhibited, of the grounds and principles of Mohammedan jurisprudence, is so inadequate to the usefulness and curiosity of the subject: but, diffident of his own abilities, and indifferently supplied with the materials which might enable him to do it justice, he thinks it better (for the present at least) to waive entering upon a task in which to fail would be less excusable than to be silent. Having therefore endeavoured, as far as the narrow bounds of a prefatory essay would admit, to explain, I. the foundations of the Mussulman law, II. the origin of those varieties which at present appear in the exposition of it, and III. the use of commentaries to direct the practice,—it is fit that he proceed to give some account of the HEDAYA,—an account, to which the preceding detail was necessary introduction.

AL HEDAYA literally signifies the guide. There are many Arabic works on philosophical and theological subjects which bear this name. The present, intitled HEDAYA FIL FOROO, or the guide in particular points,* was composed by Sheikh BURHAN-AD-DEEN ALEE, who was born at Marghinan, a city of Mavernalne'r (the ancient Transoxania), about A.H. 530 (A.C. 1152), and died A.H. 591. As a lawyer, his reputation was beyond that of all his contemporaries. He produced several works upon jurisprudence, which are all considered as of unquestionable authority.—According to the account which he himself gives us in his exordium, the HEDAYA is a Sharh or exposition of a work previously composed by him, intitled the Badayat al Moobtidda, an introduction to the study of the law, written for the use of his scholars, in a style exceedingly close and obscure, and which (it would appear) required an illustrative comment to enable them to comprehend it.—Of the Badayat al Moobtidda, the translator has not been able to procure any copy. It is, indeed, most probably no longer extant, as the present more perspicuous paraphrase superseded the necessity of the text, and rendered it unnecessary.

THE HEDAYA is an extract from a number of the most approved works of the early writers on jurisprudence, digested into something like the form of a regular treatise, although, in point of arrangement, it is rather desultory. It possesses the singular advantage of combining, with the authorities, the different opinions and explications of the principal commentators on all disputed points, together with the reasons for preferring any one adjudication in particular; by which means the principles of the law are fully disclosed, and we have not only the dictum, but also the most ample explanation of it. The author, being a Moojtahid, was himself qualified to pass decisions upon cases (whether real or supposed) which should operate as a precedent with others. He of consequence, in many instances, gives us merely his own opinion, without resorting to any other authority or precedent. In his comments he generally leans to the doctrine of Haneefa, or his principal disciples; and indeed his work may in a great measure be considered as an abstract of the Haneefite opinions, modified by those of the more recent teachers, and adapted to the practice and manners of other countries and of later times.

The persons whose opinions are chiefly quoted by him, besides the four great LEADERS already mentioned, are ABOO YOOSAF, MOHAMMED, and ZIFFER.

IMAM ABOO YOOSAF (also known by the appellation of YACOOB-BIN-IBRAHEEM), was born at Bagdad, A.H. 113. He studied under Haneefa, and was appointed to the office of Kazee of Bagdad by HADEE, the fourth of the Abbassian Khalifs. He was afterwards advanced, by the successor of HADEE, the famous HAROON AL RASHEED, to the dignity of Kazee al Kazat,* or supreme civil magistrate, being the first who ever filled that important station. To him was in a great measure owing the introduction of regular forms into the administration of justice. Before his time the appellations of Kazee and Mooftee were little used, or indiscriminately bestowed upon all whose knowledge or abilities enabled them to pronounce the law, or determine upon cases; all matters of dispute being decided among the Arabs in a summary way, by appeal to the chief of the tribe, or to the Imam of the city or district. At his recommendation courts of judicature were instituted for the sole purpose of hearing and determining causes, he himself presiding in the principal or supreme tribunal, which was established in the city of the Khalif, and to which all others were subordinate. A particular dress was also appointed for the doctors of the law, together with other insignia, calculated to add an exterior dignity and importance to the juridical profession. Though he differs, in a variety of his decisions, from his great master HANEEFA, yet he generally professed to be guided by his opinion, and brought his doctrines much into esteem in Irak and Persia.—He not only acquired a high degree of fame by his legal knowledge, but also employed it most successfully in the advancement of his temporal interest, amassing, in the space of a few years, a very considerable fortune.—He is reported to have been a person of great acuteness, ready wit, and prompt in expedients, of which a remarkable instance is recorded in the Negaristan, whereby he obtained, in one night, fees to the amount of 50,000 gold denars.* He died at Bagdad, A.H. 182.

IMAM ABOO ABDOOLA MOHAMMED BIN HOOSAIN al Sheibance (commonly called Imam MOHAMMED) was born at Wasit, a city of Arabian Irak, A.H. 132. He studied under HANEEFA, along with ABOO YOOSAF, and afterwards superintended an academy or college in Bagdad. He acquired much fame by his extensive and accurate knowledge of the traditions; and was deputed, by the Khalif HAROON AL RASHEED, to superintend the administration of justice in the province of Khorasan. He was not more eager in his thirst after knowledge than liberal in the encouragement and support of it, having spent a large patrimonial fortune in the pursuit of science, and in rewards to its professors.—He spent three years of his youth under the tuition of MALIK; and to the tincture he received from that doctor it is perhaps owing that he not only frequently dissents from the opinions of his chief preceptor HANEEFA, but also, in some instances, from those of his fellow pupil ABOO YOOSAF.—Shafei, in his Osool, mentions him with much respect.—He died at Rai, the capital of Khorasan (where his monument is still to be seen), A.H. 179.

The value of the Deenar is so very indefinite (being estimated, in different countries, at various rates, from 7s. to 9s. 6d.), that it is impossible to state the sterling amount of the sum here mentioned with precision.—It is from £18,000 to £25,000.

ABOO al HAZL ZIFFER BIN HAZL was a contemporary and intimate companion of HANEefa, and one of the most austere persons of that sect.—We have not been able to collect any other particulars concerning the character of this doctor, further than the remarkable retention of his memory, which particularly qualified him for excelling in traditional knowledge. He was appointed chief judge and governor of Basra, at which place he died, A.H. 158.

THE books principally cited in the Hedaya, are the Mabsoot, the Jama Sagheer, the Jama Kabeer, the Zeeadat, the Nawadir, and the commentary of Kadooree. The Mabsoot or Amplified Digest (which is also, by way of pre-eminence, entitled the Asl, or root) was composed by ABOO' L' HASN ALI BIN MOHAMMED, who is entitled Fakhral-al-Islam, or the glory of the faith, and surnamed Bezdavce, from the place of his birth, Bezda, a fort in Maveradne.—This great work was published about A. H. 460, and was entitled, by its author, a Mabsoot, or Amplified Digest, because of its being written in rather a diffusive style, the term literally meaning spread out. It consists of eleven volumes, and comprehends a complete course of theology and practical divinity, treated according to the principles of the Haneefite school, of which the author professed himself a follower.—The Jama Kabeer, or great compilation, is a collection of traditions on the most approved authorities (whence this work is also termed Jama Saheeh, or the approved compilation), composed by YEESOO MOHAMMED BIN YESOO al Termazi, about A. H. 260. It is related that the author, before publication, sent copies of his work to all the principal professors in Arabia and Persia, each of whom expressed his approbation of it in the highest terms. Many other works have been written on the same subject, and under the same title; but this is considered as the most authentic. The Jama Sagheer, or small compilation, is also a work upon the same subject, on a more minute scale. The author uncertain.—The Zeeadat, or, as it is more fully entitled, Zeeadat fil fooo al HANEefa, meaning, Addenda concerning the branches of HANEefa, is a copious treatise upon legal conclusions, as taught by that doctor, said to be composed by Imam MOHAMMED, under the inspection and with the approbation of his master. This treatise is highly esteemed; and many commentaries have been written upon it, in Turkey, Africa, Arabia, Persia, and India.—These four works are frequently cited, by the compiler of the HEDAYA, under the comprehensive term of Zahir al Rawayet, or The letter of Reports; * and his book consists chiefly of a compendious extract from these. The Nawadir, or curiosities, is a title bestowed upon a digest of four other compilations of traditions and law reports. These compilations are not supposed to be possessed of the same authority with the Zahir al Rawayet, and are therefore, by the commentators, distinguished under the head of Ghair Zahir al Rawayet.† —The commentary of Kadooree (which is sometimes simply termed Kadooree) takes its title from the patronymic appellation of the author, AHMED BIN MOHAMMED KADOOREE. It is a commentary upon a previous work of ABOO YOOSAF, entitled Adab al Kazee, or duties of a magistrate, and is considered as of high authority by the sect of HANEefa. —It was published about A. H. 420; the place of its publication uncertain.

A NUMBER of other authorities are quoted in the course of this work. Of several the translator has not been able to procure any authentic account:—but, for the satisfaction of the reader, the following short abstract is given concerning those which appear most worthy of notice.

AMONG the personal authorities cited, we find the names of the four first Khalifs, and also several of the Sahaba, or original companions of the Prophet. Of these last, the most esteemed are ABDOOLA IBN ABBAS, and ABDOOLA IBN MASAOD.—ABDOOLA IBN ABBAS was the cousin-german of ALEE, and his principal friend and confidant during the struggle between him and MOAVIAH for the Khalifat. He died A. H. 65.—ABDOOLA IBN MASAOD, also known by the name ABOO ABDULRIHMAN ABDOOLA al Hazlee, joined the Prophet almost at the commencement of his pretended mission; led his disciples, in their retreat to Ethiopia, upon the persecution of the KOREISH; and afterwards repaired to him at Medina. He died A. H. 44, entitled, for his eminent knowledge of the KORAN, and the precepts of the Prophet, Taj-al-Shirra, or the diadem of the law.—HASSAN, surnamed Bakhtaree, was an eminent teacher of the law. He was a native of Khorasan, whence he takes his appellation, Bakhter being the name anciently bestowed on that region, because of its relative situation, as it signifies the east,—whence the ancients termed the same territory Bactriana.—IBN AL KHASAF, surnamed Abou Bekr Ahmed, was an eminent adherent to the sect of HANEEFA; and wrote a treatise under the same title as that of Abou Yoosaf, already mentioned, and upon the same subject (the duties of a magistrate), in which all the doctrines of his leader are exemplified and supported by argument.—ABOU JAFIR Hindooanee takes his appellation from the place of his birth, Hindooan, a quarter or ward of the city of Balkh, the capital of Khorasan. He attained to such eminence in the law, as to be appointed to the dignity of supreme Mooftee throughout all the region of Maveralneh'r (Transoxania); and by his superior excellence acquired the title of Haneefa Sanee, or HANEEFA the second.—He died at Bokhara, A. H. 362; and it is said that, on the day of his decease, a multitude of Jews and idolators were converted to the faith, by beholding his piety and abstinence, and the fortitude with which he met his dissolution.—ABOU MOHAMMED AL KASIM (commonly called Abou Hareera) derives his appellation, Hareera, from the place of his residence, Herat, a city of Persia.—He was born at Basra (whence he is also by some termed al Basreea), A. H. 446. He composed, at the instance of Abou SHERWAN KHALID, the Vizir of the Seljuician Sultan MAHMOOD, a work entitled Makamat (occasionally mentioned in this commentary), consisting of fifty discourses on various subjects of law and morals. He died A. H. 515.—His authority has great weight in all legal discussions.—The doctor mentioned under the title of Tehavee is ABOU FAKA, Kazee of Taha, a town in Upper Egypt.—ABDOOLA BIN MOBARICK (commonly styled Ibn al Mo-barick) was a person of eminent piety, who died at Heet, a city of Irak (Chaldea), where his tomb still continues to be visited by the devout, as the Mausoleum of a saint.—TAMEEM BIN TIRFA was one of the Sahaba, or companions of the Prophet, of whom many fabulous miracles are recorded.

AMONG the books quoted, besides what have been already mentioned, are the following—

THE Rawayet Saheeh, or indubitable reports; a title bestowed upon two different treatises on the Sonna; the first, by ABOU ABDOOLA MOHAMMED BIN ISMAEL al Joosi, on which a number of comments have been written at different times; and the second, by ZAK-AD-DEEN al MANDREE. They are both considered as of good authority.—The Rawayet Mash'hoor (celebrated reports), Hadees Mash'hoor (celebrated traditions), Nakl Saheeh (true relations), and Moon-takkee (selections), are also approved works by different uncertain authors on the same subject. The Amalec (miscellany) is a general commentary upon the law, attributed, by some, to MOHAMMED BIN MOSLEM al Zohari, who is said to have been the first compiler of traditions, and the preceptor of Imam MALIK BIN ANS, the head of the second orthodox sect, already mentioned.—The Fatavee SHAFEE, Fatavee KAZEE KHAN, Fatavee TIMOOR-TASHEE, and Fatavee Imam SIRRUCKHISH, are all collections of the decisions passed by the persons whose names they bear, or upon their authority, and have been compiled with a view to serve as precedents in practice. SHAFEE has already been mentioned as the head of the third orthodox sect. KAZEE KHAN was the distinguishing appellation of FAKHR-AD-DEEN HASAN, BIN MANSOOR, a native of Arnoos (Albania), who for some years superintended the administration of justice in Damascus, and afterwards at Isfahan. He died A. H. 592.—Of the other two nothing particular is recorded. They were probably magistrates in some part of Persia.

FROM a consideration of the nature of this work, and of the authorities principally quoted in it, we proceed to notice certain peculiarities which will occur in the perusal of it, and an explanation of which is requisite to the elucidation of what might otherwise appear unintelligible or obscure.

ALL laws must derive the prominent features of their character from the peculiar manners, customs, and language, of the people among whom they have originated.—In order, therefore, to enter fully into the spirit of the text, it is requisite that we keep in mind the state of society in Arabia at the time when MOHAMMED and his companions began to introduce something like a system of jurisprudence among the followers and subjects of Islam. To enter into this particularly would be much beyond the translators design, and would occupy more room than a mere preface can admit of. It is sufficient for our purpose to remark, that the Arabians were divided into two classes or descriptions of men, the inhabitants of cities, and the Bidweens, or wanderers in the desert. The former pursued commerce and husbandry; whilst the latter (that is, the great body of the nation), followed the usual occupations of the pastoral life, occasionally made inroads upon their more wealthy neighbours, attacked the caravan, and plundered the traveller.—In this general outline, time has produced but little alteration.—Subdued by the arms, or allured by the promises, of the PROPHET, the tribes of the desert united their forces, and, issuing from their native wilds, over-run the neighbouring nations with an impetuosity of valour which nothing could resist, and with an uninterrupted uniformity of success to which history opposes no parallel. This, however, was only an extraordinary convulsion, proceeding from the coincidence of accidental causes, placing them in a situation which subsequent events have evinced was by no means natural. As the first impressions of fanatic zeal abated, they recovered from their dream of universal conquest; and, after having altered the religion of a large portion of mankind, overturned the most powerful monarchies, and established various royal dynasties in the surrounding countries, succeeding revolutions gave back the Bidweens to their original independence and their original solitude. In the meanwhile, the exclusion of strangers or unbelievers from their principal cities in a great measure prevented the more polished from mixing with the rest of mankind, from being contaminated with their vices, or improved by their example. Hence, except in the single article of religious belief, the Arabs perhaps differ little at this day from what they were two thousand years ago, and indeed present to us almost the same picture in point of genius; temper, and manners, as in the time of the Jewish patriarchs.

WHEN MOHAMMED assumed the prophetic character, he found his countrymen, in general, slaves to the most gross and stupid idolatry. The paganism of the Sabians had over-run almost the whole nation.—From Persia the eastern tribes had caught much of the superstition of the Magians.—There were, indeed, numbers of Jews and Christians. The former had several considerable establishments; and many whole tribes had embraced the Mosaic creed or the Gospel.

But their conduct and principles little deserved the titles they assumed. The Jews paid more regard to the fabulous traditions of their Rabbins than to the severe and unaccommodating precepts of the Pentateuch; and the eastern churches were divided and convulsed by scholastic disputes, in which, instead of the mild and forbearing spirit of Christianity, nothing but mutual rancour, malice, and uncharitableness, prevailed; whilst the pure and simple worship inculcated by its divine Author had degenerated into mere outward show, expressive only of a debasing and idolatrous superstition.—Among the pagan Arabs, the nice distinctions of property were imperfectly understood. Each tribe was governed by its own law; and disputed causes were either referred to the determination of the chief, or (more frequently) decided by an appeal to the sword. Their only lasting memorials were the effusions of their poets, transmitted orally from age to age, which served to preserve ancient usages, or to keep alive the feuds of contending neighbours. Private revenge was not merely tolerated, but encouraged, and the justice and necessity of it inculcated. Hence every dissension was the occasion either of single combat or of civil war; and tradition furnishes us with accounts of above 1,500 battles fought before the introduction of the faith.—The art of writing was little known, and the practice of it confined chiefly to the Jews and Christians. These were distinguished by the common appellation of KITABEES (scripturists), or AHL al KITAB (people of the book), because of each having received a written revelation from heaven.—The accomplishment principally esteemed among the Arabs was expertness at weapons and in horsemanship. The sciences mostly studied were, genealogy, astronomy, and rhetoric. The first of these was carefully employed in preserving the purity of their descent; the second was applied chiefly to astrological purposes; and the third they exercised in the composition of love songs and elegies, or poetic fictions concerning the exploits of their chiefs, the relation of which cheered the aged, and animated the young. Their great virtues were, hospitality, temperance, and munificence, which last was frequently carried to an unwarrantable and (perhaps) ostentatious excess, to the prejudice of their children and kindred.—Their most odious vices were a disposition to war and rapine, and an unappeasable vindictiveness of spirit. Their seclusion from the rest of mankind taught them to consider every strange nation in a hostile light; and the term Hirbee expressed, at once, an alien and an enemy.

This short and imperfect sketch will serve to familiarize or explain to us a number of extraordinary passages in the following treatise. In fact, without some such reference, several of the examples adduced in the course of it must appear unnatural or improbable, and the arguments upon them frivolous or absurd. In too many instances they certainly are so; the Mussulman lawyers being as much addicted to verbose sophistry as any of their Christian brethren. But a due regard to local circumstances will teach us to consider, that numbers of the cases here cited in elucidation of particular points of law, although they may seem to a European to be such as can seldom or never really happen, would yet appear, to a Mussulman, to contain no more than a necessary provision with respect to cases of frequent or probable occurrence. Many of them, indeed, seem to be proposed merely as exercises for the exertion of mental acumen, and the display of subtle distinctions; and as such they are perhaps not without their use. With respect to the argumentative part in particular, although abounding in futile sophistry, still it possesses the advantage of leading to a full development of the principles. It moreover places subjects in every possible light, familiarizes us to the modes of reasoning in use among the Mussulman professors (a matter of some literary curiosity), and frequently involves material points of law, not to be found under the heads to which they properly relate.*

THE first singularity likely to strike the European reader, on casting his eye over those laws, is the great proportion of them which relates to slaves, the discussions concerning whom occupy nearly a third of the whole work.† To account for this, it is proper to remark that, among the first votaries of Islam, whose ideas of luxury extended not beyond the plain simplicity of the pastoral life, the articles of property were few, and confined, for the most part, to slaves and domestic animals. The former generally constituted their chief substance; and the bodies of bondmen have in those countries formed, from the earliest ages, a principal commodity of traffic.—The Arabs, like most other barbarous nations, had ever been in the practice of retaining as slaves all the captives taken in war, whose lives were spared by avarice or policy. The children of those captives partook of the condition of their parents. The fanatic fury of the Sahaba (companions), under the prophetic banner, in the beginning of their career, spared neither age, sex, or condition; but, when the first ebullitions of zeal subsided, their prisoners were reserved as a valuable part of plunder.—Every new conquest poured into Arabia a fresh accession of captives; and those formed, in time, not only a great part of the wealth of individuals, but also a principal proportion of the community. Hence the considerable space which the laws concerning SLAVES occupy.—In numberless instances, however, the cases and examples cited with respect to them are not exclusively restrictive to SLAVES, but may be considered in the light of so many legal paradigms equally applicable, in their construction, to any other articles of commerce or exchange.

THUS far the translator deemed it requisite to premise of the work in general.—He is now arrived at a less agreeable part of his present duty, since indispensably productive of a degree of egotism,—it being necessary to add a few pages concerning the Persian version of the HEDAYA, and the English translation of that version.

WHEN the attention of the British government in BENGAL was first directed to the necessity and importance of procuring some authentic guide for aiding them in their superintendence over the native judicature (founded on the reasons we have already stated), they discovered, in the books recommended to forward this end, a system copious without precision, indecisive as a criterion (because each author differed from or contradicted another), and too voluminous for the attainment of ordinary study.—From these a compendium might indeed have been abstracted; but, being a mere compilation, it would have been considered rather as a new code than as a revision of the old, and would not in the idea of those upon whom it was intended to operate, have borne the authority of an original work.‡ Numbers of Fatawees were indeed at hand, and the translation of one composed in the Persian language, by the authority and under the inspection of the Mogul Emperor AURUNGEERE (from him denominated Fattawee Allumgheeree), was actually undertaken. It was, however, soon discovered that this, consisting of a simple detail of cases and decisions, would do little or nothing towards developing the principles of the Mussulman laws, and of course could afford but a very limited portion of instruction with respect to them. Some learned Mohammedans, who were consulted on this occasion, thought it, moreover, unfair that their British rulers should receive their first impression of the Mussulman legislation from a bare recital of examples, such as composed the Fattawee Allumgheerec. They therefore advised that, previous to any further step, a translation should be executed of some work which, by comprehending, in the same page, the dictum and the principles, might serve at once as an exemplar and an instructor; and for this purpose they recommended the HEDAYA, because of its being regarded (particularly throughout Hindostan) as of canonical authority, and uniting, in an eminent degree, all the qualities required. But as the Arabic, in which this treatise was written, is known only among the learned, and the idiom of the Author is particularly close and obscure, they at the same time proposed that, under the inspection of some of their most intelligent doctors, a complete version should be formed, in the Persian language, which would answer the double purpose of clearing up the ambiguities of the text, and (by being introduced into practice) of furnishing the native judges of the courts with a more familiar guide, and a more instructive preceptor, than books written in a language of which few of them have opportunities of attaining a competent knowledge.—In conformity with this advice, four of the principal and most learned Molovees (Mohammedan lawyers) were engaged to translate the whole from the Arabic into the Persian idiom.—The translation of this version into English was at first committed to Mr. JAMES ANDERSON, a gentleman whose eminent literary qualifications for accomplishing such an undertaking could only be excelled by the solidity of his understanding, and the goodness of his heart. Before he had made any considerable progress, the present translator had the honour of being associated with him in the work; and Mr. ANDERSON being shortly after engaged in an important foreign employment, the duties of which necessarily occupied the whole of his attention, the completion of it devolved entirely on his colleague, who, in consequence, took upon him the sole management and responsibility.

WHEN the English translator came to examine his text, and compare it with the original Arabic, he found that, except a number of elucidatory interpolations, and much unavoidable amplification of style, it in general exhibited a faithful copy, deviating from the sense in but a very few instances, in some of which the difference may perhaps be justly attributed to the inaccuracy of transcribers;* and in one particular it is avowed and justified by the Molovees, because of an alleged error of the author.†—Many of the interpolations are indeed superfluous, and they sometimes exceed, both in length and frequency, what could be wished. They, however, possess the advantage of completely explaining the text, from which every reader may for the most part with ease discriminate them, since they almost uniformly consist of illustrative expositions of passages, beginning with, “that is,”—“in other words,”—and so forth; and where the composers of the Persian version have, in any considerable degree, deviated from their original, the English translator has remarked upon it, and has, in several such instances, subjoined a verbatim translation from the Arabic, in order to point the difference with the greater precision. One deviation, indeed, in point of form rather than of substance, he has not thought it necessary to notice, as it runs regularly through all the work, and he therefore conceived that a single prefatory explanation of it would suffice for the whole.—In the OBJECTIONS and REPLIES, which so frequently occur, the Molovees have observed an arrangement somewhat varying from the original, and which they probably adopted for the sake of greater perspicuity. The Arabic text does not state the passages, thus rendered, with the same degree of distinctive precision; but preserving, in those instances, that brevity which is its peculiar characteristic, introduces the matter of them in a way certainly calculated to give less interruption to the general context;—the reasoner upon any disputed point saying (still pursuing his argument), “It may indeed be objected,” &c.—“But to this we reply,” &c.—an additional observation, brought forward solely with a view to the more complete illustration of the subject, and which the Molovees employed upon the Persian version have reduced to the form of an abstract QUESTION and ANSWER.—Another unnoticed deviation is, that where the author speaks in his own person, he is, in the Persian version, generally mentioned by the style of “the compiler of the HEDAYA,”—as thus, “The compiler of the Hedaya remarks,” &c. The only remaining difference between the Arabic text and the Persian version of it, worthy of notice, is, that in the latter we have a particular definition of terms, a point in which the original is totally defective, but which is doubtless indispensably requisite to persons not conversant in the Arabic tongue;—and they may, perhaps, be moreover considered as affording a valuable addition to Oriental lexicographic knowledge, as they give not only the meaning of the term, but also its etymology, and particular application in the language of the Law.

To the mode of execution the translator is perfectly aware that one objection is likely to occur, which at first may appear of some weight. It may doubtless be urged that, instead of having recourse to an intermediate version, the translation should have been made at once from the Arabic, by which means the work would have presented a more close and accurate picture of the original.—Had the translator been at liberty to pursue this plan, much labour would indeed have been saved him! Some reasons are, however, to be assigned, which, when duly considered, will perhaps be found to give an indisputable preference to the mode that has been adopted. I. As the Persian version was designed for the use and instruction not merely of the English scholar, but also of the native magistrate, and was therefore likely to be introduced into practice, it was indispensably requisite that the English translation should be taken from it rather than from the Arabic, in order to preserve an exact and literal uniformity between the two standards of judicial determination. II. The Arabic is remarkably close in its idiom, and, in treating of every abstracted subject, brief in its construction to a degree which, in any other language, would be considered as involving the matter treated of in the darkest and most perplexing obscurity. This is evident in the continual ellipsis of terms, and a consequent repetition of relatives (many frequently occurring in the same period), which are referable to their proper antecedents only by certain rules of context peculiarly appropriated to that language. Hence a literal translation from the Arabic would have left the sense, in many places, as completely unintelligible to the English reader as the original itself.—In following the Persian version, therefore (if we except the interpolations already mentioned and accounted for), the translator has done little more than what he must have done, at any rate, to render himself understood,—namely, given the sense in a fuller and more explicit manner than the original author,—but without in any degree departing from or altering the tenor of the text. III. The persons employed in the composition of the Persian version were themselves possessed of deep legal knowledge, qualified, both by their academical rank and judicial stations, to pass decrees, and perhaps as well versed in the Mussulman institutes as their author. Hence their interpolations proceed from an authority perfectly competent, and being (as in many instances they certainly are) of essential utility, must be considered as a valuable addition to the text. These interpolations are, in fact, nothing more than explanatory remarks, inserted in the body of the work, instead of being subjoined in the form of notes.—Had the translator conceived himself at liberty to use his own unlimited discretion in the manner of his performance, he could perhaps have adopted this mode, as being more agreeable to the literary fashions of his own country, in all except original compositions. But this is a plan seldom adopted by Oriental writers; and the translator had a particular duty prescribed to him, which (except in some very particular cases) he considered himself bound implicitly to fulfil; for it was his business to give the Persian version of the HEDAYA an English dress both in order and in substance, since otherwise it would have been impossible to preserve the exact uniformity necessary to authenticate the English text in cases of future reference or appeal.

HAVING hazarded thus much in justification of the general plan, it will be proper to point out such particulars in the translation as it is essential to explain, for the information of the European reader.

It is well known that in every language there are certain peculiarities of idiom which do not admit of a very intelligible literal translation into any other.—In every science also (and more, perhaps, in legal disquisitions than in any other) there are certain peculiarities of phraseology concordant with the ideas, moral, religious, or political, of those who use them, and also certain allusions, connected with those ideas, or referring to them, which require some illustration in order to their being fully understood by persons not familiarized to the same habits of thinking, or to similar modes of expression.

THE first of these which strikes the reader (and which occurs very frequently) is “a favourable construction” (of the law, or the case), as opposed to “analogy.” The original term istihsan, which the translator has rendered “a favourable construction,” literally means benevolence; and the expression referred to, as it stands in the original, signifies “on the ground of BENEVOLENCE,”—that is, by a mode of arguing, in its conclusion more favourable, either to the individual or the community at large, than could be adduced by reasoning according to the stricter principles of analogy and legal casuistry. It is observable, in the course of the work, that this species of reasoning is frequently adopted by HANEEDA, or his disciples, in opposition to the rigid tenets of the Shafeite school. And this difference proceeds from the more liberal complexion of that doctor’s practical divinity, which distinguishes him from the heads of the other orthodox sects, as has been already stated.

IN a work of this nature, an exact uniformity in the translation of technical terms and phrases is not only advisable, but, in general, indispensably requisite. It has, however, sometimes unavoidably happened that a term is differently rendered in different places,—not indeed with respect to the sense, but with regard to the English term used to express it in. Thus Mazoon (for instance), which is commonly rendered “licensed slave,” is also, in some places, translated “privileged slave,” a phrase which equally well expresses the sense of the original term.—Wherever this occurs, a reference is made (for the sake of uniformity) made, in the Index, to that term which the translator intends should be considered as the technical one.

WITH respect to any remaining peculiarities, technical or idiomatical, not noticed in this place, as they are all fully defined in one part or other of the work, an explanation of them is easily obtained by consulting the INDEX.

It were to be wished that, in a performance designed for the use and information of European readers, correspondent English expressions could have been found for all the various technical terms contained in it. It must doubtless be irksome to meet frequently with words which a reader unlearned in the Arabic language finds it difficult to pronounce, and for the meaning of which he is under a necessity of referring to the INDEX, and back from that to the body of the work. This, however, is a difficulty which could not in all cases be remedied. Where the customs of different countries are at all analogous, the language of each will of course contain synonymous terms for expressing the same ideas. Where, on the contrary, customs, laws, or modes of thinking, prevail in one country totally different from any thing to be found in the other, no modes of expression that could be adopted in the language of either would suffice to express, with precision, the meaning of technical or local terms used in the other. This science, moreover, has in every country its peculiar phrases, which will not bear any very intelligible translation, whence the necessity of adopting and retaining them in their original form,—an observation the truth of which may be perceived by casting an eye over any one page in any one of our own law-books. The translator, therefore, has found himself under an unavoidable necessity of occasionally retaining the original terms, without attempting any translation of them,—taking care, at the same time, to refer, in the INDEX, to the definition of them, which is invariably to be found in some part of the work;—making it, however, a general rule to express in English every term capable of a technical or intelligible translation.—It is proper to remark that, in the orthography of these Arabic terms, there sometimes occurs a slight variation, which in a work of such extent it was not easy always to avoid. Thus, instead of Talha (a man's name), we have, in one place, Tellaha; and, in five or six instances, Deeyat is used for Deyit (the fine of blood). Wherever this variation occurs, it is rectified by a reference in the INDEX;—but there are not above three or four instances in which this is necessary. It is also to be observed that, in the use of the Arabic personal nouns, attention must be paid to the termination, which in a always denotes the feminine gender. Thus Hirbee means an alien, Hir-beea an alien woman; Zimnee an infidel subject of the Mussulman government, and Zimneea a female infidel subject; and so of the rest, except Musslima (a female Moham-medan), which is derived from Moslim (a confider, or a person in a state of salvation), a term generally qualified by the characteristic termination in an,—whence Mosliman, or (according to the vulgar orthography) Mussulman.

As a GLOSSARY, if confined within any tolerable limits, would very imperfectly express the meaning of the various law-terms and phrases, or, if giving the definition of them, would contain merely a repetition of what is already set forth in the body of the work, the translator has in this instance hazarded a new mode, by introducing all those terms in a supplementary Index, with a reference to their place in the text. He has also, for the satisfaction of the Orientalist, and in order to remedy the defects of the European alphabet (which, at best, expresses Arabic words but very imperfectly), inserted, in that Index, each term or proper name in its original character.

To promote, as much as possible, the beneficial ends intended by this work, the translator has in various places added such notes as appeared necessary to clear away ambiguities and obscurities in the text; and he has also annexed a marginal abstract, which gives the substance of the law, unencumbered by the long details of reasoning which generally accompany it.—To the whole is affixed a copious INDEX, designed to be useful in three respects, by referring, I. to legal conclusions, II. to the general HEADS or SUBJECTS, and, III. to rules which occur (as it were) incidentally, involved in the reasonings upon other matter.—As each volume has also prefixed to it a table of contents, the references are so much broken and divided, that the reader can never be at a loss to satisfy himself upon any particular point which duty or curiosity may prompt him to investigate.—It may be proper to remark that the marginal abstract, the notes at bottom, and the Index,* form no part of the original work, which has only a general table of contents.

In one particular, and in one alone, has the translator conceived himself at liberty to desert his text; namely, by a total omission of particular passages, for reasons which are assigned in their proper place. These reasons generally are, either that the passage relates solely to certain rules of Arabic grammar, which therefore do not admit of an intelligible translation into another language, or contains merely ingenious sophisms, so exceedingly futile as to be of no use.—Of this last reason abundance of examples are still retained!—It will, however, in most of these be found that, amidst the frivolity of the argument, some useful illustration is involved: nor is the translator conscious of having omitted any thing, the retaining of which could, either directly or incidentally, have been attended with advantage.

ANOTHER and more considerable omission it is proper he should account for.

As the HEDAYA includes a complete system of Mussulman jurisprudence, it commences with the Abadat or spiritual law, including the five great religious duties of purification, prayer, alms, fasting, and pilgrimage.—Of these the book of ALMS (Zakat) only is retained by the translator, as the others are neither very curious in their nature, nor could afford any manner of assistance in decisions concerning matters of property; and would have burthened the work with an additional and totally useless volume.—This omission has not occasioned any alteration in the consecutive arrangement of the books; but it has necessarily induced a difference in the distribution, among the four volumes, of those which are retained.—In the original the subjects are distributed as follows:—

VOL. I. Purification; Prayer; Alms; Fasting; Pilgrimage.

VOL. II. Marriage; Fosterage; Divorce; Manumission; Vows; Punishments; Larceny; The Institutes; Foundlings; Troves; Fugitive Slaves; Missing Persons; Partnership; Appropriations.

VOL. III. Sale; SURE Sale; Bail; Transfer of Debts; Duties of the KAZEE; Evidence; Retraction of Evidence; Agency.

* The Index of this edition is new.—ED.

Claims; Acknowledgments; Compositions; Mozaribat; Deposits; Loans; Gifts Hire; Mokatibs; Willa; Compulsion; Inhibition; Licensed Slaves; Usurpation.

VOL. IV. Shaffa; Partition; Compacts of Cultivation; Compacts of Gardening; Zab-bah; Sacrifices; Abominations; Cultivation of Waste Lands; Prohibited Liquors; Hunting; Pawns; Offences against the Person; Fines; Levying of Fines; Wills; Hermaphrodites.

If the reader is not already tired with this introductory detail, the translator would request his indulgence while he adds a short account, apparently necessary, of the books which have been omitted, as well as a few remarks on the others in their order as they occur.

PURIFICATION is considered as essential to devotion, and the key of prayer, which without it is of no effect.—It is of two descriptions, the Ghossil, or complete ablution of the whole body, and the Wazoo, or washing of the hands and feet, after a manner particularly prescribed. The first chapter treats of the occasions for purification, the accidents by which it may be broken or interrupted, and the manner in which it is to be performed. The second relates to the waters fit for ablution.—The third treats of the teyummim, or substitution, in cases of drought, of dust or fine sand for water; a regulation well calculated for the thirsty deserts of Arabia! * In directing this, MOHAMMED followed the example of the Jews, who were accustomed to perform their lustration after this method, in cases of necessity.—The fourth chapter relates to the anointing of boots, or other leathern apparel or utensils, in which certain rules are laid down for the observance of cleanliness.—The fifth regards women, the rules to be observed by them in their menstruations, and the modes of purification requisite after those, or childbed labour, to qualify them for acts of devotion.—The sixth treats of the purifications enjoined after performing any of the natural evacuations.

PRAYER is declared to be the corner-stone of RELIGION, and the pillar of FAITH. It is not, by the Mussulman doctors, considered as a thing of mere form, but requires that the heart and understanding should accompany it, without which it is pronounced to be of no avail.—The prescribed prayers are directed to be performed at five different times in the twenty-four hours. I. between day-break and sun-rise; II. immediately after noon; III. immediately before sunset; IV. in the evening, before dark; and, V. before the first watch of the night. At these hours, therefore, the Mawzins or criers warn the people, from the minarets of the mosques, to prepare for prayer, and all devout persons forthwith either repair to the mosque, or proceed to perform their devotionable exercises in some other convenient spot, after the previous lustration.—The first chapter of this book treats of the proper hours for prayer, whether prescribed or voluntary, prohibiting, at the same time, the repetition of any during the rising or setting of the sun, or at the hour of his passing the meridian.—The second chapter concerns the duty of the public criers, and the manner in which they are to summon people to worship.—The third relates to the conditions of prayer,—that is, those points which are regarded as essentially requisite to its efficacy;—which are as follows. I. that the person be free from every species of defilement: II. that all sumptuous apparel be previously laid aside, at the same time that the body be so far covered as to avoid any offence to decency,—unless, however, the person be destitute of clothing, in which case this is dispensed with: III. that the attention accompany the act, and be not suffered to wander to any other object, inso-much that if the person, whilst praying, cast his eyes upon a book so as to recollect the contents, his prayer is of no effect: IV. that the prayer be performed with the face towards the Kabla, or temple of MECCA, the relative situation of which is for that reason pointed out in all their mosques by the position of the Niche for the Imam, which is termed the Mehrab. Where, however, the relative situation of the Kabla is uncertain or unknown, the person who prays is only required to observe this ceremony to the best of his knowledge or recollection.—The fourth chapter relates to the nature and description of the prayers, prescribing the forms proper to use on each particular occasion, and the portions of the KORAN which it is proper to read each day.—The passage most worthy of notice in this chapter is, that men are allowed to repeat the prayers, or to read the allotted portions of the KORAN, in every other language as well as the Arabic; “for” (as Haneefa well argues) “the difference of language makes no alteration in the sense; and it is not possible that the heart should join in what the understanding does not comprehend."—The fifth chapter contains the qualifications necessary to the office of a priest, and the particular duties attached to that station.—The persons held incapable of exercising this function are slaves, reprobates, the blind, the Bidweens (people of the desert), and bastards. These last are deemed unfit, because of the baseness of their birth giving room for discontent to some who might suppose themselves dishonoured by attending them in public.—This head likewise comprehends all the directions for public worship, in which certain precautions are laid down against the women mixing with the men, each sex having a particular station allotted, for the sake of decency, and also to avoid any excitement to passion.—The sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth, chapters contain merely matters of form, precaution, and so forth.—The thirteenth chapter prescribes the prayer proper to the sick, and the various forms of lustration, &c., which may be dispensed with on account of their indisposition.—The fourteenth chapter relates to the prostrations: the fifteenth contains the rules to be observed by those who travel: the sixteenth the prayers proper to Friday [the Mussulman sabbath]: the seventeenth and eighteenth those for particular fasts and festivals: the nineteenth those for rain.—The twentieth chapter prescribes the manner of performing prayer when surrounded by an enemy,—in which case the Imam is directed to divide his troops into two bodies, one to oppose the foe whilst the other prays, and thus to relieve each other successively.—The twenty-first chapter contains the prayers for the DEAD, with the various forms of ablution, enshrouding, and interment.—The twenty-second relates to the same, with respect to those who are slain in battle.—The twenty-third regards the prayers proper for pilgrims who visit the inside of the temple of MECCA.

FASTING is an essential part of piety, and termed, by the orthodox, the gate of religion. It is of two kinds, voluntary and incumbent; and is distinguished, by the Mussulman divines, into three degrees: I. the refraining from every kind of nourishment or carnal indulgence: II. the restraining of the various members from any thing which might excite sinful or corrupt desires: III. the abstracting the mind wholly from worldly cares, and fixing it exclusively upon God,—which, as it is the most difficult observance, is also accounted the most meritorious.—The great prescribed fast is that enjoined from the first new moon, in the month of Ramzan, until the appearance of next,—during which it is required, from day-break until after sun-set of each day, to abstain from every sort of nourishment, insomuch that the fast is broken by suffering any thing whatever to enter any part of the body. From this observance none are excused except the sick, aged, or children; and the first of these, if they recover, are required to make up for what they have lost, by fasting an equal number of days after their health is perfectly restored.—Any breach of this duty must moreover be expiated by a donation of alms to the poor.—The Nisl, or voluntary fasts, are those not enjoined by the LAW, but which a man imposes on himself on some particular occasions, such as in expiation of a broken vow, that species of abuse to a wife termed Zihar, the breach of the fast during the moon of Ramzan, or any other irregularity.—The first chapter of this book contains regulations with respect to the commencement and observance of the fast of Ramzan.—The second relates to the occasions of expiatory fasts.—The third treats of the Ittikaf, or continual residence in the mosque during the time of a fast.

THE PILGRIMAGE to Mecca is considered as such an essential point of religious duty, that no person is accounted a good Mussulman who, possessing the ability, neglects the performance of it, at least once in his lifetime.—The antiquity of the Kaba, or holy temple of Mecca, extends far beyond the records of history, it having been used by the Arabs as a place of idolatrous worship for centuries before MOHAMMED's pretended mission.—He, who in an eminent degree possessed the capacity of converting the superstitions of others to his own ends, finding it necessary to give his religion some stationary habitation, at first fixed upon the site of the temple of Solomon at Jerusalem; and he, for a time, made that his Kaba, or point towards which he directed his prayers. Motives of prudence or policy, however, in a few months dictated the necessity or convenience of preferring a place held in habitual reverence among his own countrymen; and reasons were easily found or invented to justify the change.—The traditions of the Arabs represent the Kaba as a place of worship almost coeval with the world. Some accounts mention that it was first built by Adam, soon after his expulsion from paradise.—Other accounts say, that the father of mankind, being by his fall deprived of the light of the Divine presence, knew not which way to direct his prayers, until an exact representation of the paradisaical tabernacle was, by the favour of the ALMIGHTY, exhibited, encompassed by a glory, on the spot where the temple now stands, directly under the station of the original Kaba in HEAVEN,* and which spot ADAM from that period made his Kaba.—His son SETH, after his death, erected upon the place a building of stone and clay (or, as some say, of sun-burnt bricks), the same in shape as the celestial one. This being destroyed by the deluge, was afterwards, at the Divine command, rebuilt by ABRAHAM and his son ISHMAEL, the great progenitor of the Arabians. The Koreish (most probably by dint of superior power) obtained possession of it, and kept it in repair for several generations.—At length, in the infancy of MOHAMMED, the old temple having fallen, or being pulled down, a new one was erected on the same foundation, and after the same model.—Again, in the twenty-fourth year of the Higera, having sustained some damage from the zeal of the Mussulman reformers, in clearing it of idols, it was once more pulled down and rebuilt by Abou YOOSAF IBN AL HIJAJ, then Shareef of Mecca, as it now stands.—The Kaba is certainly a place of very great antiquity. It was, most probably, from its first foundation, the temple of an idol. Both Arabians and Egyptians regarded it with profound veneration, and every sect filled it with the images of their fantastic worship.—Amongst its pretensions to antiquity, and its fictitious excellencies, we must not pass over in silence the famous Hijraswad, or black stone, a small block of marble or granite, which is reported to have fallen to the earth with Adam when he was hurled from paradise. It is at present fixed in a case of silver, in the south-east corner of the temple, and is exceedingly respected, and piously kissed by all devout pilgrims. This sacred stone was carried away by the Car-matians, A. H. 278 (who at the time spoiled the temple of its golden spout, and other precious ornaments), but was restored in twenty-two years after.—Another relic is the Higr Ibraheeme, or stone of Abraham, which, it is said, was used as a scaffold by the patriarch when constructing the temple in company with his son Ishmael.—The third object of note is the fountain or well Zimzim, situated to the east of the Kaba, and the waters of which are reported to possess the same virtues as are attributed to all consecrated wells in every country. It is said that the water gushed out miraculously on this spot as Hagar was wandering through the desert with her son, oppressed with thirst.—Of the present state of the Kaba, which still bears its ancient name, Bait Oolla (the House of God), or Masjidal-hiram (the INVIOLEABLE TEMPLE), we can only obtain a knowledge through the medium of the Turks, or other Mohammedans, as no infidel is ever admitted within the precincts of the holy territory. In its original construction it is said to have been a perfect cube, the simplest of all figures, and therefore the best calculated to typify the unity of God.—IBN AL HIJAJ, in rebuilding it, caused a small alteration from the original figure, the temple, as it now stands, being twenty-four cubits long, twenty-three broad, and twenty-seven high. Still, however, it does not in any other respect deviate from the simplicity of its primitive form, it being entirely destitute of pilasters, cornice, or any ornament, except a veil or outer cover of black damask or velvet, a golden (or more probably gilt) band which encompasses it near the top, and a gold spout projecting from the roof to convey off the rain water.—The veil was formerly of Egyptian linen, and in the “days of IGNORANCE” was supplied by different chiefs of the Sabeans, or other idolatrous tribes. The piety of the Khalifs substituted a more costly stuff, which, since the accession of the Othmanian dynasty, has been annually renewed by the Turkish emperors. Several inferior buildings have been erected round it, particularly four open pavilions, which serve as oratories to the four orthodox sects of HANEefa, MALIK, SHAFEE, and HANBAL.—The whole stands in the midst of a spacious area, enclosed by a magnificent portico, having twelve gates and a range of twelve steps all round, from the level of the portico into the area.—The epithet haram

* From this fable, perhaps, originated the idea, entertained by some, of the station of the heavenly JERUSALEM, which many of the primitive Christians supposed to be placed directly in the zenith of the capital of Judea.

[inviolable] is not confined to this sacred spot, but extends for many miles round MECCA, small towers being placed at proper distances in every direction, to mark the precincts of the holy territory, within which it is not lawful to hunt, shoot, attack an enemy, or, in short, to commit any act of violence, except in self-defence, or for the destruction of noxious creatures, such as serpents, or animals of prey. In the neighbourhood of the city are two hills, Saffa and Marwa, the valley of Minna, and a sort of chapel named Moozadalifa, on the way thence to Mount Arafat, which lies at a somewhat greater distance.—The Arabian writers say that the city of MECCA, in the centre of which the Kaba stands, is nearly as ancient; and indeed if we consider how long this has been a spot for the resort of superstition or devotion, it is probably one of the oldest cities in the world.—Such is the spot to which, in the month Zee-al-Hidjee * of every year, multitudes of Mussulmans repair, to prostrate themselves before the "HOUSE OF GOD," and to perform the various ceremonies prescribed by their LAW, or sanctioned by antiquity, in most of which they vary little or nothing from their Pagan ancestors. We shall not dwell upon the particulars of these ceremonies. Suffice it to say, that they are in general highly absurd, and not defensible, even by the Mussulman doctors themselves, except on the ground of ordinance or custom. One particular it is nevertheless proper to remark upon, as it is frequently adverted to in the course of this work; namely, the state of a Mohrim. The caravans of pilgrims have each a particular place assigned, according to the parts whence they proceeded, which marks to them the boundary of the holy territory. Here they generally arrive towards the end of Zee-al Kada, and on the first morning of the succeeding month (Zee-al-Hidjee) the prescribed ceremonies commence. The pilgrims now lay aside all other dress or ornaments, and assume the humble habit of Ihram, which consists only of two colourless woollen cloths, and a kind of sandals, defending the soles of the feet, but leaving all the rest bare. It is from this time, and during the remainder of their stay in the holy territory, that the devotees bear the title of Mohrim. Whilst engaged in this pious work, a Mohrim is required to keep the strictest guard upon all his actions, and to refrain from contention, anger, and every indulgence of his carnal appetites. He is also inhibited from hunting or fowling even beyond the prescribed limits, not being allowed to destroy any thing for subsistence except fish. He is moreover under a variety of other inhibitions, which may be traced in the course of this work. For many centuries the greatest potentates were proud to submit themselves to these restrictions, and to sink, for a time, to a level with their fellow-creatures.—It may not, however, be improper to observe, that for some time past, and particularly within the present century, the Kaba has sustained a falling off both in the rank and number of its votaries. Whether this defection arises from the advancement of knowledge, or (as is most probable) from the rapid decay which the great Mussulman empires have experienced within that period, it certainly denotes a revolution in the minds or habits of the Mohammedans, which is perhaps only a prelude to the extinction of Islamism.—The first chapter of the book of PILGRIMAGE treats of those upon whom it is indispensably incumbent that they once in their lives visit the Kaba; namely, upon every Mussulman who is sane, adult, free, in perfect health, and possessed of the means for performing a journey, such as a camel, a horse, a servant, and a maintenance sufficient for those and himself during the pilgrimage, and for the support of his family until his return. No person is, however, required to cross the sea for this purpose.—This duty is as much enjoined upon women as upon men; but they are directed to perform it under the protection of some male relation within the prohibited degrees.—The second chapter relates to the various ceremonies of the Ihram, and the restrictions to which a Mohrim is subjected, as already mentioned.—The third chapter relates to the different names and descriptions of pilgrimage, according as the ceremonies of it are performed alone, or in company with others; and also, the visitations performed within any other than the sacred months.—The fourth chapter treats of the restrictions to which a pilgrim is subject during his residence within the "HOLY TERRITORY," and the offences which, from disregard of these, he is liable to commit;

* Hidj signifies pilgrimage;—and the month takes this name, as being peculiarly appropriated to the performance of that solemnity.

with the atonement required for each offence. In this chapter are also set forth the restrictions imposed upon pilgrims, and the indulgences allowed to them with respect to their wives or slaves, as well as the penalties imposed in case of infringement. A number of mere petty offences are likewise mentioned, for which atonements of a trifling nature are required, such as bestowing a day's subsistence upon one pauper, or (in cases of omission) repeating any particular part of the ceremonies. The remainder of this chapter relates to the inhibitions with respect to killing game, or feeding cattle within the holy territory, in either of which cases satisfaction must be made to the Chief of MECCA.—The fifth and sixth chapters relate to points of mere form.—The seventh concerns those who may be impeded in their pilgrimage by either sickness or an enemy;—in which case, it is requisite that the person so prevented send a goat or other victim (by the hands of some trusty deputy) to be sacrificed at the temple; or else, that he send the value in money, with which the deputy may purchase an animal at Mecca for that purpose;—and until this ceremony be performed he is not released from the restrictions of a pilgrim.—The sixth chapter treats of the time at which the season of pilgrimage expires,—namely, on the Yd Kirban, or festival of sacrifice, when, if the pilgrim have not gone through the whole of the ceremonies, all that he has done is of no account, and the pilgrimage must be performed again on some ensuing year.—The seventh chapter relates to the performance of pilgrimage on behalf of another person, which is lawful and valid for three different descriptions of people, namely, the dead (who have bequeathed a sum for this purpose), persons prevented by distance, sickness, or an enemy, or persons who, having already performed the ordained pilgrimage, procure another to perform it again on their account, either from motives of piety, to expiate an offence, or to fulfil a vow. This kind of substitutive pilgrimage became indispensably necessary when Islamism spread over regions at a considerable distance from Arabia, as it was utterly impossible for all the FAITHFUL in remote countries, however otherwise capable, to fulfil this duty in person.—The eighth chapter describes the HIRDE, or gift-offering sent by deputy to be sacrificed at the temple, as before mentioned. The smallest acceptable offering is one goat. In fact, the value of the offering

(as may naturally be supposed) is in proportion to the rank, piety, or vanity of the person who makes it; and instances have been known of one hundred camels, or more, being immolated in one sacrifice before the "House of God."—Some other matters are added, of too trifling a nature to deserve notice.

THIS short sketch will suffice fit once to show the useless nature of these four books, and, we trust, to justify the omission of them in the English translation.—We shall now proceed to make a few brief remarks upon the other books, in the order in which they stand, and which, for the convenience of the reader, are numbered according to their succession.

VOL. I.

BOOK I. OF ZAKAT.

ZAKAT means the alms imposed by the LAW, in opposition to Sadka [charity], which signifies the voluntary contributions of individuals, and which is treated of at large under the head of gifts.—As ALMS, in our application of that word, is always used to denote something purely gratuitous, the translator, in treating of those imposed by the Mussulman law, has retained the original term, to which the English language does not afford any expression strictly analogous. Some writers have confounded Zakat and Sadka under one common meaning. The Arabian commentators, however, make an essential difference between them; for the former is merely an indispensable compliance with a legal obligation, claiming no merit in futurity; whereas the latter is as much an impulse of the mind as an act of the hand, and is of course entitled to its reward.—The impost of Zakat originated with MOHAMMED himself, who at first employed the revenue arising from it according to his discretion, in the support of his needy adherents; but the objects of it were afterwards ascertained by various passages in the KORAN; and it is somewhat remarkable that the Prophet particularly excluded the members of his own family from any participation in it, and this in terms which sufficiently denotes the arrogant superiority assumed by the tribe of HASHIM.* To compensate, however, for this exclusion, he admitted them to a fifth share in that proportion of the spoil which was allotted to the public treasury. For some generations after MOHAMMED this impost was regularly collected, and faithfully applied to its appointed purposes.—In most Mussulman territories it continues to be levied at the present day; but the original objects of its disbursement have been long since disregarded, and what was intended as a relief to the poor is now, even in the best regulated governments, carried to the exchequer of the prince, who endeavours to satisfy his conscience by a sort of commutation, in the erection of mosques, or the support of a few indigent and idle Fakcers about his palace. That which commenced in the indigence or rapacity of the sovereign, has now acquired a sort of prescriptive authority; and the revenue derived from Zakat is universally considered as the right of the state. It has indeed, for several centuries past, ceased to be collected upon stationary property, the only tax which at present bears the name of Zakat being that imposed on goods imported in the way of trade, from one country or district into another, and levied in the name of a toll.—Many of its rules will be found to apply peculiarly to ARABIA and SYRIA, the countries in which these laws originated, and where flocks and herds have ever formed a chief part of the wealth of the inhabitants. Although the laws of Zakat have in a great measure been superseded, or become obsolete with respect to their original design, yet they are worthy of attention, as incidentally involving many of the laws of property in points not immediately connected with this subject.—Under this head is comprehended the Sadka Fittir, or alms given to the poor on the festival of breaking Lent; because the payment of those is considered as a divine ordinance, and the amount (contrary to other descriptions of Sadka) is particularly prescribed by the LAW.

ZAKAT is the only one of the five books upon the Abadat, or spiritual law, retained by the English translator. It is therefore immediately followed by the Maamilat, or temporal law,—commencing with MARRIAGE, and ending (properly) with BEQUEST, the last temporal act of MAN;—though a short supplementary book upon Hermaphrodites is added.

stated in terms remarkably simple. No provision is made for the execution of any written engagement; no particular form of ceremony is prescribed; but the efficiency of the whole is made to depend merely upon the oral declarations of the parties, before sufficient witnesses. In fact, written engagements were not in common use until some time after the establishment of Islamism.—A section of this chapter is occupied throughout with the matrimonial prohibitions and restrictions, with respect to which the Mohammedan and Levitical law have a close affinity. The principal of these restrictions are, that a man shall not marry his relation within the prohibited degrees; that he shall not have more than four wives at a time; and that he shall not marry, together, two women related to each other within the prohibited degrees.—To the political and speculative inquirer the most curious features in this book are, the passages which particularly concern WOMEN, as contained in Chap. II. and III. from which it appears, that the female sex are, among the Mussulmans, invested with many personal rights and independent privileges, such as certainly, in some measure, compensate for the various hard conditions to which law or custom has subjected the daughters of Islam.—These, as they are fully discussed in the body of the work, it is needless to recapitulate. The most striking of them which occurs under this article is, the liberty allowed to a woman to dispose of herself in marriage independent of her guardians, and the right of option which still remains to one contracted during infancy, after she shall have attained to maturity, which the law fixes at a very early age.* A woman is also entitled to possess her dower, or marriage settlement, as her own exclusive property, which she may dispose of by gift, will, or other deed, altogether independent of her husband, or of any claims which may lie against his estate.—Chapter VI. exhibits a still more extraordinary regard, in the Mussulman legislator, for the feelings of the sex, upon a point of a very delicate nature, and in which he doubtless consulted the peace of the Haram as much as the dictates of abstract equity.—Concerning this, however, we shall leave the text to speak for itself.

BOOK II. OF MARRIAGE.

THE preliminaries to this most important of all contracts, as set forth in Chap. I. are

BOOK III. OF FOSTERAGE.

IN a state of society where fastidious refinement has not destroyed the genuine feelings of the heart, the tie of fosterage is, next to that of blood, of the strongest and most lasting nature.—Even in the more remote parts of our own country the NURSE is still considered rather in the light of an humble relative than a menial dependent. By the people of Asia this idea is carried still farther; and the nursling is supposed to partake of the very nature of her from whose blood he receives his earliest nourishment. An affinity is therefore created by this circumstance, which operates to render marriage illegal in the same manner as actual consanguinity. Hence the prohibitions occasioned by fosterage are analogous to those set forth in the second section of the preceding book, —to which this is a kind of supplement.

BOOK IV. OF DIVORCE.

THE great variety of matter which this book embraces, and the many deviations which it admits from its main subject, the translator shall not undertake either to account for or to defend.—From the contents of the first six chapters the reader will perceive that the Mohammedan law of divorce bears a strong affinity throughout to that of MOSES. In this, as in marriage, no written instrument is required, the repudiation being effected merely by the verbal declaration of the party.—Custom, indeed, and the municipal regulations of most Mussulman countries, following the example of the Jews, have made a writing of divorce, if not an essential, at least a circumstance which it would be highly indecorous to omit. What most forcibly strikes us on the perusal of this subject is the extreme facility with which a husband may rid himself of his female partner,—a facility which, when we consider the too frequent levity and fickleness of MAN, seems at first sight calculated to expose the weaker sex to the most degrading insult which malice could dictate, or caprice put in practice.—The Arabian legislator has, however, established so many bars, and pride itself opposes such obstacles as, if they do not completely remedy, at least tend greatly to counteract this apparent defect.—Before a divorce becomes irreversible it must have been pronounced three times, allowing (according to the orthodox form) an interval of a month to pass between each sentence,—or such a period must have elapsed as affords ample room for reflection and repentance, in cases of anger or disgust; and a reversal is, at any time before the expiration of that term, established by either word or deed, denoting a reconciliation. The husband, moreover, unless he can prove gross misbehaviour, must give up the dower.—But the most powerful obstacle to unjust or capricious repudiation is that part of the law which provides, that if a wife be once completely divorced, the husband cannot take her again, until she be previously married to, bedded with, and divorced by, another man.—To this salutary regulation chiefly is owing the dislike which obtains against divorce in all Mussulman countries, and the dishonour attached to it,—insomuch that the instances of it are very rare, notwithstanding the liberty which is permitted by the LAW. The place and title of Chap. XV. would naturally lead us to conclude, that it treats in particular of the alimony payable to a divorced wife during the term of probation. This, however, is by no means the case; for it is made to comprehend those rights of every person which come under the denomination of MAINTENANCE,—not of the wife alone, but also of parents, children, poor or disabled relatives, and slaves.—With respect to domestic arrangements, this is, perhaps, the most useful section of the whole work. It evinces, in many places, a considerable spirit of humanity, and very properly introduces—

BOOK V. OF MANUMISSION.

TENDERNESS towards SLAVES is certainly a prevalent principal in the Mussulman law, notwithstanding some passages which occur in this treatise concerning them are directly repugnant to common feeling, and to the natural rights of MAN.—In the XXIVth chapter of the KORAN this tenderness is strongly enforced with respect to certain points in the domestic treatment of them;*

* The passage referred to treats of matching slaves who are single:—"CONTRACT (in marriage) THOSE OF THEM WHO ARE SINGLE, SUCH AS ARE WORTHY, OF YOUR MALE AND FEMALE (slaves); IF THEY BE POOR, GOD WILL ENRICH THEM OF HIS BOUNTY."— • UNTO SUCH AS DESIRE A WRITTEN COVENANT (of Kitabat), GRANT IT, IF YE SEE GOOD IN THEM; AND GIVE THEM OF THE RICHES OF GOD, WHICH HE HATH GIVEN YOU," &c.

PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE.

and it may also be traced in various parts of this Commentary.—It is, indeed, in practice pretty much confined to the slaves professing the Mussulman faith, as it is natural to suppose that the followers of the Prophet do not entertain the same regard towards their bond-servants of other religions. Still, however, we shall be guilty of great injustice, if we form our ideas of Mussulman slavery from the treatment experienced by Christian captives among the barbarians of Tunis and Algiers. The precepts concerning manumission are injunctive with respect to believers only; but those which recommend kindness and good usage apply to all alike. The law in many instances affords them protection against injustice, and declares them to be “claimants of right.” It in some particulars, moreover, provides an alleviation to this otherwise most hopeless and degraded state of MAN, unknown to the more polished inhabitants of Europe;—as may be perceived in perusing the laws with respect to Am-Walids, Mokatibs, Modabbirs, and Mazoons.—To the free-born denizen of BRITAIN, the very name of SLAVE carries with it something odious and disgusting: but the Mohammedan bond-man, generally speaking, experiences in a very slight degree, if at all, the miseries which necessarily attend that state in some of the dependencies of EUROPE; where the riches of the community grow out of the incessant labour of wretches, whose shortened date of life is balanced against their earnings, by rules of Algebra and calculations of Arithmetic! If the slaves of Mussulmans appear, by their conduct, to be deserving of encouragement, they are frequently treated rather as humble friends and confidants than as servile dependants; and though inhibited from rising in the state, often, in the capacity of Mazoons, amass a degree of wealth which enables them to purchase their freedom.—The subject of manumission is discussed at large in the first five chapters of this book.—Chap. VI. treats of a practice which was common in ARABIA before the time of MOHAMMED, and was confirmed by his precepts. It affords a strong incentive to emancipation, by enabling a master to perform an act of piety which, being posthumous in its effect, cannot injure his circumstances.—Chap. VII. exhibits a branch of that most important article, “the establishment of parent-

a man by his female slaves are as legitimate as those begotten in marriage; and also, that the Mussulman law, like the Roman, does not acknowledge any affinity between a bastard and his father, but throws him wholly upon the mother.

NOTE.—On turning to Book V. it will be seen that the subject treated of has been omitted, on the ground that slavery having been abolished by Act V. of 1843, there is no use in preserving the law upon the subject, which will be interesting to the antiquarian only, and he can find the learning upon the subject in the earlier editions.

BOOK VI. OF VOWS.

OATHS are one of the bonds of society, and in many instances the chief security for public integrity and private property. Perjury, therefore, has in all communities been justly reprobated as a most flagrant crime. It is remarkable, however, that the Mussulman law has instituted no specific punishment for this species of offence, except in the case of slander, the legislator seeming to think the apprehension of punishment in a future state of itself sufficient to restrain men from the commission of it. This is evidently the case with respect to the expurgatory oaths required of accused or suspected persons. In matters of property, indeed, the magistrate is at liberty to punish it by a slight discretionary correction; but in those most enormous instances of it which implicate the life of MAN, the only ill consequence it induces, on discovery, is a fine adequate to the blood thus unjustly shed:—a very trifling atonement certainly! In this defect, however (if it be such), of their law, the Mussulmans do not stand alone.

NOTE.—The law of perjury is now regulated by the Penal Code.

VOL. II.

BOOK VII. OF PUNISHMENTS.

THIS book treats only of the punishments incurred by crimes of a spiritual nature, those instituted for offences against person or property being discussed under their respective heads. The punishment for adultery is certainly severe. Yet we will not, perhaps, be forward to condemn this severity, if we compare it for a moment with what is recorded in the twentieth chapter of Leviticus upon the same point.—In fact, from the nature of the evidence required, it was next to impossible that the offence should ever be fully proved, even among the tents of the ARABS; so that the institution of the prescribed punishment was in a great measure nugatory, except in cases of confession by the parties. That those confessions were sometimes made in the early days of Islamism, is a fact; and made, as they were, at the certain expense of life, they afford a wonderful instance of devoted zeal among the first followers of MOHAMMED. Still, however, even in those instances, every means that precaution could suggest is enjoined to avoid the necessity of inflicting the sentence.—The three first chapters of this book relate entirely to whoredom, and the penalties incurred by each species of illegal connexion.—Chap. III. involves some curious matter concerning the retrospective limitations of testimony, which in practice extend to all cases of criminal accusation. Much here occurs, likewise, concerning the general laws of evidence, that may not be deemed unworthy of notice. Chap. IV. containing the penalties of drunkenness, exhibits a degree of lenient indulgence with respect to that vice which we should scarcely expect to meet in a Mussulman law-book, as it hence appears that a man may offend in this way, even to a considerable degree, without any danger of legal cognizance.—Slander, as treated of in Chap. V. comprehends all expressions which may either affect the reputation of a man or woman previously possessed of a fair character, or the legitimacy of their issue; and the punishment has, added to it, an effect equally just and politic, namely, incapacitating the slanderer from appearing as an evidence on any future occasion.—Discretionary correction, which forms the subject of Chap. VI. extends to all petty descriptions of personal insult, even to abusive language. In fact, two thirds of the punishment incurred under the Mussulman jurisdiction at the present day, whether in Turkey, Persia, or India, are inflicted under the name of Tazeer.—We must not pass this book without noticing the extraordinary indulgence shown to slaves, in subjecting them, for all spiritual offences, to only half the punishment of freemen. The reasons alleged for this lenity manifest an uncommon degree of consideration and feeling for the state of bondage.

BOOK VIII. OF LARCENY.

THE Translator has adopted the term Larceny, as the title of this book, because that work expresses every species of THEFT, from the most petty to the most atrocious. The uniform punishment annexed to Larceny is the amputation of a limb, unless where the act has been accompanied by murder, in which case the offender forfeits his life by the law of RETALIATION.—Many arguments might be adduced against the law of mutilation in cases of Larceny, founded as well on the inhumanity as the inefficiency and inconvenience of that mode of correction. It is, however, the only method expressly authorized by the text of the KORAN;—and if we consider the force of religious prejudice, and the effect of long habit, it may, perhaps, appear very unadvisable to introduce any hasty alteration in the penal jurisdiction in this particular,—especially as we have nothing better to offer by way of substitute (for surely our penal laws are still more sanguinary!), and also, as the Gentoo laws, with respect to theft, are strictly analogous to the Mussulman, in awarding mutilation under certain circumstances.—Chap. VII. of this book is particularly worthy of attention, as it respects the most daring and outrageous breach which can be made against the peace and security of society. To enter fully into the spirit of the text, in this and many other parts under the head of larceny, it is requisite that we keep in mind the peculiar manners of the people in those parts of the world where the Mussulman law operates. It is observable that, at the end of this book, a remarkable instance is incidentally introduced of the forbearance of the law in a case of homicide upon provocation.

NOTE.—Book VIII. has been omitted, as the question of larceny, as now applicable to India, is regulated by the Penal Code, Act XLV. of 1860.

BOOK IX. THE INSTITUTES.

THIS book contains a chief part of what may be properly termed the political ordinances of MOHAMMED, and is useful both in a historical and a legal view,—in the former, as it serves to explain the principles upon which the Arabians proceeded in their first conquests (and in which they have been imitated by all successive generations of Mussulmans), and in the latter, as many of the rules here laid down, with respect to unjugated countries, continue to prevail in all of that description at the present day. The nature and end of those regulations is fully explained in the text, that they do not require any illustration or comment in this place.* We shall therefore pass on to

BOOK X. OF FOUNDLINGS.

ONE of the earliest and most laudable attempts of MOHAMMED, in the prosecution of his pretended mission, was, to correct certain barbarous practices then prevalent among his countrymen, particularly with respect to infant children, whom it was common for the parents to expose or put to death, where they apprehended any inconvenience from the maintenance of them. The present book is to be considered merely as a comment upon his precepts in this particular.

BOOK XI. OF TROYES.

BOOK XII. ABSCONDING OF SLAVES.

NOTE.—This has been omitted for the same reason as Book V.

BOOK XIII. OF MISSING PERSONS.

THE rules laid down in these books will be found, in general, strictly consonant to natural justice, and such as prevail (or ought to prevail) in all well-regulated communities.

BOOK XIV. OF PARTNERSHIP.

THIS book contains a number of subtle distinctions with respect to property, in many of which acute discrimination seems to be studied, more than practical utility. Several of them the reader may indeed be tempted to consider rather as the scholastic reveries of an abstracted divine, than as flowing from an active intercourse with the world, or dictated by the liberal spirit of commerce.—Still, however, it will perhaps be found, that in the mass of speculation much matter is interwoven of a more substantial kind. The MUSSULMAN laws of property (to ascertain which is one great end of the present work) are in some instances defined with considerable precision; and the various subdivisions it exhibits to us of representative wealth, as opposed to real, gives us an interesting idea of the refinement which, so many centuries ago, subsisted in Mohammedan countries with respect to those particulars.

BOOK XV.

OF (PIOUS OR CHARITABLE) APPROPRIATIONS.

IN all Mohammedan countries (and in none more than in HINDOSTAN) it has been a common practice to dedicate lands, houses, and other fixed as well as movable property to the use of the poor, or the support of religion. The founding of a mosque, the construction of a reservoir, and even the digging a well, for the public use, come all under the same head; and many noble monuments of these kinds are still to be seen in different parts of INDIA, the useful effects of benevolence or superstition, in the more flourishing periods of the Mogul empire. That empire has, indeed, long since been hastening to decay; and the monuments of Mussulman piety or magnificence have suffered, with it, a sympathetic dilapidation. Numberless grants of LAND, however, to pious or charitable uses, have been executed at different times, of which many are still in full force, under the general title of AIMA;—and these must give some interest to the subject of the present book, in which the various modes of alienation are discussed with considerable accuracy.

BOOK XVI. OF SALE.

BOOK XVII. OF SURE SALE.

To enter fully into the subjects of these books, would occupy more time and space than is consistent with the brevity of prefatory remark. The observations we have made concerning Book XIV. will equally apply to these throughout. The book of SALE is swelled by a vast accession of incidental matter. Of these, the most striking is USURY, the subject of Chap. VIII. The Mohammedans, in this particular, closely copy the Jewish law, by which the children of ISRAEL were also strictly forbidden to exercise usury among each other.—To this chapter the book of SURE SALE may in some measure be considered a supplement, since it seems chiefly calculated to guard and provide against the practice of USURY in the exchange of the precious metals.

BOOK XVIII. OF BAIL.

UNDER this head are comprehended all sorts of security, whether for person or property.—This book contains a good deal of

* This book has been omitted, as it has hardly any practical effect; and, if requisite, the former edition can be consulted.

practical matter (particularly in the laws concerning guarantees), and is therefore worthy of an attentive perusal.

BOOK XIX. TRANSFER OF DEBTS.

Is in some measure supplementary to the former, as the transaction of which it treats is performed by way of giving security to a creditor.

BOOK XX. DUTIES OF THE KAZEE.

THE subject of this book is of the utmost importance in all countries, as upon the conduct of the magistrates the welfare and happiness of every society must chiefly depend: and indeed the Mohammedans esteem it of so much importance, that several large works have been written, by their principal law commentators, under this title.—In Chap. I. and II. the proper conduct of a judge, and the behaviour required in him, are briefly defined.—In these, however, as well as in the succeeding chapters, the text wanders strangely from its professed subject, and goes into a variety of matter which would appear to fall more properly under other heads.

BOOK XXI. OF EVIDENCE.

BOOK XXII. OF RETRACTION OF EVIDENCE.

THESE are two as useful books as any in the whole work,—and developé some of the most important principles in judicial proceedings.—The last section of Book XXI. shows, that the punishments incurred by perjury are (as has been already noticed) of a very slight nature, and calculated to operate more upon men's feelings than their fears. The reasons for this lenity are of the same description with those urged by our lawyers. Perhaps, indeed, the infamy and perpetual disqualifications to which the witness is subjected by it may operate as effectually as those penalties which the LAW prescribes;—but it is certain that false testimony is regarded with less abhorrence by Mohammedans in general than among Christians.

VOL. III.

BOOK XXIII. OF AGENCY.

BOOK XXIV. OF CLAIMS.

IN the former of these books nothing very remarkable occurs, the laws with respect to agents being in general analogous to those which obtain in our own courts.—Book XXIV. chiefly relates to the conduct of suits at law, and the rules to be observed in administering oaths, &c. It also comprehends much extraneous matter with respect to the various subjects of suits.—Chap. V. treats of a point already mentioned, namely, the establishment of parentage. In all societies where polygamy and concubinage are allowed, this subject must necessarily afford frequent ground for litigation.

BOOK XXV. OF ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

IT is only necessary to remark of this book, that Acknowledgment, in the Mussulman LAW, has the same effect, in the establishment or transfer of property, as a formal deed.

BOOK XXVI. OF COMPOSITIONS.

BOOK XXVII. OF MOZARIBAT.

THESE books contain a quantity of technical matter. Mozaribat seems to have been a device adopted in order to avoid the imputation of usury, by which the monied man was enabled to obtain a profit from his capital without the odium of receiving any interest upon it.—This species of contract is in common used in Hindostan.

BOOK XXVIII. OF DEPOSITS.

BOOK XXIX. OF LOANS.

BOOK XXX. OF GIFTS.

THESE books chiefly consist of plain rules, applied to ordinary cases.—It is to be remarked, however, that the Mussulman law, with respect to gifts, differs considerably from the Roman, in leaving to the donor an unrestricted right of resumption.

BOOK XXXI. OF HIRE.

Is a book of considerable practical utility, as it comprehends every description of valuable usufruct, from the hire of land to that of a workman or an animal.

BOOK XXXII. OF MOKATIBS.

BOOK XXXIII. OF WILLA.

IT is probable that many of the laws in these books have now fallen into disuse, or are confined to Arabia, Persia, and Turkey. The privileges and immunities of WILLA, however, still obtain in all Mussulman countries, and are of considerable consequence, as involving many rights liable to become subjects of litigation. The privilege allowed to a slave, of covenanting for and purchasing his freedom, place the Mussulman laws of bondage in a striking, but not a disagreeable light.

NOTE.—This book has also been omitted for the same reason as Book V.

BOOK XXXIV. OF COMPULSION.

It is in general agreed, by most juridical writers, that a defect of the will, arising from compulsion, is an excuse for any crime committed, and an annulment of any deed executed under it. In the Mussulman code this rule, however, does not invariably hold, as from what occurs under this head it appears, that compelled contracts or other acts are nevertheless valid in their effect; and that offences committed under the influence of fear have still a degree of criminality attached to them.

BOOK XXXV. OF INHIBITION.

THE subject of this book comprehends every species of incapacity, whether natural or accidental. The second chapter exhibits one of the most striking features in the institutes of Mohammedanism.—How far legal restrictions upon adult prodigals are calculated for the advantage of the community at large, is not our business to inquire. It is, however, certain, that the imposition of wholesome limitations upon thoughtless extravagance, and every other species of folly, if more generally introduced, would operate powerfully to preserve the property and peace of families, and (perhaps) the virtue of individuals.—The inhibition upon debtors, as contained in Chap. III. is well worthy of attention.

BOOK XXXVI. OF LICENSED SLAVES.

THAT regulation of the Mussulman law by which a master is empowered to endow his slave with almost all the privileges and responsibilities of a freeman, preserving, at the same time, his property in him inviolate, affords a strong proof of its tenderness with respect to bondage. It in fact places the slave who obtains this advantage rather in the light of an attached dependant than of a mere servile instrument, deprived of privilege, and destitute of volition.

NOTE.—This book has been omitted for the same reason as Book V.

BOOK XXXVII. OF USURPATION.

BOOK XXXVIII. OF SHAFFA.

THE points of discussion which occupy these books are of some importance in every view. The regulations in the former are, for the most part, sanctified by natural justice, and those in the latter, by many considerations of conveniency and expedience. Several particulars which occur in treating of Usurpation must indeed be referred to certain customs prevalent in Arabia. The right of pre-emption enjoyed in virtue of community or contiguity of property, is perhaps peculiar to the Mussulman law. However accommodating to the interests and partialities of individuals, this privilege may nevertheless be considered as liable to some objection, on the score of affording room for endless litigation. Under certain restrictions, it is both a just and a humane institution.

VOL. IV.

BOOK XXXIX. OF PARTITION.

THIS book relates chiefly to the division of inheritable property. By the Mussulman law, as by the Roman, parceners in an estate may be constrained to make a partition of their joint inheritance, for which purpose proper officers are appointed by public authority.—The same rule also extends to other descriptions of partnership property. The principal tendency of the disquisitions under this head is, to show what are proper objects of partition, and in what instances the magistrate is at liberty to compel the parties to accede to the separation of their joint possessions.—The laws of usufructuary partition, as contained in Chap. V., possess much curious originality.

BOOK XL. COMPACTS OF CULTIVATION.

BOOK XLI. COMPACTS OF GARDENING.

THESE books are of use chiefly on account of the regulations with respect to landed property which incidentally occur in them. They exhibit the farming of lands in a very imperfect state, and at a time when money had as yet come little into current use. They, however, explain a number of principles upon this subject equally applicable to all ages.

BOOK XLII. OF ZABBAH.

IN the Mohammedan as in the Jewish Law, the eating of blood is strictly forbidden, and hence the various rules and precautions set forth under this head. It appears, from some passages, that the Arabian Prophet was desirous of inculcating not only a scrupulous regard to the purity of food, but also a humane and tender attention to the feelings of the animal destroyed for the purpose of supplying it.—This last is indeed a sentiment discoverable in many parts of his precepts.

BOOK XLIII. OF SACRIFICE.

SACRIFICE, whether as a memorial or an expiation, is one of the most ancient religious observances which occur in the history of mankind. The particular ceremony which is the subject of this book, was instituted in commemoration of ABRAHAM'S obedience to the Divine command by the intended sacrifice of his son. This son the Arabian commentators make to be their great progenitor ISHMAEL, and not ISAAC, whom they assert to have been promised subsequent to that event. This conclusion they draw from the manner in which the whole circumstance is worded in the thirty-seventh chapter of the KORAN, though the passage is certainly very equivocal. The anniversary of this rite falling on the tenth of Zee-al-Hidjee [the month of pilgrimage], it is performed by pilgrims in the valley of Minna, and constitutes one of the prescribed ceremonies of pilgrimage.—It is, however, equally enjoined on all others possessed of the ability; and may be performed by any man at his own habitation. The rules respecting it are few and simple; and are, in fact, of little consequence in a civil light, farther than as they tend to affect property. The same observation in a great degree applies to

BOOK XLIV. OF ABOMINATIONS.

A SUBJECT which involves a vast variety of frivolous matter, and must be considered chiefly in the light of a treatise upon propriety and decorum. In it is particularly exhibited the scrupulous attention paid to female modesty, and the avoidance of every act which may tend to violate it, even in thought.—It is remarkable, however, that this does not amount to that absolute seclusion of women supposed by some writers. In fact, this seclusion is a result of jealousy or pride, and not of any legal injunction, as appears in this and several other parts of the Hedaya. Neither is it a custom universally prevalent in Mahomedan countries.

BOOK XLV. CULTIVATION OF WASTE LANDS.

IN most Mussulman governments, particular encouragement has been held forth to the reclaiming of barren or deserted grounds, by the powerful incentive of granting to the cultivator a property in the soil.—A considerable portion of this book is occupied with discussions upon the right to water, that element being justly regarded as a most valuable commodity in countries where, from the heat of the climate, the ground is liable, for the greatest part of the year, to excessive drought; and where, of course, the success of tillage must chiefly depend upon an artificial supply of it.

BOOK XLVI. PROHIBITED LIQUORS.

IN prohibiting the use of wine (under which term are included all descriptions of inebriating liquors), the Prophet meant merely to restrain his followers from unbecoming behaviour, and other evil effects of intoxication. At first the precept was issued in the KORAN simply against drunkenness, which amounted only to a prohibition of excess in the use of strong liquors; but this not proving sufficient for the purposes of complete determent, the negative injunction was produced, by which inebriating fluids were altogether proscribed, and declared unlawful. The tendency of this book is, chiefly, to exhibit the opinions of their divines concerning what kind of liquors those are which fall under the denomination of prohibited; in which we may trace the rigid scrupulosity of the more early Mussulmans upon this point. At present, however, they are not, in general, very strict observers of the Law in this particular, their modern doctors allowing that various fluids may be drank, either medicinally or for pleasure, provided it be done with moderation, and so as to avoid scandal.

BOOK XLVII. OF HUNTING.

THIS book is, properly, a supplement to Zabbah; and any reflections upon it may therefore be referred to the observations under that head.

BOOK XLVIII. OF PAWNS.

BOOK XLIX. OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON.

IN determining the measure of punishment for offences committed upon the persons of men, the lex talionis seems at first sight to have been dictated by natural reason, and to be consistent with justice, as affording the best means of a strict and equal retribution. Accordingly, we find it among the earliest institutes of every society approaching to a state of perfect civilization. Before the time of MOHAMMED, the administration of public justice being little known in Arabia, personal injuries were a fruitful source of private revenge and civil war, and preserved, among the descendants of ISHMAEL, a sanguinary ferocity of spirit, which was considered as a virtue rather than a blemish in their character. The Prophet soon perceived it necessary to the completion of his project, to introduce a reform in this particular; and therefore, with a view at once to indulge his countrymen's propensity to revenge, and to preserve the peace of the community, shortly after his flight to Medina (as it is said), revealed that passage of the KORAN allowing of retaliation, in which he has nearly copied the law of MOSES. As equality is the professed ground of this institution, the Mussulman doctors, in their comments upon it, seem to have followed the literal acceptance of the text, in all cases where the observance of this equality is possible. In practice, however, retaliation is seldom or never inflicted upon a limb or member; but a mulct is imposed in proportion to the injury, and according to the circumstances by which it is excited or attended.—In fact, however equitable this mode of requital may appear in some instances of personal injury, yet, when applied to all without limitation, it certainly involves much gross absurdity and injustice, a charge from which it does not stand acquitted by all the distinctions which the commentators have established concerning it in this book. Hence it is that the Mussulman courts, following the example of the Jews, understand the words of the KORAN, in all cases short of life, in the same manner as those do the Pentateuch; that is, not as awarding an actual retaliation, according to the strict literal meaning, but an atonement in exact proportion to the injury.—Thus much with respect to wilful offences. That law by which a man is made responsible in his property for offences unintentional or merely accidental, is certainly, in some instances, rather rigorous. It was, however, well calculated, in an irregular society, and a defective state of civilization, to guard men from acting carelessly, and has a strong tendency to support and inculcate the sacredness of the person of MAN.—We shall speak more fully upon this subject, in treating of BOOK L. OF FINES.

ALTHOUGH the manner in which this subject is treated involves a considerable portion of frivolous absurdity, yet we also find, in the course of its discussions, many wise and salutary regulations, both for preserving the security of the person, and the peace and good order of society. We may perceive, from the perusal of it, that a man is made responsible not only for his overt acts, but likewise for any injury which may be more remotely occasioned by his carelessness, obstinacy, or wilful neglect. The degree of the fine was originally fixed at a certain amount, that for the life of a man being determined at one hundred camels, and all others at a proportionable rate, according to the injury. In later times, however, the changes in manners, and in the value of property, introduced other modes of ascertaining amercement, and fines came to be levied not only in proportion to the injury sustained, but also according to the circumstances of the case.—Chap. VI. exhibits the only species of inquest admitted by the Mussulman law in cases of uncertain homicide, consisting solely of expurgatory oaths. However well calculated this may have been for the meridian of Arabia or Irak, and for the state of society in those countries at the time these laws were first systematized into a code, it is certainly but a poor device for the detection of guilt or the ascertainment of fact in a well-regulated community.—It is remarkable that a law strictly correspondent to what is mentioned in this chapter formerly prevailed among the Saxons and other northern nations of EUROPE, where the responsibility for unascertainable bloodshed lay with the master of the family, or with the people of the tything in which the body was found.†

* This subject has been omitted, as it is now dealt with by the Indian Criminal Law.

† See the note above.

BOOK LI. THE LEVYING OF FINES.

THE subject of this book is purely of a local nature, relating entirely to the levying of fines upon the Arabian tribes for offences unintentionally committed by any individual of them.—These regulations serve to give us a pretty clear idea of the state of society in the native land of Islamism. However useless, and perhaps impracticable, in a more advanced state of refinement, these, as well as many regulations in the two preceding books, were well calculated to reduce a fierce people under the restraints of law and civil government.

NOTE.—See note to Book XLIX.

BOOK LII. OF WILLS.

WITH respect to the forms of wills, the same observations occur as have been already made in treating of MARRIAGE.—In fact, as writing was formerly very little in use among the Arabs, all deeds are, in the commentaries upon their laws, regarded and mentioned as merely oral. Hence WILLS, as discussed in this book, are solely of the nuncupative description. The most remarkable features in this book are, the restrictions imposed upon testators with respect to the disposal of their property.

BOOK LIII. OF HERMAPHRODITES.

THIS book, and the succeeding chapter, which, because of its being detached from any particular subject, is termed CHAPTER THE LAST, are a kind of supplement to the rest of the work. Hermaphrodites are probably a class of beings which exist in imagination rather than in reality. We shall therefore leave this book to speak for itself.—The last chapter is worthy of particular notice, as (if we except bills of sale and judicial letters) it is the only part of the work in which anything is mentioned concerning forms of WRITING.

IN concluding this short review, the translator esteems it his duty to add, that it is a very imperfect summary indeed of the work which is now presented to the Public. The subjects of it would admit of a much more ample discussion.—But to enter into a comparative and analytical survey of topics so numerous and important would of itself require a large volume; and the patience of the reader is perhaps exhausted. The more particular investigation of them we shall therefore leave to his own reflections or inquiries; and hasten to conclude an essay, for the length of which no other apology can be offered, than an anxious wish to forward the chief end of this publication, by throwing some light upon a subject dry in itself, and not without its difficulties, and accommodating it to the perceptions of those whom duty or curiosity may lead to make it an object of their study.

OF the importance of a work in which the translator has borne so large a share, it may not become him to say much; but as the objects of it are of a public nature, and as it has been brought forward in some measure at the public expense, he feels himself called upon to hazard a few words in vindication of its probable utility.

WITH respect to the immediate end proposed by those who originally projected this translation, all that is necessary to be stated may be resolved into one summary argument. While the Mohammedan Law is allowed to be the sole standard of criminal,* and in a great measure of civil jurisprudence throughout our dominions in INDIA (and it would perhaps be neither prudent nor possible hastily to introduce any other system), it appears indispensably necessary that those who are to protect the rights of the people, and who are responsible for the proper administration of public justice, should possess the means of consulting the principles on which the decisions of the Mussulman courts are founded. This reflection acquires still greater weight, when we consider how very large a portion of subjects under the British government in INDIA are Mohammedans, upon whose attachment to their rulers much of the prosperity of our Asiatic empire must necessarily depend.

THE advantages to be derived from a development of the institutes of MOHAMMED are, however, not confined to the administration of justice in our Asiatic territories. The commerce of GREAT BRITAIN extends to almost every region where his religion is professed; and as this work is a commentary upon the juridical code of the OTTOMAN as well as of the MOGUL empire, and is applicable to the customs and judicial regulations of Cairo, Aleppo, or Constantinople, as well as of Delhi or Moorsheadabad,—it can scarcely fail to open a source of desirable knowledge to the merchant and the traveller. In a political view, likewise, it is humbly presumed that this work will not be found altogether uninteresting. At the present eventful period, when we have seen new empires springing into birth, and the old indignantly throwing off the long-riveted chains of despotism, the grandest remaining fabric of Islamism seems hastening to its fall.—In expecting this mighty ruin, we are naturally led to inquire upon what principles the fabric was founded, and to what causes we are to attribute its decay.—Some parts of the following treatise are particularly calculated to assist us in such an investigation. We may there observe that, however sagaciously it might be formed for the sudden extension of dominion, during an age when mankind were involved in the darkest gloom of superstition and ignorance, the Mussulman system, civil and religious, is but wretchedly adapted to the purposes of public security or private virtue. We may observe, with some degree of laudable exultation, its obvious inferiority, in every useful view, to that excellent system which we profess, and which is so admirably calculated to promote the temporal good of mankind, as well as their eternal happiness!

BUT it is time to close this address. The translator cannot, however, conclude without paying that tribute which justice and gratitude demand.—Concerning the public zeal, the penetrating and comprehensive mind of the Gentleman to whom the work is dedicated, it is unnecessary to enlarge in this place. From him the present translation derives its existence; and the merit of his design received its best confirmation in the continuance of support it experienced from his immediate superiors, as well as from his successors in office.—To the liberal attention and honourable confidence of SIR JOHN MACPHERSON and his Colleagues in the BENGAL government it is owing, that the translator was at all enabled to look forward to the completion of his labours. Yet this attention and confidence, flattering as they were, would not have sufficed to bear him through an arduous and expensive undertaking, had it not been aided by the generous and munificent support of the COURT OF DIRECTORS, whose regard to every effort which may tend to promote the interests of our Oriental dominions has been repeatedly experienced both by himself and others. Conscious of his own deficiencies, he has only to hope it may appear, that what they have liberally granted has been faithfully and diligently employed. He entertains too humble an opinion of his abilities not to be sensible that, with all his assiduity, aided by the many happy suggestions of the worthy and excellent friend who had for some time been his Colleague in the performance, it will still be found far short of perfection.—The chief business of a translator, when engaged in an undertaking of this kind, is scrupulous accuracy, and the only merit he can claim laborious application. The former of these the present translator has endeavoured to preserve, and the latter he presumes to affirm has not been wanting. Nevertheless, there is undoubtedly much room for correction and amendment. The very nature of the work rendered the translation of it a business attended with no common degree of difficulty. Treating of an abstruse science, the technical terms of which are but nakedly explained, and frequently not to be met with in any of his guides, all the light the translator could obtain to a knowledge of his subject necessarily sprung out of the text; and consequently, as he advanced, he saw continual occasion for retrospective alterations, which amounted to little less than a repetition of his labour. He found himself therefore frequently at a loss; and repeatedly experienced the truth of an observation made by our immortal Lexicographer,—that “a writer may often in vain trace his memory, at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to-morrow.”

IN confirmation of his wish to render this publication, as much as in his power, worthy of the patronage under which it has been conducted, the translator hopes he may be indulged in the egotism of the remark,—that he has dedicated his three last years unremittingly to revisal or re-translation.—He now dismisses it with an anxious wish that that patronage may not appear to have been bestowed, or his own efforts applied, in vain!

THE HEDAYA;

A

COMMENTARY ON THE MUSSULMAN LAWS.

BOOK I.

OF ZAKAT.

Definition of the term.—ZAKAT, in its imitative sense, means purification, whence is also used to express a contribution of a portion of property assigned to the use of the poor, as a sanctification of the remainder to the proprietor. It is by some commentators termed the indispensable alms.

Chap. I.—Introductory.

Chap. II.—Of Zakat from Sowayeen¹ that is, Herds and Flocks.

Chap. III.—Of Zakat from personal effects.

Chap. IV.—Of the laws respecting those who come before the Collector.

Chap. V.—Of Mines, and buried Treasures.

Chap. VI.—Of Zakat from the Fruits of the Earth.

Chap. VII.—Of the Disbursement of Zakat.

Chap. VIII.—Of Sadka-fittir.

CHAPTER I.

Obligation of Zakat, and the conditions upon which it is incumbent.—ZAKAT is an ordinance God, incumbent upon every person who is sane, adult, and a Mussulman, provided he be possessed, in full propriety, of such estate or effects as are termed in the language of the law a Nisab, and that he has been in session of the same for the space of one complete year, which is denominated Hawlan-hawl. The reason of this obligation is found in the word of God, who has ordained it in the KORAN, saying, "BESTOW ZAKAT." The injunction occurs in the traditions; and is moreover universally admitted. The reason for freedom being a requisite condition is, that this is essential to the complete session of property. The reason why minority of intellect and maturity of age are requisite conditions shall be hereafter demonstrated. The reason why the Mussulman faith is made a condition is, that the rendering of Zakat is an act of piety, and such cannot proceed from an infidel. The reason for the possession of a Nisab being a condition is, that the Prophet has determined the obligation of Zakat upon that amount. The reasons for Hawlan-hawl being made a requisite condition are twofold; FIRST, because some space of time is necessary to increase* of property, and the law determines this at one year, because the Prophet has declared, "ZAKAT is not due upon property until the same shall have been possessed one year by the proprietor."—SECONDLY, the proprietor of a Nisab is able, within such a period, to obtain an increase from it, since in a year there are four seasons, in each of which it most commonly happens that such property bears a different price; wherefore the rule is determined accordingly. It is to be observed, that some maintain Zakat to be due immediately upon the completion of Hawlan-hawl, and others that it is so through life.†

Zakat is not due from infants nor from maniacs.—ZAKAT is not incumbent upon infants or maniacs.—Shafei declares Zakat to be an obligation connected with property, and therefore that it is incumbent upon those, as well as upon other proprietors, in the same manner as subsistence to a wife, and Tythe and Tribute; but to this our doctors reply that Zakat is an act of piety, and, as such, is fulfilled only by being paid with the option of those who are subject to it; and infants and maniacs are not held in law to be possessed of option, this being necessarily connected with reason, which they are not endowed with; but this does not apply to Tribute, as that is a provision arising from

* By increase is here understood that obtained by breeding, where the Nisab consists of cattle, or by profit, where it consists of merchandise.

† That is to say, annually, upon the same property, so long as it remains with the proprietor.

the soil, for the expenses of the state; nor to Tythe, as that is also in some shape of the same nature.

With certain exceptions.—If a lunatic have lucid intervals within the year, it is the same as if they happened within the month of Ramzan; that is to say, if he recovers his reason within the year, he is subject to Zakat, in the same manner as if he were to recover it within the month of Ramzan, in which case he would have to make up for the days of Lent he had omitted in consequence of his insanity.—Aboo Yoosaf has observed, that regard is to be paid to the length or continuance of the lucid intervals; that is to say, if they continue the greater part of the year, the lunatic is subject to Zakat; but if he be insane for the greater part, it is not incumbent upon him. It is to be observed, that original and supervenient insanity are here considered as the same; by original is understood that which appears in a person in infancy, and continues upon him as he grows up to puberty; and by supervenient, that which occurs after a person has attained the years of maturity. It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that if a person attain maturity in a state of insanity, and then becomes sane, the year* is considered to commence from the instant of his recovery, the same as a boy attaining puberty, with whom it is regarded as commencing on the day of his majority.

Nor from Mokatibs.—ZAKAT is not incumbent upon a Mokatih, he not being completely and independently possessed of property, since he is still a slave; whence it is that he is not at liberty to emancipate any of his own slaves.

Nor from insolvent debtors.—ZAKAT is not incumbent upon a man against whom there are debts equal to, or exceeding, the amount of his whole property. Imam Shafei alleges that it is incumbent, because the cause of the obligation, to wit, possession of an increasing NISAB, is established. To this our doctors reply, that such a Nisab is not possessed by him clear of incumbrance, and is therefore held to be non-existent, the same as water, which, when provided for the sole purpose of drink,† is held to be non-existent with respect to performance of the Tammecm, and cloth provided for the purpose of apparel, which is held non-existent with respect to the obligation of Zakat. But if his property exceed his debts, Zakat is due upon the excess, provided the same amount to what is sufficient to constitute a Nisab, and that it be free from incumbrance. By the debts here mentioned are understood those due to individuals; such, therefore, as are due in consequence of vows, or on account of expiations, do not forbid the obligation to pay Zakat: but a debt of Zakat forbids the obligation to pay Zakat in the continuance of the Nisab, as that would be thereby rendered defective: and, in like manner, a debt of Zakat forbids Zakat after the dissolution of the Nisab. The case of the continuance of a Nisab is, where the proprietor keeps it for two years without rendering any Zakat upon it, in which case no Zakat is due from him on account of the second year; because a Zakat, in the proportion of one in forty, is already due on account of the preceding year, whence the full amount necessary to constitute a Nisab does not remain in the second year: and the case of dissolution of the Nisab is, where the proprietor keeps the same for the full space of one year without paying Zakat, and then disposes of the Nisab, and afterwards becomes possessed of another Nisab, and this also continue in his possession for the complete space of one year; in which case, no Zakat is due upon this second Nisab, because a proportion of one in forty is already occupied by the Zakat due on the former Nisab which has been disposed of. Ziffer controverts the rule in both these cases: and it is also said that Aboo Yoosaf controverts it with respect to the second case. The reason why a debt of Zakat thus forbids any further obligation to pay Zakat is, that the claimant of a debt of Zakat is, in fact, an individual,* as the claimant thereof, in pastures, is the Imam, and, in articles of merchandise, the deputy of the Imam;† and the proprietor of the property, in all other articles, is the Imam's substitute.‡

Nor upon the necessities of life.—ZAKAT is not due upon dwelling-houses or articles of clothing or household furniture, or cattle kept for immediate use, or slaves employed as actual servants, or armour, or weapons designed for present use; all these falling under the description of necessities; neither are such considered as increasing property; and the same of books of science, with respect to scholars, and likewise of tools, with respect to handicrafts; these being to them as necessities.

Nor upon uncertain property.—If a man have a claim upon another for a debt, and the other dispute the same, and some years thus pass away, and the claimant be destitute of proof, and the debtor afterwards make a declaration or acknowledgment publicly, inso-much that there are witnesses of the same, there is no obligation upon the claimant to render any Zakat* for so many years as have thus passed. This uncertain sort of property is termed, in the language of the law, Zimar: and trove property, and fugitive slaves, and usurped property, respecting which there is no proof, and property sunk in the sea, or buried in the desert, and its place forgotten, and property tyrannically seized by the Sultan, are all of the description of Zimar: and all these articles are equally exempted from Sadka-fittir.† Ziffer and Shafei maintain, that all these articles are subject both to Zakat, and also to Sadka-fittir, as the cause of the obligation to pay Zakat (to wit possession of a Nisab) is established in each of them, although it was not in the immediate seisin of the proprietor whilst it fell under the description of Zimar, which does not forbid the obligation to Zakat; like the property of a traveller, which if it remain in his house, is nevertheless subject to Zakat, although it be not at the time in his hands. The arguments of our doctors herein are twofold: FIRST, Alee declared that no Zakat is due upon Zimar property; SECONDLY, the cause of the obligation to pay Zakat is the possession of property in a state of increase, which cannot be the case but where the proprietor has an immediate power of management over it; but this does not apply to a traveller who has property at home, as he may manage it by agents.

† Because the Imam is always supposed to collect the Zakat upon pastures in person, and that upon merchandise by his deputies: i. e. by collectors placed at particular stations for that purpose.

‡ As the payment of Zakat, upon all other articles, is committed to the proprietor himself.

PROPERTY buried in the house of the proprietor is not Zimar, because it is easily recovered; but, with respect to property buried in any other ground than that on which the house actually stands (such as the garden, for instance), there is a difference among our modern doctors.

(It is due upon unquestionable property.—PROPERTY which is acknowledged by a debtor to be owing to his creditor is subject to Zakat, whether such debtor be rich or poor, because the recovery of it is possible: or if the debtor dispute the demand, yet here also the property in question is subject to Zakat, provided there be proof sufficient to substantiate the creditor's claim, or that the Kазee himself be satisfied of the justice of it; because here also recovery is possible. And if the acknowledging debtor be poor,—that is to say, if the Kазee declare him insolvent,—yet here also the property in question is subject to Zakat, according to Haneefa,—he holding that a Kазee's declaration of the insolvency of a debtor is not approved: but Imam Mohammed maintains that the property in this case is not subject to Zakat,—he holding a Kазee's declaration of a debtor's insolvency to be approved.—

Abou Yoosaf agrees with Mohammed respecting the validity of a Kазee's decree of insolvency; but he, at the same time, coincides with Haneefa, that the property of which the debt consists is not, in this case, subject to Zakat.

Intention of traffick in property subjects it to Zakat.—IF a person purchase a female slave for the purpose of traffick, and afterwards retain her for his own use, declaring his intention, no Zakat is due upon her, because the intention is here connected with the act, namely, the relinquishment of traffick in her; and an intention thus declared, when connected with an act, is to be credited:—and if he should afterwards declare a design of trafficking in her; yet no Zakat will be due upon her in virtue of such declaration, until he actually dispose of her by sale, because here the intention is not connected with the act, and consequently she is not held to be a subject of traffick from his declaration, unless he actually sell her, when Zakat is due upon her price.

IF a person purchase a thing with an intention of traffick, it is to be considered as an article of traffick, on account of the connection of an intention of traffick with the act, to wit, purchase: contrary to a case where a person obtains possession of property by inheritance, and intends to traffick in the same, such not being considered an article of traffick merely from the intention, since that, in this case, bears no relation to the act.

IF a man become possessed of property by gift, or bequest, or marriage, or Khoola, or composition for blood, and intend trafficking in the same, it becomes (and is, in virtue of his intention, considered as) an article of merchandise,—according to Abou Yoosaf,—he holding the intention here to be connected with the act. It is related as an opinion of Imam Mohammed, that this property does not become as merchandise, because the intention is not here connected with the act of traffick, which is understood only by purchase and sale: some, however, have related this difference of opinion the reverse of what is here mentioned.

Intention of Zakat, in the payment, necessary to its validity.—THE payment of Zakat is not lawful, except under an intention existing at the period of such payment, or at the period of setting apart the proportion of Zakat from the Nisab-property, because the rendering of Zakat is an act of piety, to which the intention is essential; and a radical principle of the intention is that it be connected with the payment: but yet, inas-much as the giving of Zakat to the poor is necessarily an act of frequent repetition and occurrence, it suffices that the intention exist at the period of setting apart the proportion of Zakat (as aforesaid), for the sake of convenience.

* Upon the property which is the subject of the claim.

† For an explanation of Sadka-fittir, see Chap. VIII.

* That is, to the means by which such property was acquired.

Excepting under certain circumstances.—

If a man bestow his whole property in charity, without intention of Zakat, the obligation of Zakat, with respect to him, drops, upon a principle of benevolence, because such obligation extends to a certain part of his property only; and where the whole is thus bestowed, that part is necessarily included; whence it is that there is no necessity for his specifying the same by intention.

If a man give to the poor a portion of his Nisab property, without intention of Zakat, his obligation to Zakat drops with respect to such portion (according to Mohammed), because the part of his property due (on account of Zakat) affects the whole of his Nisab equally,—wherefore, when a part of the Nisab is thus bestowed, the proportion due upon such part goes along with it. Abou Yoosaf maintains that the obligation to the Zakat of that portion does not drop, because no part thereof is particularly specified as Zakat, the remainder of the Nisab being the subject from which the obligation is to be discharged: contrary to where the whole Nisab has been bestowed, since there the proportion due on account of Zakat goes, a certiori, as being involved in the whole.

CHAPTER II.

OF ZAKAT FROM SAWAYEEM; THAT IS, HERDS AND FLOCKS.

Definition of Sawayeem.—SAWAYEEM is the plural of Saycema; and Saycema is, by the learned, understood to imply camels, oxen, goats, and other animals which subsist for the greater part of the year upon pasture: wherefore, if they live but half the year in pastures, and are fed for the other half upon forage, they do not fall under the description of Sawayeem.*—And this chapter is divided into several heads.

Sect. I.—Of the Zakat of Camels, &c.

One goat due upon five camels, &c.—No ZAKAT is due on fewer than five camels; and upon five camels the Zakat is one goat, provided they subsist upon pasture throughout the year; because Zakat is due only upon such camels as live on pasture, and not upon those which are fed in the house with forage.

One goat is due upon any number of camels from five to nine; and two goats is the Zakat on any number from ten to fourteen; and three on any number from fourteen to nineteen and four upon any number from twenty to twenty-four; and upon any number of camels from twenty-five to thirty-five the Zakat is a Binnit-Makhas, that is a yearling camel's colt; and upon any number from thirty-six to forty-five, a Binnit-liboon, or camel's colt of two years; and upon any number from forty-six to sixty, a Hikka, or four-year old female camel; and upon any number from sixty-one to seventy-five, a Fareeyat, or five-year old female camel; and for any number from seventy-six to ninety, the Zakat is two camel's colts of two years; and on any number from ninety-one to one hundred and twenty, two Hikkas. These proportions of Zakat upon camels are what were written by the prophet in his letters and instructions to his public officers and Aumeels. And when the number of camels exceeds one hundred and twenty, the Zakat is calculated by the aforesaid rule; that is to say, where the whole number is one hundred and twenty-five (for instance), the Zakat is one goat for the odd five, and two Hikkas for the one hundred and twenty; and if the excess number be ten, two goats; and if it be fifteen, three goats; and if it be twenty, four goats; and if it be twenty-five, a yearling camel's colt; and if the whole number of camels be one hundred and fifty, the Zakat is three Hikkas; and if the number exceed one hundred and fifty by five, it is then one goat and three Hikkas, that is to say, three Hikkas upon the hundred and fifty, and a goat upon the odd five; and upon one hundred and sixty camels, the Zakat is three Hikkas and two goats; and upon one hundred and seventy, three Hikkas and four goats; and upon one hundred and seventy-five, three Hikkas and one yearling colt; and upon any number from one hundred and eighty-six to one hundred and ninety-five, the Zakat is three Hikkas and a two-year old colt; and upon any number from one hundred and ninety-six to two hundred, the Zakat is four Hikkas; and in this manner is the Zakat to be calculated upon every fifty camels exceeding one hundred and fifty.—This arrangement is according to our doctors. Shafei alleges that when the number exceeds the hundred and twenty by one only, the Zakat is three two-year old colts; and if it amount to one hundred and thirty, it is one Hikka and two two-year old colts; after which the Zakat is calculated at a two-year old colt upon every forty camels, and a Hikka upon every fifty; the prophet, upon a particular occasion, having written to one of his Aumeels to this effect, without making any mention of a goat upon the odd five, and so forth. But our doctors, in support of their opinion, as above, cite the letters of the prophet to Omar, where he says, "upon every five camels the Zakat is one goat."

Female camels only lawful in the payment of Zakat.—AND it is to be observed that, in the payment of the Zakat of camels, females alone are lawful, because males are held to be lawful only in regard to their value,* such being recorded both in the sacred writings and in the traditions.

Camels of all descriptions included.—CAMELS of every description, whether Bactrian, Arabian, or others, are all included in these rules of Zakat, as the term camel [Shutr] is common to all.

Sect. II.—Of the Zakat of Horned Cattle.

One yearling due upon thirty kine, &c.—No Zakat is due upon fewer than thirty kine; and upon thirty kine, which feed on pasture for the greater part of the year, there is due at the end of the year a Zakat of one Tubbee, that is, a follower, or yearling calf, male or female; and upon forty kine there is due one Misna, or calf of two years, male or female, on the authority of the prophet; and where the number exceeds forty, the Zakat (according to HANEFEA) is to be calculated agreeably to this rule, so far as sixty; that is to say, if there be one animal more than the forty, there is an additional Zakat of the fortieth part of a Misna; and if two, of the twentieth part of a Misna; and so on to the number sixty.—What is here advanced accords with the Mabsoot; and the ground upon which it proceeds is that, in the sacred writings, the Zakat is particularly specified for any number between thirty and forty, and also for those of sixty and above, but none for the numbers between forty and sixty. Hasan states the doctrine of Haneefa to be in this case, that, on the numbers from forty to forty-nine, no excess Zakat whatever is due; and that upon fifty kine the Zakat is one Misna, and the fourth of a Misna, or the third of a Tubbee; because upon every Akid, or drove of even number, in a Nisab of cattle, such as thirty, forty, or fifty head Zakat is due, but not upon any intermediate number.—The two disciples say that no Zakat whatever is due upon any odd number between forty and fifty; and there is also one tradition of the opinion of Haneefa to this effect: and the reason they allege is, that the prophet said to Maaz, "Take not any thing from an Owkas of kine;" and he explained an Owkas to mean any number between forty and fifty. And upon sixty kine, the Zakat is two yearling calves, male or female: and upon seventy, one Misna and one Tubbee; and upon eighty, two Misnas: and upon ninety, three Tubbees: and upon one hundred, two Tubbees and one Misna: and thus on every ten head, a Misna and a Tubbee alternately, the prophet having ordained that the Zakat upon thirty kine should be a Tubbee; and that upon forty a Misna:—thus, upon one hundred and ten kine, the Zakat is two Misnas and one Tubbee; and upon one hundred and twenty, four Tubbees. The usual method, however, of calculating the Zakat upon large herds of cattle, is by dividing them into thirties or forties, imposing upon every thirty one Tubbee; or upon every forty one Misna.

Buffaloes are included with other horned cattle.—It is to be observed that buffaloes are included with kine in the laws of Zakat, these being also considered as a species of black cattle; but yet, in our country,* the buffalo is not regarded as of the black cattle species; whence it is that if a person were to make a vow, saying, "I will not eat of the flesh of black cattle," and were afterwards to eat buffalo beef, he would not be forsworn.

Sect. III.—Of the Zakat of Goats.

One goat due upon forty goats, &c.—No Zakat is due upon fewer than forty goats; and upon forty goats, which feed for the greater part of the year upon pasture, there is due, at the expiration of the year, a Zakat of one goat; and this Zakat suffices for any number from forty to one hundred and twenty: and if the number exceed one hundred and twenty, a Zakat of two goats is due from one hundred and twenty-one to two hundred: and if it exceed two hundred, a Zakat of three goats is due from two hundred and one to three hundred and ninety-nine: and if it amount to four hundred, the Zakat is four goats: and beyond four hundred the Zakat is one goat for every hundred: the prophet having thus ordained, and all the doctors uniting in this opinion. It is also to be observed, that the same rules of Zakat are applicable to sheep as to goats, the term (ghannem, in the tradition equally implying, both species.

Kids or lambs are not acceptable payment unless they be above a year old.—In the Zakat of goats or sheep, Sinnees are acceptable payment, but not Juzzas. This is the Zahir-Rawayet. Sinnees are kids which have entered on the second year; and Juzzas are such as have not yet completed their first year.—The two disciples have said that the Zakat may be paid with the Juzzas of sheep; and there is one opinion of Haneefa recorded to this effect; and the reasons are twofold; FIRST, the prophet has said, "The Zakat upon them consists of Juzzas and Sinnees;"—SECONDLY, sacrifice is fulfilled by the immolation of a Juzzza, and therefore Zakat may be also discharged by it. The ground upon which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds is also twofold; FIRST, a saying of Alee, "In Zakat nothing is acceptable short of a Sinnee;"—SECONDLY, in the Zakat of goats it is incumbent to give those of a middling size, and the Juzzas of sheep are not of that standard, being small; whence it is that the Juzzas of goats also are not acceptable in Zakat. With respect to the first reason urged by the two disciples, it may be replied, that by the term Juzzza, as mentioned in the tradition, is to be understood the Juzzas of camels, that is, yearling colts:

* That is to say, the price of a male is held to be lawful in Zakat, but not the animal.

* Meaning Persia or Hindostan.

and what they say of sacrifice is no rule, as that of a Juzza is approved (not by analogy, but) from the express words of the sacred text.

But males and females are equally acceptable.—In paying the Zakat of goats or sheep, males and females are equally acceptable; the term Shat, in the traditions applying indiscriminately to both genders.

Sect. IV.—Of the Zakat of Horses.

One Deenar per head due upon horses, or five Deenars per cent. on the total value.—

WHEN horses and mares are kept indiscriminately together, feeding for the greater part of the year on pasture, it is at the option of the proprietor either to give a Zakat of one Deenar per head for the whole, or to appreciate the whole, and give five Deenars per cent. upon the total value: and this last is the mode adopted by Ziffer. The two disciples maintain that no Zakat whatever is due upon horses, the prophet having ordained that Mussulmans should not be subject to ZAKAT for their horses or slaves. Hancefa in support of his doctrine, as above, states an ordinance issued by the prophet, in which he directed that the Zakat upon ordinary horses should be one Deenar, or ten Dirms, per head. And with respect to the ordinance above quoted by the two disciples, that applies solely to war-horses, and not to ordinary cattle.

Zakat not due upon droves consisting entirely either of males or of females.—No Zakat whatever is due upon a Nisab of horses consisting entirely of males, because in that there can be no increase by breeding; and, in like manner, there is no Zakat upon a Nisab consisting entirely of mares, for the same reason.—This is one tradition from Hancefa. There is another tradition from him, however, which says that a Zakat is due upon mares although there be no horses among them, as horses can be occasionally borrowed by the proprietor for the purpose of producing, whence increase may be had: but this is impossible with respect to droves consisting entirely of horses.

No Zakat due upon asses or mules, unless as articles of commerce.—THERE is no Zakat due upon asses or mules, the prophet having said, "With respect to Zakat upon asses and mules, I have received no revelation." But yet, if these animals be as articles of merchandise, a Zakat is due upon them, because, in the present times, Zakat is imposed upon the property involved in them the same as upon any other articles of traffick.

Sect. V.—Of the Zakat of Kids, and Calves, and Camels' Colts.

No Zakat due upon the young of herds or flocks until a year old.—No Zakat whatever is due (according to Hancefa) upon the young of goats, kine, or camels, which are under one year; that is to say, if a man were to purchase twenty-five camels' colts (for instance) or forty kids, or thirty calves, and one complete year should pass from the period of possession, still no Zakat is due: nor does any become due until the expiration of the term of a year after they shall have been grown up.

One camel's colt due on 25, &c.—ABOO YOOSAF holds that Zakat is not due upon fewer than forty kids, or thirty calves, or twenty-five camels' colts: and upon twenty-five camels' colts the Zakat is one colt: and there is no further Zakat due till the number amounts to seventy-six, when the Zakat is two colts; because upon seventy-six Misnas a Zakat is due of two Binnit-liboons; and there is no further Zakat till the number amounts to one hundred and forty-five, when it is three colts; because upon one hundred and forty-five Misnas the Zakat is two Hikkas and one Binnit-makhash. There are other traditions of the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf herein; but the above, as being a posterior record, supersedes them.

Case of the payment of Zakat by substitution.—If a person owe, as Zakat, a Misna, and it should happen that he is not possessed of one, having no cattle in his flocks but what are either under or over that description, the officer who collects the Zakat is at liberty either, in the former case to take an animal of the under rate, and the difference in money,—or, in the latter, to take one of a superior sort, paying the difference of value between that and a Misna to the proprietor. It is to be observed that, in the latter case, no constraint is to be put upon the collector, who is at liberty to insist upon either the actual thing due (to wit, a Misna), or the value of one in money, because the acceptance of an animal of the superior sort, on the terms above stated, wears the aspect of traffick; his acceptance of it, therefore, cannot be compelled, inasmuch that if the proprietor were to give him no obstruction in taking it, yet he is not considered as being seized of it; but the collector may be compelled to accept of an animal of an inferior sort, and the difference in money, inasmuch that if the proprietor merely give no obstruction to the officer, in thus taking the animal and the difference, he (the officer) is considered as being seized of the same; because here the transaction does not bear the aspect of purchase and sale, as the proprietor pays the inferior animal in part of the Misna, and consequently the difference along with it.

Substitution of the value lawful.—If a proprietor, in Zakat, should, in lieu of the actual thing due, pay the value in money, it is approved, according to our doctors; and the same holds good in expiation, or in the payment of Sadka-tittir, or Tythe, or the fulfilment of a vow. Shafei maintains that this is unlawful, because it is not lawful to exchange, for a substitute, anything specified in the sacred writings; as in sacrifice (for instance) where a substitution of value for the victim is illegal. The argument of our doctors is, that God has himself ordained Zakat, and has directed the same to be distributed in alms to the poor, which plainly indicates that the intent of the institution is merely that the poor should derive a subsistence from it, so as that their wants may be thereby relieved; and to effect this the value will answer equally well with the specific animal, wherefore the substitution of the value in payment of Zakat is legal, the same as in payment of Jazzeeyat, or capitation-tax: but this reasoning does not apply to sacrifice, as that is an act of piety, to the fulfilment of which the shedding of the blood of the victim is essential, wherefore no conclusion can be drawn from this instance, as there is no analogy between the two cases.

Labouring cattle exempt from Zakat.—CAMELS and oxen kept for the purpose of labour, such as carrying burthens, drawing the plough, and so forth, are not subject to Zakat; neither is any Zakat due upon them where they are fed one half of the year or more upon forage. Malik controverts this doctrine: but the arguments of our doctors herein are threefold: FIRST, the prophet has expressly ordained that these two species of cattle should be exempted from Zakat under such circumstances; SECONDLY, the cause of the obligation of Zakat consists in the possession of increasing property, and the increase of cattle can be conceived only under two circumstances, that is, their being either kept in pastures,* or for the purpose of traffick, neither of which is the case with the cattle now under consideration; THIRDLY, in cases where the cattle are fed upon forage, the keeping of them is attended with great expense, a circumstance which more than counterbalances any advantage to be derived from their breeding in such a situation, and therefore virtually prevents increase, although it may not actually do so.

* Must be paid in animals of a medium Value.—THE officer, in collecting Zakat, is not at liberty either to insist upon the best or to accept of the worst sort of the property collected upon, but must take what is of a medium standard, because the prophet has so ordained it; and also, because, in confining the Zakat to property of a medium value, regard is had at once to the interest of both the parties concerned, to wit, the poor and the proprietor.

Law respecting property acquired in the interim between the payments.—WHOEVER is possessed of a Nisab property, and obtains an addition of the same sort or species within the year, must add it to the Nisab, and pay Zakat upon the whole. Shafei objects to this, maintaining that the supervenient acquisition should not be added to the first Nisab, because the property of which that consists is original and independent with respect to propriety, and is therefore so with respect to Zakat likewise: contrary to acquisition by breed or profit obtained within the year, that being a dependant only of the original property, and, as such, not to be confounded with it. To this our doctors reply, that the reason for supervenient acquisition, by brood or profit, being added to the Nisab, is homogeneity in the subject of it; since, where the original and supervenient property are of the same species, it is not easy to discriminate precisely between them, and consequently difficult to ascertain the Hawlan-Hawl with respect to any species of profitable acquisition arising from original property; and, as the Hawlan-Hawl is regarded only for the sake of convenience, it therefore appears that homogeneity in the subject is a sufficient reason for the supervenient acquisition being added to the original property; and this reason exists in the present case.

Rules respecting the Afsoo.—THE two Sheikhs hold Zakat to be due upon the Nisab only, and not upon the Afsoo;* but Mohammed and Ziffer maintain it to be due upon both the Nisab and the Afsoo, that is, upon the whole: the result of which difference in opinion is that, if the Afsoo were to perish, and the Nisab to remain, then, according to the two Sheikhs, the whole Zakat that had been before obligatory still remains due; but, according to Mohammed and Ziffer, an adequate proportion of Zakat drops: and, in support of this latter opinion, Mohammed and Ziffer argue that Zakat is due as an acknowledgment for the blessings of Providence, and the Afsoo is a blessing the same as the Nisab; that is to say, they are both equally blessings, wherefore Zakat is equally due upon both. The argument upon which the Sheikhs support their opinion is twofold: FIRST, the prophet has expressly said, "THE ZAKAT upon five camels is one goat, and ZAKAT is not due upon any further number till it amount to ten;" and in like manner the prophet has ordained the Zakat upon every Nisab, and forbidden it upon the Afsoo; SECONDLY, the Afsoo is a dependant of the Nisab, whence, if a part of the whole Nisab and Afsoo were to perish, the loss would be first calculated upon the Afsoo, as being the dependant part; as in a contract of Mozaribat, where any accidental loss is first calculated upon the profit, and not upon the capital: and on this ground it is that Haneefa accounts the loss upon the Afsoo to the extent thereof, and beyond that upon the Nisab property of the first (or highest) denomination, and beyond that upon the Nisab of the next lower denomination, and so on to the last (or lowest) denomination of Nisab; because the Nisab of the highest denomination is the principal, to which all the

* Meaning, that where the cattle are suffered to go at large, as in pastures, the males have free access to the females, which produces breed.

* Afsoo literally means exempt. In the Zakat of cattle it is used to express any intermediate or odd number between one Nisab and another, as between twenty-five and thirty-six camels, for instance.

inferior Nisabs are dependants; and, according to Abou Yoosaf, the loss is calculated first upon the Afoe, and beyond that upon all the degrees or descriptions of Nisab collectively.

Case of Zakat being levied by the Rebels, or Schismatics.—If the rebels or schismatics overcome any particular tribe of Mussulmans, and take from them the Zakat of their cattle, when these rebels are driven away, the rightful Imam must not impose another Zakat upon that tribe, because it appears from the above circumstance that the Imam has not protected them, and the right of imposing Zakat appertains to the Imam, in virtue of the protection he affords; the learned however have decreed, upon this case, that the tribe in question should repeat their Zakat, and pay it a second time, but not their Tribute, because the latter is declared, in the sacred writings, to be applicable to the use of the warriors who fight their enemies; and hence rebels may be considered as an object of its application, they also answering this description; whereas the only object of the application of Zakat is the poor, and rebels do not bestow what they may levy upon the tribe, under that denomination, to the use of the poor; wherefore it is necessary that the tribe should again pay Zakat, so as that it may be applied to its proper object; but not their Tribute. Some of our doctors say, that if the aforesaid tribe, at the period of paying Zakat to the rebels, intend in so doing to give them alms, in this case Zakat drops with respect to that tribe, and there is no necessity for their afterwards repeating it; and the giving of Zakat to any tyrant or plunderer whatever is capable of this construction, because persons of this description, whatever wealth they may be apparently possessed of, are yet actually poor, on account of the retribution, which lies against them hereafter: but the former doctrine (that the tribe should repeat their Zakat) is preferable to this, because here the Zakat is rendered and applied, a certiori.

How far the Toglib tribe are subject to Zakat.—THE Zakat of cattle is not incumbent upon an infant of the tribe of Toglib;† and whatever is incumbent upon the men of that race is so upon the women also, because peace was made with them upon those terms, "that they should pay, of all publick imposts, double what as paid by Mussulmans;" now the Mussulman women are subject to Zakat, and it follows that the women of the Toglib race are so in a double proportion; but no Zakat whatever is required of infant Mussulmans, wherefore the infants of the aforesaid tribe are not subject to it.

An accidental destruction of the property induces an exemption from Zakat.—If the property be destroyed, without being consumed by the proprietor after Zakat has become due (that is to say, after the completion of Hawlan-Hawl), the Zakat upon it drops. Shafei has said that if the property be destroyed after the proprietor has been enabled to pay the Zakat upon it, either by the claimant making his demand of Zakat, or by the proprietor finding a claimant, although such claimant should not have demanded it, in this case the proprietor is responsible for the Zakat, because it was due from him, and he did not pay it, although it was in his power to have done so; moreover, if he should not pay the Zakat upon the requisition of the claimant, this circumstance stands as a destruction of it on his part. The argument of our doctors is, that the Zakat due is a portion or part of the Nisab; and, as its destruction is involved in that of the Nisab, it drops of course, the same as where a slave commits a Janayat [offence against the person], in which case it is incumbent upon the proprietor to make over that slave to the Walee-Janayat, or person intitled to the composition; but, if the slave should die or be lost in the interim, the proprietor is no longer responsible for the transfer of him, and that consequently drops; and, with respect to the second argument of Shafei, it may be replied, that no person can be considered as the claimant of Zakat except a pauper whom the proprietor may have specified as the object of its application, and the case does not suppose the requisition to be made by such an one. But if the collector demand the Zakat, and the proprietor neglect payment, and the Nisab afterwards perish, there are various opinions among the Hanefite doctors, some alleging that the proprietor of the destroyed Nisab, in that case, still remains responsible for the Zakat due upon it; whilst others maintain that, in this instance also, he is not responsible, because the Nisab does not here appear to have been destroyed by him.

A partial destruction includes a proportionable exemption.—If, after Hawlan-Hawl, a portion of a Nisab (such as a third for instance) should be destroyed, the claim of Zakat is proportionably destroyed, in the same manner as where the whole Nisab is destroyed; in which case the whole Zakat drops.

Zakat may be paid in advance.—If the proprietor of a Nisab should pay the Zakat upon it, before Hawlan-Hawl, it is lawful, because he has here paid it during the existence of the creative principle of obligation to Zakat, which is understood in his possession of a Nisab; this payment, therefore, is approved, the same as a discharge of a debt, under the existence of its cause; as where a Mohrim, for instance, pays expiation for wounding game whilst the animal is yet alive. This doctrine is controverted by Malik.

* This and the next following case are merely local in their application, and allude to the state of Arabia, shortly after the establishment of Islamism. The Schismatics were those who refused to submit to the law of the prophet; whilst others (like the tribe of Toglib, mentioned in the next case) submitted and paid tribute.

† One of the Arabian tribes, who refused to embrace the faith, but agreed to pay tribute to the prophet. The tribe itself is supposed to be long since extinct; but the laws to which the people of it were subject are applicable, in general, to all infidel tributaries.

If the proprietor of a single Nisab should, before Hawlan-Hawl, make payment of Zakat upon the same for a certain number of years in advance, or should pay a Zakat upon a certain number of additional Nisabs, it is approved, because the first Nisab is the original with respect to the cause of the obligation of Zakat, and anything beyond that is as a dependant.

CHAPTER III.

OF ZAKAT FROM PERSONAL EFFECTS.

Set. I.—Of the Zakat of Silver.

No Zakat due on less than 200 dirms.—No Zakat is due on less than two hundred Dirms,* because the prophet has ordained that there shall be no Zakat upon fewer than five Awkiyat,† and an Awkiyat is valued at forty Dirms.

And upon 200 at the rate of two and an half per cent.—THE Zakat Nisab of silver is two hundred Dirms; and if a man becomes possessed of two hundred Dirms, and the Hawlan-Hawl be completed, the Zakat due upon it is five Dirms, because the prophet wrote to Maaz, saying, "Upon two hundred Dirms take a ZAKAT of five Dirms; and upon twenty MISKALS of gold, half a MISKAL."

And at the same rate upon every forty above two hundred.—No Zakat is due upon any excess above the two hundred Dirms, till such excess amount to forty, upon which the Zakat is one Dirm: and upon every succeeding forty the same Zakat is due, but not on fewer than forty. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples have said that a proportionate Zakat is due on whatever excess may occur over and above two hundred Dirms; and Shaf'ii coincides in this opinion, because in the traditions of Alee it is related that the prophet has so ordained it; and also, because Zakat is rendered as a return of gratitude for the blessings of Providence; and the reason why it is expressed as a condition, in the beginning of this book, that the property, in order to cause an obligation of Zakat, amount to a Nisab, is that the proprietor may thence appear to be in easy circumstances; but where, from his being possessed of a Nisab, this appears to be already the case, it is not requisite that any excess amount to a Nisab; and hence Zakat is due upon such excess proportionably, whatever its amount may be.

OBJECTION.—This would lead to a conclusion that, in the Zakat of cattle, the same is due upon any excess under a Nisab; whereas the rule is otherwise, no Zakat whatever being due upon such excess, since that is considered as Afsoo, or exempt.

REPLY.—Such is the conclusion from analogy; but the excess in cattle is made Afsoo, because, if a proportionate Zakat were to be levied upon it, this would necessarily induce a copartnership in the subject, by the proprietor admitting the claimant of Zakat to a share in it:—for instance, the Zakat upon twenty-five camels is one yearling colt; now, if Zakat were due upon excess camels, and the drove consist of twenty-six there would be a Zakat upon this one excess camel of the twenty-fifth part of a yearling colt, which is not payable in any way than by admitting the claimant to a partnership in such colt; and this partnership, being compulsive, is illegal; but plate or cash not being liable to the same objection, a Zakat is due, proportionably, upon any excess whatever over two hundred Dirms.

Rules respecting the calculation of a Nisab of silver.—It is to be observed, that the Nisab of silver of two hundred Dirms is calculated by the Wazn-sebbayat, or septimal weight (which is in the proportion of ten Dirms to seven Miskals), as this was the weight used in the tribunal of Omar, and that of the Dirm is thence established.

Those Dirms in which silver predominates are to be accounted as silver; and the laws respecting silver apply to them, although they should contain some alloy; and the same rule holds with all articles whatever falling under the denomination of plate, such as cups, goblets, and so forth; but Dirms, in which the alloy predominates, are not to be accounted as silver, but only as trading property, estimable by its real value, to which alone regard is to be had; and accordingly, if the value of them amount to a Nisab, they are subject to Zakat, provided there be an intention of trafficking in them; as is the condition with respect to all other chattels. In all plate, therefore, in which the alloy prevails, respect is to be had to the intention of trafficking in it, excepting where the silver contained in it amounts to a Nisab, in which case the intention of trade is not a condition, nor is any regard paid to the estimated value, because in actual silver no respect is had to either of these. The above case is thus stated; because money always contains a small portion of alloy, as pure silver is unfit for coinage, since, without being hardened by an addition of some base

* A silver coin, value about two pence sterling.

† An ounce of silver; or a silver coin of that weight, value between six and seven shillings.

metal, it cannot retain the mint impression; but the alloy is generally in the smaller proportion; regard therefore is had to excess; that is to say, if the proportion of silver be the greater it is accounted as silver, but not if the alloy be in greater proportion (that is, in a proportion above a moiety of the whole weight).

Sect. II. of the Zakat of Gold.

No Zakat due upon less than 20 Miskals; and upon 20 at the rate of two and an half per cent.—THERE is no Zakat on fewer than twenty Miskals of gold, this sum being the smallest that constitutes a Nisab in that metal; and the Zakat upon twenty Miskals of gold is one half Miskal, when the Hawlan-Hawl therein becomes established, on the authority of the tradition before quoted.—By the Miskal* here mentioned, is to be understood that which weighs in the proportion of seven Miskals to ten Dirms; and the Miskal consists of twenty Kerat,† and the Kerat of five grains.

And at the same rate upon every four above twenty.—WHEN the quantity of gold exceeds twenty Miskals, on every four Miskals of such excess a Zakat of two Kerats is due, because the Zakat due is a fortieth of the whole, and two Kerats are the fortieth of four Miskals and upon any excess short of four Miskals no Zakat is due, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold that on every excess there is a proportionable Zakat, the same as mentioned in the preceding section; and the foundation of their difference in opinion is also the same here as was there recited, to wit, Haneefa holds that broken numbers are free of impost, whereas the two disciples maintain the contrary opinion. The ground upon which Haneefa proceeds, in the rule here cited, is this: the legal value of a Deenar is ten Dirms, and a Deenar and Miskal are of the same weight; the value of four Miskals in gold is therefore forty Dirms; and consequently no Zakat is due upon fewer than four Miskals, since these stand the same as forty Dirms: and it has been already shown that nothing short of forty Dirms is subject to Zakat, on account of the tradition of Amroo Bin Khurram, as before recited.

General rule.—ZAKAT is due upon gold and silver bullion, which is termed Tebbur: and in like manner upon ornaments or utensils of gold or silver, whether the use thereof be allowable (such as rings, and so forth) or otherwise.‡—Shafei maintains there is no Zakat upon the gold or silver ornaments of women, nor upon rings worn by men, the use of which is allowable, and which are therefore the same in this respect as clothing or articles of apparel.—The argument of our doctors is, that the cause of the obligation to Zakat still continues in the present case:—moreover, articles of gold and silver do, in their own nature, afford an argument of increase in the subject, since these metals are brought into use principally for the purpose of facilitating exchanges by traffick, which affords an argument of increase; and it is the virtual and not the actual increase in any subject that creates the obligation to Zakat upon it; contrary to the case of articles of apparel, which afford no argument or probability of increase.

*Sect. III. of the Zakat of personal Chattel Property.

Zakat due upon all merchandize.—ZAKAT is due upon articles of merchandize, of whatever description, where the value amounts to a Nisab either of gold or silver, because the prophet ordained that articles of merchandize should be appraised, and that a Zakat be paid on the same, in the proportion of five Dirms upon every two hundred,† as the proprietor has prepared and keeps them with a view to increase, so that they resemble gold and silver, which the law holds to be kept for the same purpose; and, as Zakat is due upon the latter, it is in like manner due upon the former: but the intention of trade in these articles is made a condition, in order that it may be ascertained that they are kept with a view to increase.

Mode of ascertaining the Nisab of merchandize.—MOHAMMED says that, in estimating the value of articles of merchandize with a view to the imposition of Zakat upon them, they should be resolved into such Nisabs as may be most advantageous to the poor; thus if, in valuing an article by Dirms, it would amount to a Nisab of silver, and in valuing the same by Deenars, it would not amount to a Nisab of gold, it must be estimated by Dirms; and, vice versa, if its value should appear to amount to a Nisab of gold, it is to be estimated by Deenars.—The com-

‡ This alludes to prohibition against the use of the precious metals in certain articles of personal ornament and household furniture, which have been at various times issued by the prophet and his followers as checks upon luxury. (See Abominations.)

* In the original, personal chattels are expressed by the terms Rakht and Mata, of which it is not easy to give any literal translation; they express, in general, all articles which appertain to personal estate or effects [Mal]: articles of gold and silver, it is true, do also fall under this general description of Rakht and Mata; but they are introduced under a different head, as the laws of Zakat, with respect to them, are of a peculiar nature, and such as do not affect or apply to other articles of personal property.

piler of the Hedaya observes that there is one opinion recorded from Haneefa to the same effect. Mohammed again, in the Mabsoof, has said that the proprietor of the article has it in his option to estimate it at whatever species of Nisab he pleases, because gold and silver are standards, and in estimating the value of effects are both equally proper.—It is recorded as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that an article should be estimated by that with which it was purchased: thus, if it has been purchased with Dirms, it is to be appraised in Dirms; and if with Deenars it is to be appraised in Deenars: and if it should have been purchased with any other than either of these, it is to be estimated in money of the most general currency.—It is on the other hand recorded, as an opinion of Mohammed, that whatever the purchase may have been made with, the estimate is to be in current money, as above, in the same manner as that of property forcibly seized, which is thus estimated in all cases.

Property not exempted by an intervening defect in it.—If a Nisab be complete in the beginning of the year, and also at the end, Zakat does not drop on account of its having been defective at any time within that period; because it is difficult to ascertain its completeness through the intermediate space; moreover, in the commencement of the year its completeness is requisite, in order to the establishment of the cause of obligation, and so also at the close of the year, in order to Zakat becoming due; but it is not so within the interval.

Other chattel property may be united with money or bullion to form a Nisab.—THE value of personal effects, or other articles, may be united with gold or silver; that is to say, if (for instance) the proprietor should have effects estimated at the value of one hundred Dirms, and also one hundred Dirms in money, the value of the effects, as above, must be added to the one hundred Dirms, so as that the whole may make one Nisab; and Zakat is due thereon, because the obligation to Zakat, in such property, is occasioned by the circumstance of its being kept with a view to traffick, although the shape in which it is so kept be different with respect to each of the two descriptions of it, traffick in chattels being established by the act of the individual, but that in money by the construction of the law.

And also silver with gold.—GOLD and silver may in the same manner be united, both being in effect of one nature, as standards of estimation, and the possession of each equally causing the obligation to Zakat.

GOLD and silver may be united, according to Haneefa, in respect to their value;* but, according to the two disciples, in respect to their parts: and the consequence of this difference of opinion is, that if a man were possessed (for instance) of one hundred Dirms in silver, and five Miskals of gold (the value of which would amount to one hundred Dirms), this person would be subject to Zakat according to Haneefa, but not so according to the disciples; for these latter say that, in ascertaining the Zakat of gold and silver, regard is to be had to the quantity only, and not to the value; whence it is that Zakat is not due upon a vessel of silver, where the weight is short of two hundred Dirms, although the value should be to that amount, or beyond it: Aboo Haneefa, on the other hand, contends that gold and silver are united with each other on account of their homogeneity, which is established between them in respect to their value, but not in respect to their substance.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE LAWS RESPECTING THOSE WHO COME BEFORE THE COLLECTOR.

Declarations respecting property, when made upon oath, to be credited.—If a person come with his property* before the collector and say, "It is so many months since this property has come into my possession, and a year has not yet elapsed;" or, "I am indebted so and so," and make oath of the same, the collector is to credit him, and must not exact anything, because this person stands as a defendant denying his obligation to Zakat; and the declaration of a defendant, when supported by his oath, must be credited. So also, if a person were to declare that he had already paid the Zakat upon such property to a former collector, his declaration must be credited, because the collector, in taking Zakat, acts merely as a Trustee, and the Zakat comes to and remains with him as a deposit; and the declaration of the above person amounts only to his having deposited the trust in its proper place, and this is to be credited, provided there should have been another collector there within that year; but if, on the contrary, there should have been no other collector on that station within the current year, the affirmation and oath are not to be credited, since, in this case, the falsehood is manifest. And, in like manner, if the proprietor were to declare that he had already paid the Zakat upon such property in his own city, by having there bestowed the same upon the poor, his declaration must be credited, because a proprietor, whilst in his own city, is entrusted with the payment and distribution of the Zakat upon his property, and he continues to be so until he comes forth and brings his property before the collector, when the authority for levying

* Meaning merchandize, but not cattle; and the word bears the same sense throughout this chapter.

Zakat rests with the latter, as the property and the proprietor do both then come within his jurisdiction.—In short, in all these four instances, the declaration of the proprietor is to be credited. And in the same manner the declaration of a proprietor, respecting Zakat upon cattle, is to be credited in the three first instances, but it is not so in the fourth, although he should confirm his attestation by an oath. Shafei maintains that it is to be credited here also, as the proprietor appears, by the tenor of his declaration, to have rendered the right duly to the claimant.—In opposition to this, our doctors argue that the right of exacting the Zakat upon cattle appertains solely to the Sultan, and the proprietor is not at liberty to preclude the Sultan's right: contrary to the case of property of other nature, such as is termed, in the language of the law, Batena [internal, or domestic], the rendering of the Zakat upon which is committed to the proprietor.—It is to be observed that some have said, respecting cattle, that the Zakat which was paid by the proprietor himself in the first instance is the true obligatory Zakat, and that whatever may be afterwards exacted of him under that denomination, is consequently an oppression; whilst others maintain that this latter is to be considered as the obligatory Zakat, and the former to be held as an act Nifl, or gratuitous; and this last doctrine is approved.—Now a question here arises, as the assertion of the proprietor is to be credited, whether he ought to produce his writing of discharge [voucher] or not?—Mohammed, in the Jama Sagheer, has not required this as a necessary condition; but in the Mabsoot he has made it a condition; and this latter opinion (according to a tradition of Hoosn) is that of Abou Haneefa. The principle of this doctrine is, that as the proprietor pleads a discharge, and as he possesses a voucher of such discharge, he ought consequently to produce it; whilst the principle of the doctrine maintained in the Zahir-Rawayet is that as one writing resembles another writing, they are not admitted as proofs.

Declarations of Zimmies to be credited.—IN whatever instance the declaration of a Mussulman, with respect to Zakat, is to be credited, that of a Zimmee† must be so likewise, because a Zimmee is subject to double the impost of a Mussulman: and hence all the conditions which are to be regarded, with respect to the property of the latter, must be equally so with respect to that of the former.

But not those of Aliens.—If an alien appear before the collector of the Sultan with articles of merchandize, it behoves that officer to exact from him what is usually exacted of aliens, without paying any regard to his declarations in those points in which the declarations of a Mussulman or Zimmee are to be credited, although he should swear to the same, excepting where he declares, concerning his female slaves, that those slaves are his Am-Walids;* for, in all other species of property, his affirmation is not worthy of attention, because the impost which is thus levied upon him is not in fact Zakat,† but rather a contribution exacted as a return for the protection he receives, and which is requisite for the safeguard of whatever he may possess; it is therefore proper to take from him the impost usually levied upon aliens, except where he declares, as above, with respect to his female slaves, that they are his Am-Walids, which declaration must be attended to and credited; because, if an alien were to declare, concerning any other persons who accompany him, that "they are his children," his declaration is approved; and so, in like manner, with respect to his female slaves, as the rights of the Am-Walid are derived from the establishment of the child's descent, and consequently the female slaves do not appear to be transferable property; and nothing but transferable property is an object of taxation.

Proportion levied upon merchandize.—FROM a Mussulman is taken the fourth of the tithe of his property; and from a Zimmee the half of the tithe; and from an alien the tithe; Omar having instructed his collectors to this effect.

Zakat to be levied on the property of aliens, to the value of fifty Dirms, or upwards.—If an alien should come before the collector with property to the amount only of fifty Dirms, nothing whatsoever is to be exacted of him, except where aliens exact contribution upon an equally small property of Mussulmans; in which case a similar impost must be laid upon this amount, the property of an alien, because what is taken from aliens is merely in the way of reciprocity; contrary to the case of Mussulmans or Zimmeers; as what is levied upon them is in fact Zakat, either single or twofold, whence it is indispensable that the property with them amount to a Nisab.—This is the doctrine of the Jama Sagheer. In the Mabsoot, under the title Zakat, it is written that if the property of an alien should be small (that is, short of a Nisab), nothing whatever is to be exacted of him, let the custom of aliens, in this respect, be what it may, because a proportion of property not amounting to Nisab is invariably to be considered as Afoo, or exempt; and also, because a trifle of this sort is not sup-used to stand in need of the State's protection, as travellers must necessarily carry with them small sums for the purpose of expenses, and robbers do not pay any attention to such trifles, not considering them objects of their pursuit.

Proportion to be levied upon the property of aliens.—If an alien come before the collector with two hundred Dirms, and it be uncertain what tax foreigners levy upon a similar property of Mussulmans, in this case the tax is to be taken; and if it be known that foreign states exact only a twentieth or a fortieth, a similar proportion is to be taken; but if it be known that they take the whole, yet the Mussulman collector must not act accordingly, because this is an act of rapine. And if it be known that they take nothing of the Mussulmans, it is then proper that nothing be taken from them, in order that the Mussulman merchants, travelling into foreign countries, may remain free of impost; and also, because where foreign states observe kindness towards Mussulmans, and exact nothing of them, it is requisite that nothing be exacted of them in return, as it behoves the Mussulmans to preserve a character of benevolence towards all men.

Must not be exacted repeatedly.—If an alien come before the collector, and the collector exact the tithe of him, and he should again pass near the station of the collector, yet nothing more is to be exacted till the completion of the Hawlan-Hawl, because, if the tithe were to be repeatedly levied within the year, the property would be annihilated, and the impost is laid for the purpose of protecting the property; moreover, the protection which is first granted continues until the beginning of a new year, when the Aman, or protection, commences de novo, because it is not permitted to an alien to remain in a Mussulman territory beyond the space of a year. But the tax may be again demanded of him at the expiration of the second year, as this does not tend to annihilate his property.—What is here advanced proceeds upon the supposition that the alien has not returned into his own country within the period of the year, after his payment of the tithe, as aforesaid; but if he should return thither, it is to be again exacted of him upon his re-entering the Mussulman territory, even though he were to go there on the very day of payment, and to come again into the Mussulman territory on the same day, because every time he thus returns into the Mussulman territory, he returns under the virtue of a new protection; moreover, the repetition of exaction upon his return cannot be considered as tending to annihilate his property, since on every return he is supposed to acquire a profit.

Zakat-tithe to be levied on wine.—If a Zimnee, or infidel subject, pass the station of a collector with wine and pork, the collector is to levy a tithe upon the former article, but not upon the latter. By levying a tithe upon the wine, is to be understood (not upon the actual article, but) upon the estimated value of the article. The distinction here made between wine and pork, is taken from the Zahir-Rawayet.—Shafei says, that nothing whatever should be levied on either pork or wine, neither being legally subjects of estimation. Ziffer, on the other hand, argues that it should be levied equally upon both, as both do equally constitute property among Zimnees. Aboo Yoosaf also says that the tax should be levied upon both, provided that they be found together upon the Zimnee; but possibly he is here to be understood as making the pork an appendage to the wine, whence it is that he adds "if the Zimnee were to come before the collector with either wine or pork, singly, the tenth would be levied on the former but not upon the latter."—The reasons upon which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds, in this case, are twofold; FIRST, the estimated value of a thing which falls under the description of Zoootal-Keem stands as the identical thing itself, and pork is of this class; whereas the value of an article belonging to the class of Zoootal-Imfal does not stand in place of the identical articles, and wine is of this description; SECONDLY, the right of exacting the tenth is vested in the collector in consequence of the protection afforded by the state; and a Mussulman has a right to take measures for the preservation of his wine, for the purpose of making vinegar of the same, whence it is also lawful for him to protect the wine of a Zimnee; whereas he is not permitted to take any of his pork, insomuch that if a Zimnee, being possessed of pork, were to be converted to the faith, it would be incumbent on him to destroy it or throw it away; and a Mussulman not being allowed to take care of his own pork, it follows that he is not competent to the protection of the pork of others; and hence the state not being considered as affording protection to the pork of a Zimnee, no tax can be levied upon it.

If a boy or a woman of the Toghleb tribe pass the station of a collector, with property, nothing is to be taken from the former, but he must exact from the latter the usual proportion of persons of that tribe, according to what is said concerning the Zakat of cattle. If a person come to the collector with one hundred Dirms, declaring that he has another hundred at home, and that the Hawlan-Hawl has elapsed, yet the collector is not at liberty to take Zakat either upon those hundred or upon the other; because the one does not come under his protection, and the other is short of a Nisab.

No Zakat to be levied on Bazat or Mozaribat property.—If a person come to the collector with two hundred Dirms, which are with him as a Bazat, the collector must not impose any Zakat upon it,—because this person is not empowered by the actual proprietor to pay Zakat: and so also, if that property were in his hands in the way of Mozaribat. This is the doctrine of the two disciples; and Haneefa has also subscribed to it; and the reason upon which it is founded is that the Mozarib is neither the actual proprietor, nor the representative of the proprietor, with respect to the payment of Zakat : wherefore Zakat is not to be required, except where the Mozarib, by the nature of the contract, derives such a proportion of profit from the capital stock entrusted to him as amounts to a Nisab ; in which case a proportionable Zakat must be levied, as he is the actual proprietor of such proportion.

Mazoon slaves subject to it.—If a Mazoon slave, not indebted to any person, come before the collector with two hundred Dirms, the Zakat must be levied.—Abou Yoosaf says, that it is not known whether Haneefa ever retracted this opinion, and delivered another (that the collector should not levy Zakat upon a Mazoon) or not ; but from his subscribing to the opinion of the two disciples in the preceding case (to wit, that no Zakat is to be levied upon a Mozarib), it may be presumed that he has also agreed that none is to be levied upon a Mazoon, as he is not the proprietor, but his master, the former having only a power of transaction, with respect to the property in question, so that he stands in the same predicament with a Mozarib.—Some have said, that between a Mazoon and a Mozarib there is this difference, that the former transacts with the property on his own account, and hence is subject to its obligations ; for, as he cannot have recourse to his master, but may be sold, in order to the fulfilment of such of its obligations as he is legally liable to, it follows that he does stand in need of protection for it upon his own account : contrary to a Mozarib, for he manages the Mozaribat stock in the manner of an agent, and hence whatever may attach to him in the obligations thereof he takes again from the proprietor, wherefore the owner of the property is the person who requires protection for it : and there thus appearing an essential difference between a Mazoon and a Mozarib, no inference can be drawn of Haneefa's opinion respecting the former, from what he has conceded concerning the latter.

Unless accompanied by their owners.—It is to be observed that if the master of the Mazoon accompany him, the collector must take the Zakat (not from the Mazoon, but) from the master, he being the actual proprietor ; the Zakat, therefore, is to be taken from him, except where it appears that the slave is indebted to such an amount as comprehends the property in question ; in which case no Zakat whatever can be required of the master, since (according to Haneefa) the master, in this circumstance has, in fact, no actual property in the Mazoon's hands ;—and (according to the two disciples) the right of another is connected with the property, namely, the debt—and consequently no Zakat is due upon it, they holding that debt upon a property forbids the exaction of Zakat.

• If a merchant, being in a country where the Schismatics prevail, go to a collector of the Schismatics, and there pay the Zakat upon his property, and afterwards come before a collector of the Orthodox, the latter may again exact Zakat of him, because, in going before a collector of the Schismatics, and there paying Zakat, he was in fault. ◦

CHAPTER V.

OF MINES AND BURIED TREASURES.

Distinctions.—THERE are three legal terms which particularly belong to these subjects, and which are employed for the use of distinction ; Madin, Kanz, and Rikaz : by Madin is understood the place in which the ore or metal is naturally produced ; by Kanz, treasure, or other property, buried in the ground ;* and Rikaz applies equally to either, to Madin literally, and to Kanz metaphorically.

Mines subject to a Zakat of one-fifth.—If there be discovered, in Kherajee or Ashoorree lands (that is, lands subject to tithe or tribute), a mine of gold, silver, iron, lead, or copper, it is subject to a Zakat of one-fifth, according to bur doctors ; and this Zakat is termed Kahms.—Shafei has asserted that nothing whatever is due upon a mine, because it is free to the first finder indifferently, and is therefore the same as game ; but yet, if the metal be produced from the mine, it is subject to Zakat independent of Hawlan-Hawl, that having been constituted as a condition of Zakat merely to afford time for increase, whereas here the identical subject itself (the metal) is increase of property ; wherefore the lapse of Hawlan-Hawl is not in this instance required. The arguments of our doctors, on this subject, are twofold ;—FIRST, the ordinance of the prophet, who directed that upon Rikaz there should be imposed a fifth ; and the term Rikaz applies to mines, as was already demonstrated ;—SECONDLY, the mine, as being discovered in tithe or tribute lands, must at one period have been the property of the infidels, and afterwards have fallen into possession of the Mussulmans by conquest, wherefore the whole falls under the description of Ghaneemat, or plunder ; and one-fifth is due upon plunder :—contrary to the case of game, the property in which cannot be traced to any antecedent proprietor.

OBJECTION.—If the mine be thus resolved into plunder, it should follow that, as such, the product of it is the common property of all the warriors.

REPLY.—The property of the warriors is

* This is a common practice in all parts of Asia. Treasures are hidden in the ground on the commencement of a war, or other troubles ; and it frequently happens that, the depositors perishing, the treasure remains concealed, perhaps, for many years, till it be discovered by accident, and at a time when no legal claimant can be found.

† Literally, a fifth. It is elsewhere translated double tithe.

established in the mine constructively, in virtue of the establishment of their property on the surface of the territory: but the discoverer of the mine is the actual acquirer of it; wherefore the property of the warriors is established in one-fifth, their right being only instructive; and that of the discoverer is established in the remaining four-fifths, as his right is actual; whence it is that those four-fifths are reserved to him.

Case of a mine within a house.—If a person recover a mine within the precincts of his habitation, nothing is due upon it, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold that a fifth is due upon that also, in conformity to the traditional ordinance already quoted, because that applies equally to the present case. Haneefa argues upon this, that mine is a constituent part of the land in which it lies, as being supposed to have been originally created with it, and nothing being due upon the ground generally, it follows that nothing is due upon any particular portion of it (such as the mine, for instance), because a part does not differ from the whole: contrary to the case of a Kanz, which is no constituent part of the soil, as not having been originally created with it, but deposited there by some person.

Or in lands which are private property.—If the said mine be discovered, not actually the house of the finder, but in lands, subject either to the tribute or tithe, which are his own especial and exclusive property, in this case there are two opinions recorded of Haneefa's doctrine; one, that no Zakat whatever is due, any more than if the mine had been discovered within the house of the finder; another, that a fifth is due upon it: the former of these opinions is mentioned in the Mabsoot, and the latter in the Jama Sagher; and the principle upon which the latter opinion proceeds is, that between a house and lands there is a manifest distinction, because the ground on which a house stands is not supposed to be any way productive of the fruits of the earth (whence it is that no tax of any kind is levied upon it, inasmuch that, a date-tree were by accident to grow within dwelling, and to produce fruit, yet nothing is due upon the fruit), whereas lands, on the contrary, as being productive, are not thus exempted from tithe and tribute, and consequently a fifth is due upon all mines which are found in them.

And of buried treasures.—If a person find a Kanz, or deposit, of buried treasure, a fifth is due upon it, according to the opinions of all the doctors, in conformity to the traditional ordinance already quoted, the expression there used [Rikaz] applying to Kanz. It is to be observed, however, that if the treasure in question be coin, bearing the impression of Mussulman money (such as the words of the Creed*), the Kanz stands as a Lookta, or trove-property, the laws concerning which are explained elsewhere:—yet, if it bear the impression of infidel coinage (such as the image of a saint or idol), a fifth is due upon it in all cases,—that is to say, whether a person may have found the same in his own grounds, or in those of another, or in common lands which are not the property of any person; and the fifth is thus due upon the authority of the traditional ordinance to which we have just referred.—It is here proper to remark, that if the treasure be found in common land, four-fifths of it appertain to the finder, as having recovered it, because the other warriors had no information concerning it, and of course no share in the discovery; and consequently he has an exclusive right to it:—and the same rule obtains if it be found in appropriated land, whether such be his own property, or belonging to another (according to Abou Yoosaf), because the claim is established in virtue of salvage, or recovery, and the treasure has been recovered by the finder.

—Mohammed and Haneefa maintain, on the contrary, that the treasure is the property of him upon whom the Imam had bestowed the lands, originally, at the period of subjugation, who is termed the Mokhattut-lehoo, or first grantee, upon the principle that whoever has the first exclusive property in a soil is the true proprietor of whatsoever may be contained in it, although he should not have obtained visible possession thereof,—the same as where a person catches a fish with a pearl in its maw, in which case he becomes the proprietor of the pearl, although he has not actually laid his hands upon it, nor knows of its being in the fish's belly.* And it is further to be observed, that if the first grantee should have sold his lands, yet he does not forfeit his right to any Kanz, or buried treasure, which may be afterwards discovered there, as that does not form a part of the soil, like mines, which, as being a constituent portion of it, upon a transfer by sale become the property of the purchaser. And if the first grantee be unknown, in this case, according to the opinion of the learned, the four-fifths go to him who was the first known proprietor from the period of the establishment of the Mussulman faith, that is to say, him beyond whom no antecedent proprietor can be discovered.—And if the treasure should consist of coin, the impression of which is so far effaced as to render it doubtful whether it be infidel or Mussulman tithe from those articles;—SECONDLY, articles of product are often cultivated which are not of a permanent nature, such as melons and cucumbers; and these are the increase of the earth: and the cause of obligation to the payment of Zakat upon land is increase; whence it is that the land is subject to tribute, and therefore tithe is also due: but, with respect to the articles of wood, bamboos, and grass, the ground is not tilled or prepared for the cultivation of them; nay, it is usual to clear them away:—yet, if a person were to till the ground with a view to the culture of such articles, his land would be subject to tithe.

* This is a case of some curiosity, and affords an instance (among a multitude of others) of points of law adduced in elucidation of passages to which they do not appear to have an immediate reference.—From the above it appears, that if a man were to catch a fish with a jewel in its belly, and were to sell the fish (not knowing what it contained), he would have a right to recover the jewel of the purchaser.

Meaning the Kulma, or Mussulman Confession of faith, "There is no God, but one God, and Mohammed is the prophet of God."

And an half tithe upon the product of lands watered by artificial means.—LANDS watered by means of buckets, or machinery, or watering-camels, are subject to half tithe, according to Haneefa and the two disciples:—the latter, however, coincide in this, under the restriction, conditional, that the produce of a permanent nature, and that the quantity of product amount to five Wusks; whereas Haneefa does not specify any such condition.—The reason why such lands are made subject to half tithe only is, that the expense of tillage greatly exceeds that of lands watered by rains, or by the periodical overflow of great rivers.

Rule respecting lands which partake of both descriptions.—WITH respect to lands watered a part of the year by rivers and a part by labour, in regulating their proportion of impost, regard is to be had to the greater portion of the year; that is to say, if the land be such as is watered by rivers for the greater part of the year, the impost is a tithe; but, if it be watered for the greater part of the year by labour, it is only half tithe, or a twentieth.

ABOO YOOSAF has said that, upon every article the amount of which is not estimated by Wusks (such as saffron and cotton), tithe due, provided its value be equal to that of five Wusks of an article of the lowest value estimable (such as millet in the present times); because articles, the quantity of which the law does not hold to be estimable by Wusks, can have their Nisab ascertained only by estimation of the value; as is the case with articles of merchandize.—Mohammed, on the other hand, alleges that tithe due upon those articles, provided their quantity amount to the number five of the highest standard of ascertainment of quantity with respect to each; for instance, cotton is weighed by Mans and Hamls, each haml containing three Mans; a Nisab of cotton therefore consists of five Hamls: saffron, on the other hand, is weighed by dirhams, Astars, Rutls, and Mans; and the latter being the greatest of these, a Nisab of saffron, consequently, consists of five Mans eight.—The reason upon which Mohammed proceeds herein is, that the Wusk is constituted the standard of estimation of Nisab in grain, &c. only on account of its being the largest standard by which their quantities can be ascertained; and the same principle operates with respect to all other articles.

A tithe due upon honey.—TITHE is due upon honey where it is collected in tithe-lands. Shafei maintains that nothing is due upon honey, because that is an animal production, the same as silk, which being tithe-free, honey is so likewise.—The arguments of our doctors are twofold: FIRST, the prophet ordained that honey should be subject to tithe; SECONDLY, bees collect their honey from blossoms and fruits, which articles being subject to tithe, it follows that honey, which is extracted from those, must be so likewise: contrary to the case of silk worms, because those feed upon leaves of trees, which are not subject to tithe. Haneefa holds tithe to be due upon honey, whether the quantity be great or small; he not regarding Nisab as essential in this article.—ABOO YOOSAF has reported it as an opinion of Haneefa, that the Nisab of honey is to be ascertained by estimate, according to his general tenet upon the subject, of Zakat; and he further says, that nothing is due upon honey, unless the quantity amount to ten Kirbs (a Kirb being fifty Mans), because this was the rule by which the tribe of Syara paid tithe on their honey to the prophet. Again, it is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that a Nisab of honey consists of five Mans. According to Mohammed the Nisab in honey is five Sirks (a Sirk containing thirty-six Rutls), because the Sirk is the largest standard of quantity in honey, as the Wusk is in grain. And the same of sugar-cane; that is to say, according to Mohammed, tithe is due upon sugar-cane where the quantity of sugar produced from it amounts to five Sirks.

And upon wild honey and fruits.—HONEY and fruits, collected in the wilderness, are subjects of tithe. This is the doctrine of the Zahir-Rawayet.—It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that nothing whatever is due upon such articles, because the occasion of obligation to Zakat is the land being of a productive nature, which is not the case in this instance.—The principle upon which the Zahir-Rawayet proceeds herein is, that all that is required to constitute land being productive, is the circumstance of its affording produce of any sort; and produce does appear in the articles above mentioned.

And upon all the product of tithe lands, indiscriminately.—TITHE is due upon all the produce of tithe-lands indiscriminately; nor is any deduction to be made on account of the expense of men or cattle employed in tilling those lands, because the prophet has ordained that dues should be different in proportion to the difference of expense, and also that lands watered by rain shall be subject to tithe, and those watered by labour to half-tithe; wherefore the deduction of expense is needless.

To wit, a twentieth of the whole product.

And double tithe upon those lands when held by Toglebees.—UPON tithe lands, possessed by persons of the TOGLEB tribe, a two-fold Ashar, or fifth, must be levied; and in this all the doctors agree.—It is recorded, however, as an opinion of Mohammed, that upon tithe lands which may have been purchased by a Toglebee of a Mussulman, a single tithe only should be levied; he holding that the imposition upon lands does not suffer any alteration in consequence of a transition of the property.

Cases of transition of property in land subject to double tithe.—If a Zimmee, or infidel subject, purchase land of a Toglebee, from which double tithe had used to be collected, the Zimmee must also pay double tithe upon it. In this all our doctors coincide, because it is lawful to require twice as much of a Zimmee as of a Mussulman,—whence it is that, if such an one were to come before the collector with merchandize, twice as much would be exacted of him as of a Mussulman. And the same rule obtains (that is to say, the same proportion of tithe continues to be imposed upon those lands) where a Mussulman purchases them of a Toglebee; or where a Toglebee, being the proprietor, becomes a Mussulman. Haneefa holds this opinion in all cases, whether the lands had originally belonged to a Toglebee, or the Toglebee had purchased them of a Mussulman,—for in either case the rule of double impost continues, with respect to them, where they are purchased by a Mussulman,—because he holds double impost upon those lands to have been already irreversibly established,* and, consequently, that this incumbrance on the lands devolves to the Mussulman purchaser along with the property, in the same manner as obtains in the case of a sale of tribute-lands. Abou Yoosaf maintains that, in the case here recited, a single tithe only is to be collected from the Mussulman proprietor; nor will the lands, whilst in his possession, be subject to any further impost, since the only principle upon which double tithe had been exacted of the Toglebee was the infidelity of the proprietor; and this, upon the devolving of the property to a Mussulman, is done away. Abou Yoosaf, in the Kadooree, has further said that (according to the Rawayet-Saheeh) the opinion of Mohammed is the same as that here recited. Our author, however, remarks that it is most certain that Mohammed coincides entirely with Haneefa in his general principle, that the impost upon the land continues as before; but he [Mohammed] carries this still farther; for, as where a Mussulman purchases lands, subject to double impost, of a Toglebee, the same continues upon him, so, if a Toglebee were to purchase lands of a Mussulman, subject only to single impost, he will not have to pay any more than the said single impost, since a change in the property makes no alteration with respect to those rules to which the lands are subject.

Land devolving from a Mussulman to a Zimmee becomes subject to tribute.—If a Mussulman sell his lands to a Christian, who is a Zimmee and not a Toglebee, and the Christian aforesaid have seizin of those lands, Haneefa holds that tribute is to be collected from the same, the payment of tribute being a consequence of infidelity. According to Abou Yoosaf, the double tithe collected therefrom is to be expended upon the objects of the expenditure of tribute, which is a mode of adjustment easier than that of thus exchanging tithe for tribute. Mohammed holds that the lands remain subject to tithe as before; and he moreover maintains that the tithe, collected from those lands, is to be applied to the purposes of Zakat.—It is to be observed that, if a Mussulman were to take those lands of a Christian in right of Shaffa,* or if the property in them were to revert to the seller, being a Mussulman, on account of the sale having been invalid, in either case the lands remain subject to tithe, as before; in the first instance, because the Mussulman, as Shafee,† must effect his purpose (of obtaining the lands in right of Shaffa) by means of a contract of sale with the proprietor, wherefore the transaction here, in fact, amounts to his purchasing the lands; and, in the second instance, because, by the property in the land reverting to the Mussulman proprietor, on account of an invalidity in the sale, the case remains the same as if no transfer by sale had ever been made; moreover the Mussulman's right is in no respect affected by such invalidity, since it is proper that that transaction be altogether disregarded; whence the case remains the same as if no sale had ever taken place; and for all these reasons the land will continue subject to tithe as before.

Case of a Mussulman. — If a Mussulman convert the ground of his habitation into a garden, the same having been his original property (that is to say, he being the first grantee), he owes tithe upon it where he waters it with tithe-water, or tribute where he waters it with tribute-water, because this land is not, in its original description, either tithe-land or tribute-land, and in such ground the mode of watering is the standard of the expense of cultivation.

Case of a Majoos. — A MAJOOS‡ does not owe either tithe or tribute for his habitation, because Omar exempted dwellings from all impost. But, if the Majoos were to convert the ground of his habitation into a garden,

* Neighbourhood, or conjunction of property, which gives a right of pre-emption.

† The person in whom the right of pre-emption lies.

•• By original compacts between the Mus-

he owes tribute upon the same, although he should water it with tithe-water, as he cannot lie under any obligation to pay tithe, because that bears the sense of an oblation and act of piety, of which an infidel is held to be incapable; he is appointed, therefore, to pay tribute, which is conformable to his situation, as being a sort of infliction. Our author remarks that analogy (from the opinion of the two disciples), would suggest that the Majoos owes tithe where the land is cultivated with tithe-water; single tithe, according to Mohammed; and double, according to Abou Yoosaf:—the reasons for this have been related before.

Definition of tithe-water and of tribute-water.—RAIN-WATER, and the water of wells and fountains, and of lakes which are not under the particular authority of any individual, is what is termed tithe-water; and the water of the artificial canals and aqueducts, constructed by the kings of Ajim (such as the river of Yezdejird), is tribute-water.

The river of Kharzim, called the Jyhoon [Oxus] is tithe-water, according to Mohammed; and so likewise is the Shyhoon, and also the Dijlet [Tigris] and the Firat [Euphrates], because those rivers are not under the authority of any person whatever, nor is any one entitled to an exclusive privilege with respect to them, wherefore they are the same as the open sea. Abou Yoosaf considers the waters of all those rivers as tribute-water, because bridges of boats are occasionally thrown over them, which is an act of seizing, evincing that those who do so are the guardians of the stream; and hence the water of those rivers must necessarily be deemed tribute-water.

Impost upon land the property of Toglil women or infants.—THE lands of infants or women of the Toglil tribe are subject to the same laws as those of the men of that tribe: that is to say, upon their tithe-lands is imposed double tithe, and upon their tribute-lands single tribute; because peace was made with them on the terms of double contribution to purposes of charity, but not to the service of the state: moreover, the lands of Mussulman infants or women are subject to a single tithe, and therefore the same is to be levied twofold upon the lands of Toglil women and children.

UPON fountains of pitch or bitumen, or wells of sulphur, nothing is due where they are found in tithe-lands, because those productions do not come under the description of growing out of the earth [vegetables], but are rather the same as the water of fountains, which sprung out of its bosom, and are not subject to any impost. The proprietor of such places, however, is subject to tribute where they exist in tribute-lands; but this is to be understood only provided the contiguous soil be capable of cultivation, because the imposition of tribute depends upon the proprietor of the land being able to cultivate

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE DISBURSEMENT OF ZAKAT, AND OF THE PERSONS TO WHOSE USE IT IS TO BE APPLIED.

Persons to whose use Zakat is to be applied.—THE objects of the disbursement of Zakat are of eight different descriptions: FIRST, Fakeers;—SECONDLY, Miskeens;—*—THIRDLY the collector of Zakat, (provided he be not a Hashimeer);—FOURTHLY, Mokatibs, (upon whom Zakat is bestowed, in order to enable them, by fulfilling their contract of Kitabat, to procure their freedom);—FIFTHLY, debtor not possessed of property amounting to Nisab;—SIXTHLY, Fee Sabeel Oola (in the service of God †);—SEVENTHLY, Ibnus Sabeel, or travellers;—and EIGHTHLY, Mowle-futal-kalobob.‡ And those eight descriptions are the original objects of the expenditure of Zakat, being particularly specified as such in the KORAN; and there are, therefore, no other proper or legal objects of its application. With respect to the last, however [Mowle-futal-kalobob], the law has ceased to operate, since the time of the prophet, because he used to bestow Zakat upon them as a bribe or gratuity to prevent them from molesting the Mussulmans, and also to secure their occasional assistance; but when God gave strength to the faith, and to its followers, and rendered the Mussulmans independant of such assistance, the occasion of bestowing this gratuity upon them no longer remained; and all the doctors unite in this opinion.

Definition of the terms Fakeer and Miskeen.—By the term Fakeers is to be understood persons possessed of property, the whole of which, however, amounts to somewhat less than a Nisab. By Miskeens is understood persons who have no property whatever. This comment upon the terms Fakeer and Miskeer is recorded from Abou Haneefa. Some, however, hold the reverse description to be true.

Allowance to the collector.—THE Imam is to allow the officer employed in the collection of Zakat as much out of it as is in proportion to his labour: as much, therefore, is to be allowed as may suffice for himself and his assistants; and his allowance is not fixed to an eighth. Shafei argues that Zakat, being appropriated to eight different objects, be-

* Fakeer and Miskeen both apply to persons in want; the distinction between these two terms is fully explained in the definition of them a little lower down.

† A descendant from the tribe of the prophet.

‡ The meaning of this phrase is more particularly described in another part of this chapter.

§ The translator is not able to find any precise meaning for this term in the lexicons. By Kullub is understood an Asil Arbee, an original Arabian of the desert, and it is pro-comes thus divided into eight equal lots, of which one is the right of the collector, who is consequently entitled to an eighth of the whole. Our doctors argue that, as Zakat is paid to the collector, not as alms, but in the manner of a reward for service performed, it follows that the proportion paid him must be whatever may suffice for that purpose; and hence it is that the collector is entitled to pay himself out of the collections of Zakat, although he should be rich.*

Definition of other terms.—By the phrase Feezar-Rikab, mentioned in the KORAN (where it treats of the objects of expenditure of Zakat), is to be understood Mokatibs: this definition is taken from Seyid Ben Jeeroo. And by the term Gharumeen, in the same passage, are meant debtors: Shafei says that it means persons who have involved themselves in composing the differences of others. By the phrase Fee Sabeel Oola, in the same passage, is to be understood (according to Abou Yoosaf) a person who, by poverty of estate, is incapacitated and cut off from taking a part in the wars of the faith; that is, in the Jihad Farz. Mohammed, on the contrary, argues that the phrase here mentioned applies to a person who, by poverty, is incapacitated from performing pilgrimage: the latter description, however, is necessarily implied and understood in the former; whence the phrase in question may be said to apply to both. It is to be observed that (according to our doctors) no portion of Zakat is to be paid to such warriors as are in a state of affluence, none being objects of its application but those who are poor.

By the term Ibnus Sabeel [travellers] is to be understood persons, in a strange place, having left their property at home, and who are consequently destitute of means of support.

The seven descriptions of persons here specified are the proper objects of the application of Zakat; and a proprietor (who chooses to disburse his Zakat himself, and not to pay it to the collector) is at liberty either to distribute it, in equal shares, among seven persons of those different descriptions, or to pay the whole to one of them.—This is the opinion of our doctors.—Shafei has said that a proprietor is not at liberty himself to disburse the Zakat upon his own property in any other way than bestowing a part upon three individuals of each several description. The arguments on both sides here turn on some peculiarities in the Arabic language. Our doctors take their opinion from Amroo Bin Abbas.

Zakat not to be bestowed upon Zimmes.

—It is not lawful to bestow Zakat upon a Zimnee, or infidel subject, because the prophet directed Maaz, saying, "Take ZAKAT from the rich Mussulmans, and bestow it upon the poor Mussulmans."—But although infidel subjects are not entitled to share in Zakat, yet other alms may be bestowed upon them in the manner of Zadka, or almsgift.—Shafei says that they are prohibited from partaking of these also, as well as of Zakat: but our doctors ground their opinion on this point upon a precept of the prophet, who has ordained that alms should be bestowed upon persons of every religion indiscriminately; and our doctors also allege, that if it were not on account of the directions to Maaz, before quoted, they should deem the bestowing of Zakat upon Zimmes to be legal.

Cases which do not constitute a payment of Zakat.—If a person employ the Zakat upon his property in the erection of a mosque, or the burial of the dead, yet his Zakat is not considered as being thereby discharged, because, in the payment of Zakat, it is established as a principle that it shall be made over to the person or persons entitled to it; and such delivery does not appear in this case.

If Zakat be employed in discharging the debts of a defunct, this is not considered as a payment of Zakat, because delivery does not appear in this instance.

If a person employ the Zakat upon his property in the purchase of a slave, for the purpose of granting him his freedom, this is not a discharge of Zakat. Imam Malik maintains that this act amounts to a due discharge of Zakat; because he alleges that the phrase Feezar-Rikab, which occurs in the KORAN, applies to a slave thus bought and liberated: but our doctors argue that the emancipation of a slave amounts simply to a dereliction of property, and does not in any respect bear the construction of delivery or transfer of possession.

Persons who are not the proper objects of its application.—It is not lawful to bestow any part of Zakat upon the rich, the prophet having declared that "alms are not lawful to the wealthy."—Shafei extends the use of Zakat to warriors, although they should be rich; but the precept here quoted is in proof against him.

It is not lawful for an owner of property to pay the Zakat upon it to his father, grandfather, or great-grandfather; nor to his son, grandson, or great-grandson; because the use of property between him and those persons is conjunct,—that is to say, each of those relatives is entitled to the use of the other's property; and hence transfer of property, in its full sense, does not exist in these cases.

It is not lawful for a proprietor to pay the Zakat upon his property to his wife, because the use of property is common between the husband and wife, according to general custom; nor is it lawful for a wife to pay the Zakat upon her property to her husband (according to Haneefa), for the same reason. The two disciples have said that it is lawful to give Zakat to the husband, because the wife of Abd'-Oola-bin-Masood asked the prophet whether she should give Sadka to her husband?—to which he replied,—“You have here two duties, one, that of SADKA, the other, that of RELATIONSHIP.”—But to this our doctors reply, from Haneefa, that by the term Sadka, mentioned in this tradition, is to be understood the Sadka Nifi, or voluntary alms.*

It is not lawful for a proprietor to bestow the Zakat of his property upon his own Mokatib, or Am Walid, or Modabbir, because in none of these cases is there a transfer of property, since that which falls to a slave becomes the property of his master;—and a master has, in like manner, a superior right in the property of his Mokatib, whence the master's transfer of property to him cannot be established.

† It is not lawful for a proprietor to bestow the Zakat of his property upon his slave, whom he may have partially emancipated, (according to Haneefa) because such a slave is held by him to stand as a Mokatib: but the two disciples maintain that the bestowing of Zakat upon such a slave is legal, because they hold this slave to be a debtor to his master.†

It is not lawful to bestow Zakat upon the slave of a rich man, because, if it be made over to the slave, it becomes the property of his master, and the master being rich, the delivery of Zakat to him is illegal. And, in like manner, it is illegal to bestow Zakat upon the child of a rich person, being an infant, since the child is supposed to be rich in the property of the father: contrary to the case of the child of a rich person, being an adult, who is poor, he not being accounted rich in the property of his father, although his subsistence be a debt upon his parents: and also contrary to the case of the wife of a rich person, because she, if she be poor, is not accounted rich in the property of the husband, or in proportion to, or on account of, the subsistence she enjoys from him.

It is not lawful to bestow any part of Zakat upon persons of the tribe of Hashim; the prophet having said, “O, descendants of Hashim! of a truth God hath rendered unlawful to you the GHOOSALA [water dirtied by ablution of men, and also their CHIRK [fifth,] and in lieu thereof he hath ordained to you a fifth of the fifth of all plunder:” and by the term Ghoosala is here to be understood the Zakat upon property, which is not lawful to Hashimees: contrary to Sadka Nifi: and by the term Chirk is to be understood the same. By the tribe of Hashim are here to be understood the families of Alee, and Abbas, and Jafir, and Akleel, and Haris-Ibnal-Mootlib; all these deriving their descent from Hashim the son of Minaf. But by the name Hashim, in the words of the prophet before quoted, is to be particularly understood Hashim the great-grandfather of the prophet, who also gives a name to a tribe.*

Zakat is discharged by the erroneous application of it to an improper person.—If a person were to bestow Zakat upon another, erroneously supposing him to be a proper object of its application, and should afterwards discover him to be rich, or a Hashimee, or an infidel,—or, if he should give Zakat to a person in the dark, and afterwards discover that person to be his father, or his son,—in these cases Zakat is considered to be fully discharged, and no longer to remain due.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf has said that, in the cases here recited, Zakat is still held to remain due, because it was in the power of that person to inquire into, and discover the particulars concerning him upon whom he bestowed Zakat, previous to making it over to him; and such being the case, where he is guilty of an evident neglect, his act is null, and consequently the Zakat is still a debt upon him; the same as where there are several vessels of water, some clean and others unclean,—or several garments, some pure and others defiled,—in which case, if a person, after due deliberation, select one of the pots of water, and perform his ablution with it, or put on one of the garments, and say his prayers, and he should afterwards appear to have committed an error, a repetition of the prayer or ablution is held to be incumbent upon him.—Haneefa and Mohammed support their opinion, in this case, upon a decision recorded of the prophet in a similar instance; and they moreover argue, that a knowledge of the situation and circumstances of men is only to be formed from conjecture, and cannot be easily obtained to a degree of decisive certainty, wherefore the matter is to be taken according to the donor's conception of it; the same as in a case of prayer, where if a man, intending to turn his face towards the Kaba, were to look in another direction, and pray, and his mistake afterwards appear, a repetition of the prayer is not incumbent upon him. It is recorded as an opinion of Haneefa, that Zakat is to be held discharged if thus bestowed, by mistake, upon a rich person, but not if bestowed upon a Hashimee, a parent, or a child; but the Zahir Rawayet accords with what was before advanced.—What is here mentioned proceeds upon a supposition that the Zakat has been bestowed after due deliberation, in consequence of the donor conceiving that the receiver is a proper object of its application : but if he should not have deliberated, or if, after deliberation, a doubt still remain, the Zakat is not discharged, unless it afterwards appear that the receiver was a proper object of its application.

* In opposition to Zakat, which comes under the description of Sadka Farz, or obligatory alms; and consequently what is quoted above by the two disciples does not in any respect apply to the present case.

† That is for the remainder of his bondage. For a full explanation of this, see Ittak.

* What follows of this passage relates merely to the Arabian tribes, and is therefore quite useless.

Unless that person be the slave or Mokatib of the donor.—If a person bestow Zakat upon another, and afterwards discover that this other is his own slave or Mokatib, this is not held to be a discharge of his Zakat, because, in this case, there is no transfer of property (according to what has been already remarked), and the discharge of Zakat rests upon a complete transfer of it, as was formerly explained.

It is not thought proper to bestow Zakat upon a person possessed of a complete Nisab in any property whatever, such an one being considered as coming under the description of Ghannee [rich], because this is the law term for any one possessed of a Nisab ; but the condition on which any person is accounted a Ghannee is, that the Nisab which constitutes his property be exclusive of all demands or incumbrances (such as debts, and so forth) ; and on this precise quantity of absolute property no Zakat is legally due from the proprietor, the increase thereof (understood in the lapse of Hawlan-Fawl) being a condition of the obligation to Zakat.

Other persons upon whom Zakat may be lawfully bestowed.—It is lawful to bestow Zakat upon a person possessed of less than a Nisab, although he be sound in body and capable of labour, because such an one comes under the description of a Fakeer, who is one of the specified objects of its application, and also, because actual necessity in the situation or circumstances of the object is difficult to be ascertained, and therefore the rule is restricted to that description which affords argument of such necessity ; and a deficiency in worldly property, to the amount of a Nisab, affords such argument of necessity with respect to the proprietor.

If a person were to bestow to the amount of two hundred Dirms, or upwards, of the Zakat of his property, upon one individual, such a procedure is abominable, but yet is legal.—Zifir has said that this is illegal ; because in the act of bestowing that quantity of Zakat, the person who receives it becomes a Ghannee,* which would induce the idea of Zakat being bestowed upon a Ghannee ; but to this our doctors reply, that the opulence of the person in question is an effect of the gift of Zakat to him, and therefore he does not come within the description of a Ghannee until after it has been bestowed, —yet, where discharge of Zakat tends to bring any one within the description of Ghannee, it is abominable, the same as prayer when performed near any filth.

ABOO HANEEFA has said, “ I regard it as most laudable to bestow upon a FAKEER, ZAKAT to such an amount as may preclude him from the necessity of begging for that day.”

Zakat of one city not transferable to another except in certain cases.—THE transfer of Zakat from one city to another is abominable, it being rather indispensable that the Zakat of every city be bestowed upon the claimants of that city ; and also, because in this regard is had to the rights of Jowar [neighbourhood] :—and hence it is abominable in men to transfer the Zakat upon their property from their own city to another, except either for the use of their relations, or for the purpose of assisting those who may be in greater necessity than the inhabitants of their own city ; because in the one case exists the peculiar duty of consanguinity, and in the other the application of relief where it is most required. — But although the transfer of Zakat from one city to another, excepting for the purposes here mentioned, be accounted abominable, yet it amounts to a valid discharge of Zakat, because the term Fakeer, mentioned in the sacred writings as one of the proper objects of the application of Zakat, is not local, but general.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF SADKA-FITTIR.

Definition of the term.—By Sadka-fitter is understood the alms bestowed upon the poor on the Yd-al Fittir, or festival of breaking Lent.

Obligation of Sadka-fittir.—Sadka-fitter is incumbent upon all free Mussalmans possessed of property to the amount of a Nisab clear of incumbrance.* The obligation to Sadka-fittir is founded on a precept of the prophet, who, in a discourse upon the festival of breaking Lent, said, “ Let every person, whether INFANT or ADULT bestow [upon the poor] half a SAA of wheat, or one SAA of millet or of barley.” This saying is recorded by Salba-Adwee, but being of the class of Hideos Ahad,* it establishes only a moral but not a religious obligation.

Conditions of the obligation.—FREEDOM is made a condition, in order that the assignment [of the Sadka] may be complete : and Islam, or profession of the faith, is also made a condition, in order that this donation may bear the construction of an oblation and act of piety, of which infidels are held incapable : and the possession of a Nisab is also made a condition, the prophet having declared, "Alms are not expected to be bestowed but from the ability of the RICH." Shafei has said that the Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon every person who possesses property to the amount or value of one day's subsistence for himself and family; but the above precept of the prophet is in proof against him.—It is to be observed that wealth is determined at the rate of a Nisab, because that is the standard by which the law measures it; but this, with the reserve of its being exclusive of all incumbrances, as whatever may be so occupied is accounted non-existent; but increase in it is not a condition.—There are three things connected with the possession of a Nisab, such as here described; FIRST, prohibition against the acceptance of alms; SECONDLY, obligation to perform sacrifice; and THIRDLY, obligation to bestow Sadka-fittir.

Persons upon whom, or in whose behalf, it is incumbent.—THE Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon every individual respectively, Ebn Amir having recorded that the prophet has constituted Sadka-fittir an absolute injunction [Farz] upon all mankind, and both sexes, indiscriminately.

It is incumbent upon a man to discharge the Sadka-fittir in behalf of his children, being infants, because he is their guardian, and their provision is a debt upon him; wherefore the accomplishment of their duties of Sadka must also rest upon him, this being considered as a part of their provision. And, in the same manner, a man must discharge the Sadka-fittir in behalf of his male and female slaves, he being their guardian, and their subsistence depending upon him. What is here advanced proceeds entirely upon a supposition that the slaves are not held by the proprietor merely in the way of traffick; and also that his children are not possessed of any independent property; for, if the children be possessed of property, their Sadka-fittir is to be discharged out of that, according to the two Sheicks. Mohammed contradicts their opinion in this instance. The argument of the two Sheicks is that the lawgiver has considered Sadka-fittir the same as Nifka,* and therefore it is to be held as such.

Persons upon whom, or in whose behalf, it is not incumbent.—THE Sadka-fittir is not incumbent upon a man in behalf of his wife, because his power of guardianship and provision, with respect to her, is incomplete, since a husband is not guardian over his wife any farther than respects the rights of marriage, nor does the provision for her rest upon him any further than with respect to food, clothing, and lodging, which are termed Rawatib [necessaries], any thing beyond which he is not accountable for.—And, in the same manner, it is not incumbent upon a man to disburse the Sadka-fittir for his children, being adults, although these form a part of his family, because he is not invested with any authority of guardianship over them.—But yet if a man were to disburse the Sadka-fittir on behalf of his wife, or adult children, without their desire, it is lawful, on a principle of benevolence, their consent being by custom understood.

It is not incumbent upon men to pay the Sadka-fittir for their Mokatibs; neither is it incumbent on a Mokatib to pay it on his own account, such an one coming under the description of a Fakeer.

Exception.—It is incumbent on men to pay Sadka-fittir on behalf of their Modabbirs and Am-Walids, as being invested with complete authority over them.

Not incumbent on behalf of slaves kept as articles of traffick.—It is not incumbent upon men to pay Sadka-fittir on behalf of their male and female slaves designed for sale as merchandize. Shafei alleges that the Sadka-fittir is obligatory upon such slaves, and that the proprietor is to pay it for them; and that the Zakat upon them is due from the proprietor. In short, Shafei holds that Sadka-fittir is due from the slave, and Zakat from their proprietor, on two distinct and separate accounts; and consequently, that this does not induce the idea of a repetition of Sadka upon one and the same property: but with our doctors the obligation to Sadka-fittir, on behalf of slaves, is held to rest upon their owner, the same as Zakat; and consequently, if the payment of the former were incumbent, it would admit the idea of two Sadkas upon one property within the year, which is illegal.

Nor on behalf of a partnership slave.—No Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon any of the proprietors on account of a partnership slave, because none of them, individually, is invested with complete authority over him, nor obliged to furnish his entire provision. And, in the same manner, no Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon any of the proprietors, on account of two or more partnership slaves, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples have said that, in this case, Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon the proprietors; but in such a degree only, with respect to their shares, as may amount to a complete slave or slaves, and not to any fractional part or portion of them: for instance, if there were five slaves held in partnership by two men, each partner would have to pay Sadka-fittir for two slaves, and not for two and a half.—Some, however, have said that the two disciples agree with Haneefa in their doctrine upon this point, because the share of each partner, individually, cannot be collected into any particular slave or slaves, until a partition take place of the partnership stock, and consequently none of them appertains to either partner in particular.

Incumbent on behalf of infidel slaves.—It is incumbent upon Mussulmans to pay the Sadka-fittir for their infidel slaves, on the authority of the tradition of Salba-Adwee, already quoted, because there the term slaves is used generally, and is not restrictively applied to Mussulman slaves: moreover, in the traditions of Abbas, it appears that the prophet said "Render SADKA-FITTIR on behalf of every freeman, and also of every slave, be that slave a CHRISTIAN, a JEW, or a PAGAN:" and further, it is incumbent, because the occasion of the obligation is here established, and the proprietor [of the slave] is capable of taking upon him the responsibility for such obligation. Shafei maintains that, in this instance, no Sadka-fittir is due, because the obligation to Sadka-fittir rests upon a slave himself, and not upon his owner; and the former (in the case here supposed) is incapable of such obligation, as being an infidel.

But not on behalf of a slave the property of an infidel.—If the slave be a Mussulman, and his master an infidel, in this case no Sadka-fittir whatever is due for such slave, according to all the doctors; according to our doctors, evidently, because they hold the obligation of Sadka-fittir, with respect to the slave, to rest upon the master, and here the master is an infidel; and, according to Shafei, because he holds the obligation to rest upon the slave himself, to be discharged by his master; and the master, in the present case, is incapable of discharging it, as being an infidel.

Case of a slave sold with a reserve of option.—If a slave be sold with a reserve of option to one of the parties, the seller or the purchaser, determinable on the ensuing festival of Fittir, in this case the Sadka-fittir, on behalf of that slave, is incumbent upon the party to whom he may ultimately belong.—Ziffer alleges that the discharge of the Sadka-fittir rests with the party in whose behalf reserve of option was made a condition, because the authority over that slave is in fact vested in him. Shafei maintains that it rests with him who has possession in the interim, whom he holds to be the purchaser, on this ground, that the furnishing Sadka-fittir is one of the rules of possession, the same as furnishing subsistence.—Our doctors argue that the possession of the slave, in the present case, is a matter which remains in suspense, since, if he to whom the option was reserved choose to dissolve the sale, the property in the slave reverts to the seller; but, on the other hand, if he confirm the sale, and render it valid, the slave becomes the property of the purchaser from the period of the original engagement; and the possession thus remaining in suspense, that which depends upon such possession must remain suspended also: contrary to the case of Nifka, which is requisite from day to day, to supply the wants of nature, and is consequently incapable of such suspension. And if this slave be an article of traffick, the same difference of opinion holds with respect to the Zakat upon him.

Section.—Of the measure of Sadka-fittir, and of the Time of its Obligation and its Discharge.

Proportion of Sadka-fittir, and the articles in which it may be discharged.—THE measure of a Sadka-fittir in wheat, or flour, or bran, or in dried fruits, is an half Saa; and in dates or barley it is one Saa. The two disciples say that dried fruits are the same as barley in this respect; and there is also one tradition of the opinion of Haneefa to the same effect.—The former is the doctrine recorded in the Jama Sagheer. Shafei says that the measure of a Sadka-fittir, in all the articles here specified, is one Saa; because Abou Seyid Kadooree remarks that this was the customary Sadka-fittir in all articles in the time of the prophet.—Our doctors support what was before advanced on the authority of the tradition of Salba Adwee, already repeatedly quoted; and the doctrine of the whole of the companions (such as the Kholfah Rashidine* and others), is consonant to that of our doctors: the tradition, also, of Abou Seyid, cited by Shafei, implies no more than that, in the time of the prophet, people were accustomed to give something over what was obligatory.—The two disciples allege (in support of their opinion, that dried fruits are the same as barley) that Khurma [dried dates] is one species of dried fruits; and they being considered the same as barley, it follows that all dried fruits, as being of one general description, should be subject to the same rule. The argument of Haneefa is, that dried fruits and barley are of a correspondent nature, because as the poor eat the flour of wheat with its bran, so do they dried fruit with its core or stone: contrary to dates, which are the same as barley, in as much as the stones of the one and the bran of the other are thrown away.—Barley-meal is the same as barley,* but it is best that, in discharging the Sadka-fittir in the flour or bran of either barley or wheat, attention be paid to the value; that is to say, if, for instance, the value of half a Saa of flour be equal to that of the same quantity of wheat, it will suffice to give half a Saa of flour, but otherwise not; and the same with respect to barley-meal.—This is not noticed in the Jama Sagheer, because the value of meal or flour does not commonly fall short of that of the grain, but rather generally exceeds it.

IN discharging the Sadka-fittir with bread regard is to be had to the value only; this is approved doctrine.

THE half Saa now mentioned is to be ascertained by weight, according to Haneefa; but the two disciples hold that it is to be ascertained by measure.

IN discharging the Sadka-fittir, flour is preferable to wheat, and money is preferable to flour, according to what is recorded from Abou Yoosaf, because money satisfies the wants most amply, and flour most readily: contrary to wheat, which, after it is bestowed, requires to be made flour before it is fit for use.—It is recorded, as an opinion of Abou Bikr Ayamush, that wheat is preferable either to flour or money, because this is universally admitted to be a proper article in which to discharge the Sadka-fittir, whereas concerning money and flour there are various opinions.

THE Saa, according to Abou Haneefa and Mohammed, consists of eight Ratls * of the Ratls of Irak.—Abou Yoozaf has said that it is only five Ratls and one third; and this is also the doctrine of Shafei; the prophet having said "Our Saa is smaller than that of others."—The argument of the Tirmatinet, in this case, is, that it is recorded by the prophet, that he performed the Woozo by the Mid (which is two Ratls), and the Ghosl by the Saa (which is eight Ratls); and the Saa of Omar was the same; moreover, this Saa is small compared with that of Hashimnee, which was the Saa in common use, wherefore it is lawful to regard that mentioned in the tradition above quoted as the standard in Sadka-fittir.

Time of the commencement of the obligation.—THE obligation to the performance of the Sadka-fittir commences with the dawn of the morning of the festival of Fittir; that is to say, the arrival of that specified period is a condition of its obligation. Shafei alleges that the obligation commences with the sunset of the last day of Ramzan:—and the result of this difference of opinion is, that if (for instance) an infidel were to be converted, and to become a Mussulman,—or, if a child were to be born,—on the eve of the festival of Fittir, the Sadka-fittir would be due on account of the convert or the child, according to our doctors; but, according to Shafei, it would not be due: and, on the other hand, if a man's child, or male or female slave, were to die on the last night of Ramzan, Sadka-fittir is incumbent upon him on their account, according to Shafei; but it would not be so, according to our doctors.—The argument of Shafei, in this case, is that the Sadka-fittir is essentially connected with, and bears relation to Fittir [the act of breaking of fast], as the connection of the terms evince; and the sunset of the last day of Ramzan is the time of Fittir, because the fast may be then broken.—To this our doctors reply, by admitting that the Sadka-fittir is certainly connected with the act of fittir, but the Fittir has reference to the day, and not to the night, whence it is that this period is expressed by the words Yawm-al-fittir [day of breaking fast], and not by the words Lail-al-fittir [night of breaking fast]; and hence it follows that the obligation to the performance of Sadka-fittir is connected with the morning of the festival of Fittir, and not with the eve thereof.

It is most laudable that mendischarge their Sadka-fittir on the day of the festival of Fittir, before they proceed to the mosque to perform the prayers of that festival, because the prophet did thus; and also, because the precept regarding Sadka-fittir was issued with a view that this donation might relieve the wants of the poor, and thereby enable them to enjoy the festival, and to unite in the duties of it with a cheerful mind; and the design is best answered by the donation being made before prayer.

IF the Sadka-fittir be discharged previous to the day of the festival of Fittir, it is lawful; because the discharge of an obligation, at any time after the establishment of the cause of the obligation, is legal, in the same manner as that of Zakat previous to the lapse of Hawlan-Hawl.

IF a person were not to discharge the Sadka-fittir within the day of the festival of Fittir, yet the obligation still continues, and it is proper that it be made good afterwards, because the obligation of it is imposed with a view to the relief of the poor, which object still remains: contrary to sacrifice, the obligation to which, if it be neglected on the Yawm-al-Nihr [the day of sacrifice, being the tenth of the month Zeel-Hidjee], drops altogether;—this being merely an act of piety, in which the wants or rights of others are no way concerned.

BOOK II.

OF NIKKAH, OR MARRIAGE.

Definition of the term.—NIKKAH, in its primitive sense, means carnal conjunction. Some have said that it signifies conjunction generally. In the language of the law it implies a particular contract used for the purpose of legalizing generation.

CHAPTER I.

Forms under which marriage may be contracted.—MARRIAGE is contracted,—that is, to say, is effected and legally confirmed,—by means of declaration and consent, both expressed in the preterite, because although the use of the preterite be to relate that which is past, yet it has been adopted, in the law, in a creative sense, to answer the necessity of the case.*—Declaration, in the law, signifies the speech which first proceeds from one of two contracting parties, and consent the speech which proceeds from the other in reply to the declaration.

MARRIAGE may also be contracted by the parties expressing themselves, one in the imperative, and the other in the preterite; as if a man were to say to another "Contract your daughter in marriage to me,"—and he were to reply "I have contracted" [my daughter to you]—because his words "Contract your daughter to me" are expressive of a commission of agency, empowering to contract in marriage; and one person may be authorized to act on both sides in marriage (as shall be hereafter explained); wherefore the reply of the father, "I have contracted," stands in the place both of declaration and consent,—as if he had said "I have contracted, and I have consented."

MARRIAGE may also be contracted by the use of the word NIKKAH, or marriage,—as if a woman were to say to a man "I have married myself to you for such a sum of money,"† and the man were to reply "I have consented:" and, in like manner, by the word Tazweej, or contracting in marriage, as if a woman were to say to a man "I have contracted myself in marriage unto you," and so forth:—and so also, by the word Hibha, or gift,‡ as if she were to say "I have bestowed myself upon you:" and likewise, by the word Tamleek, or consignment,—as if she were to say "I have consigned myself over to you:" and so also, by the word Sadka, or alms-gift, as if she were to say "I have given myself as an alms unto you."—Shafei is of opinion that marriage cannot be contracted except by the words Nikkah and Tazweej, because the term Tamleek (for instance) does not bear the construction of matrimony either in a literal or metaphorical sense;—evidently not in a literal sense, this term never being used to express marriage; nor in a metaphorical sense, because a metaphor is to be understood in a particular sense only from the propriety of its application, which is not the case here, the terms Nikkah or Tazweej implying conjunction (as was before observed), and between the possessor and the possession no conjunction whatever exists. The argument of our doctors, in this case, is that consignment operates as the principle of a right to a carnal conjunction in the subject of it, in virtue of a right in the person (as in the case of female slaves); and the right to carnal conjunction is also established by matrimony; wherefore, as marriage and consignment thus appear to be both principles operating to the same end, the latter may be metaphorically taken for the former.

MARRIAGE may be contracted by the use of the term Beeya, or sale; as if a woman were to say to a man "I have sold myself into your hands," and this is approved, because sale operates as the principle of a right in the person, and a right in the person is the principle of a right to carnal conjunction, whence the propriety of the metaphorical application of sale to matrimony.

ACCORDING to the Rawayet Saheeh, marriage cannot be contracted by the use of the term Ijara, or hire—(as if a woman were to say "I have hired myself to you for so much;")—nor by Ibahit, or permission; nor by Ihlah, or rendering lawful; nor by Areet, or loan; none of these operating as the principle of a right to a carnal conjunction.—Neither can marriage be contracted by the use of the term Waseeyat, or bequest; because bequest does not convey any right of possession until after the testator's death;—and as a contract of marriage in express terms, referring the execution of it to a period subsequent to the decease of either of the parties, would be null, so also, in the present case, a fortiori.

Must be contracted in the presence of witnesses.—MARRIAGE, where both the parties are Mussulmans, cannot be contracted but in the presence of two male witnesses, or of one man and two women, who are sane, adult, and Mussulmans, whether they be of established integrity of character or otherwise, or may ever have suffered punishment as slanderers.—The compiler of this work observes that evidence is an essential condition of marriage, the prophet having declared "no marriage is good without evidence;" and this precept is a proof against Malik, who maintains that in marriage notoriety only is a condition, and not positive evidence.

Qualification of a witness—It is necessary that the witnesses be free, the evidence of slaves being in no case valid, because such are not competent to act in any respect sui juris: and it is also requisite that they be of sound mind and mature age, because minors or idiots are incapable of acting for themselves; and it is likewise necessary that they be Mussulmans; the evidence of infidels not being legal with respect to Mussulmans.

Persons may witness a marriage, whose testimony would not be received in other cases.—THE sex of the witnesses is not an essential condition of their competency, inasmuch that marriage may be lawfully contracted in the presence of one man and two women:—neither is the integrity of the witnesses an essential condition, inasmuch that (according to our doctors) a marriage is valid if contracted in the presence of two Fasiks, or unjust persons.—Shafei maintains that

* Because the present and future being expressed, in the Arabic language, under one form, a contract expressed in the present would be equivocal.

† + Meaning her dower

‡ This, and the two following terms, are such as are used, where the woman does not stipulate any dower.

* The word Fasik, which throughout this work is used in contradistinction to Adil, has the integrity of the witnesses is an essential condition, because evidence is entitled to reverence and respect, the prophet having said "pay reverence to witnesses;" and Fasiks are not proper objects of such reverence, but rather the reverse.—To this our doctors reply that Fasiks are competent to act for themselves, and of course competency in evidence must also appertain to them, since they are not incapacitated from acting with respect to others; a Fasik, moreover, is capable of holding the office of a Sultan or an Imam, whence it follows that he is also capable of becoming a Kazeer, or a witness.—A person who has suffered punishment for slander, as being still possessed of general competency, is also capable of bearing witness, so far as merely respects declaration and consent in matrimony, but no farther, there being a positive prohibition to the reception of such a person's evidence, which, however, admits of exception in the present case, like that of blind persons, or of the children of the parties, whose evidence, although not admissible in any other case, is yet allowed in marriage.

Infidels may witness the marriage of an infidel woman.—If a Mussulman marry a female infidel subject in the presence of two male infidel subjects it is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf and Haneefa. Mohammed and Ziffer maintain that it is not lawful, because their testimony, with respect to declaration and consent in marriage, amounts to evidence, and the evidence of infidels regarding Mussulmans is illegal; whence it is the same in fact as if they had not heard the declaration and consent of the parties. The argument of the two elders, in reply to this objection, is, that evidence is required in matrimony, not with any view to the ascertainment of a point of property (such as dower), but merely in order to establish the husband's right of cohabitation, which is in this case the object.

The negotiator of the contract may also, in certain cases, be a witness to it.—If a man desire another to contract his daughter (being an infant) in marriage to a third person, and the other should accordingly contract his daughter, upon the spot, to the third person, in the presence of the person so desiring, and the act be witnessed by only one person besides these two, the marriage is lawful; because, in this case, the father, as being upon the spot, is considered as the actual contractor of the marriage [on behalf of his daughter]; wherefore the second person stands merely as the negotiator of the contract, and of course, not appearing as a party in it, is a competent witness with the other. But, if the father of the infant aforesaid should go away, and be not actually present at the execution of the contract, the marriage would be null; because the father, as not being present, cannot be considered as the contractor, that appellation properly applying to the other—who appears to act, in his absence, as his matrimonial agent on his daughter's behalf; consequently here would be only one competent witness present, and one evidence is not sufficient; whence the marriage would be illegal.—And the rule is the same where a father matches his daughter (being an adult), at her desire, in the presence of one other witness; that is to say, if the daughter be herself present at the execution of the contract it is legal, otherwise not.

Section.—Of the prohibited degrees: that is to say, of Women whom it is lawful to marry, and of those with whom Marriage is unlawful.

It is unlawful to marry a mother, or a grandmother.—A MAN may not marry his mother, nor his paternal or maternal grandmother; because the word of God in the KORAN says, "YOUR AIMS (that is, your mothers) AND YOUR DAUGHTERS ARE FORBIDDEN TO YOU;" and the primitive sense of the term AM [mother] being origin or root, the grandmothers are comprehended in this prohibition. The illegality of such a connexion is, moreover, supported upon the united opinion of all our doctors.

A daughter or a grand-daughter.—A MAN may not marry his daughter, on the authority of the text above quoted, nor his grand-daughter, nor any of his direct descendants.

A sister, a niece, or an aunt.—NEITHER may a man marry his sister, nor his sister's daughter, nor his brother's daughter, nor his paternal aunt, nor his maternal aunt; the prohibition of such in marriage being included in the text already quoted.

ALL the degrees of aunts are also included in this prohibition; to wit, maternal and paternal aunts, as well as the aunts of the father, and the aunts of the mother, both paternal and maternal:—so also the daughters of all the brothers; that is to say, of the full brother, and of the paternal* brother, and of the maternal brother; and, in like manner, the daughters of all sisters, to wit, of the full sisters, and of the paternal sisters, and of the maternal sisters: because the terms Amma, Khala, Okh, and Okht, which occur in the passage of the KORAN already cited, apply to all those degrees of kindred.

Or a mother-in-law.—It is not lawful for a man to marry his wife's mother, whether he may have consummated his marriage with her daughter or not, the Almighty therefore been rendered, in the translation, unjust, which is indeed the most common acceptance of the word; it must, however, be understood to relate to a person who neglects decorum in his behaviour and dress, and such other inferior points, rather than to one who is actually known to be dishonest.

* By the terms maternal or paternal, applied to brothers and sisters, is to be understood half-brothers or half-sisters by the father's or mother's side.

having prohibited such a connexion in general terms, without any regard to that circumstance.

Or a step-daughter.—NEITHER is it lawful for a man to marry the daughter of his wife; but this only, provided he have already consummated his marriage with the latter, because the sacred text restricts the illegality of this union to that circumstance, wherefore marriage with the daughter of the wife is illegal, where carnal connexion has taken place with the latter, whether the daughter be an inmate of the husband's Haram, or not. It is here to be observed, that the text in the sacred writings which says "YOUR WOMEN WHO RESIDE IN YOUR HARAMS, BEING THE DAUGHTERS OF YOUR WIVES WITH WHOM YOU HAVE HELD COHABITATION, ARE UNLAWFUL TO YOU," has merely reference to custom, and does not imply that the residence of the daughter in the man's Haram along with her mother is unlawful; for it is usual, when a man marries a woman who has a daughter by a former husband, that the latter accompanies her mother to his house, and is thence considered as one of his Haram.*

Or a step-mother, or step-grandmother.—It is unlawful for a man to marry the wife of his father, or of his grandfather, God having so commanded, saying "MARRY NOT THE WIVES OF YOUR PROGENITORS."

Or a daughter-in-law, or grand-daughter-in-law.—NEITHER is it lawful for a man to marry the wife of his son, or of his grandson, the Almighty having said "WED NOT THE WIVES OF YOUR SONS, OR YOUR DAUGHTERS WHO PROCEED FROM YOUR LOINS."

Or a nurse or a foster-sister.—It is not lawful for a man to marry his foster-mother, or his foster-sister, the Almighty having commanded, saying "MARRY NOT YOUR MOTHERS WHO HAVE SUCKLED YOU, OR YOUR SISTERS BY FOSTERAGE;" and the prophet has also declared, "Every thing is prohibited by reason of fosterage which is so by reason of kindred."

Or sisters.—It is not lawful to marry and cohabit with two women being sisters, neither is it lawful for a man to cohabit with two sisters in virtue of a right of possession [as being his slaves], because the Almighty has declared that such cohabitation with sisters is unlawful.

Case of two sisters.—If a man marry the sister of his female slave with whom he has not cohabited, such marriage is approved, the contract being, in this case, entered into by parties competent in every respect.—And this marriage being legal and valid, the man must not afterwards hold any carnal connexion with his female slave; even though he should never consummate his marriage carnally with her sister, because a wife stands in law, as a Fœmina Fututa:—neither should the husband indulge in the connubial enjoyment with this wife until he shall previously have rendered her sister [the slave] unlawful to him, and relinquished his right of cohabitation with her, by some means or other, such as emancipating her, or marrying her to another man, in order to avoid the construction of cohabitation with sisters; but having so done, he may afterwards cohabit with his wife; because then no breach of the law would ensue, since a female slave is not held in the law, merely as such, to be a Fœmina Fututa.

Another case of two sisters.—If a man should happen to marry two sisters by two contracts,* and it be not known with respect to which marriage first took place, a separation from both the sisters must ensue; because it is evident that his marriage with one of the two is illegal, but it is impossible to ascertain with which, by reason of ignorance of priority; nor is it conceivable that a judgment should be pronounced legalizing the marriage of either, unspecified, since the marriage of both remaining unascertained, a rule to make the same valid would be illegal, as not leading to any good or advantage; for the advantage proposed in matrimony is procreation, which is unattainable without carnal connexion of the parties: and this connexion with a woman unspecified is inadmissible: moreover, allowing the marriage to be valid, it would be injurious to both, as laying them under the matrimonial restraints without the advantage of the connubial enjoyment, which neither could legally possess; for all which reasons their separation is indispensable. And in this case each sister is entitled to receive an half dower, because, if either could have been proved to be first married, she would have had a claim to her full dower, but the priority of marriage of either remaining unascertained, the dower is thus divided between them.—Some have said that this is only where each of the sisters respectively maintains the priority of her marriage without either being able to adduce any proofs; but that where they both declare their ignorance of such priority, nothing whatever is to be paid to either, until such time as both agree to receive an half dower, as above, because that is due to them in virtue of a priority unascertained, wherefore it is necessary either that each should respectively maintain her priority, or that both should agree, as above, before any decree for payment of an half dower to each should be passed.—But if each sister maintain her priority, and both produce equal

* This observation is introduced merely with a view to explain an ambiguity in the text referred to.

* This doubtless supposes a case where a man is contracted in marriage through the agency of others empowered by him for that purpose (as shall be shown in an ensuing chapter), and who may engage in the contract without his immediate knowledge.

evidence in support of it, an half dower is the right of each, according to all the doctors.

A man may not marry an aunt and niece.—It is unlawful for a man to marry two women, of whom one is the aunt or niece of the other, the prophet having declared a precept, as recorded in the Zahir-Ilawayet, to this effect.

Or two women related within the prohibited degrees.—It is not lawful for a man to marry two women within such degree of affinity as would render a marriage between them illegal, if one of them were a man, and for the same reason, because this would occasion a confusion of kindred.

A man may marry a woman and her step-daughter.—But a man may marry two women, one of them being a widow, and the other the daughter of that widow's former husband by another wife, because here exists no affinity, either by blood or fosterage.—Ziffer objects to this, and maintains that the marriage would be illegal; because, if the daughter were supposed a man, a marriage between her and the widow would be illegal, and these two consequently stand in the same predicament, with respect to each other, as those in the preceding case.—To this our doctors reply that the illegality there stated is supposed to exist only in cases where this supposition, if applied to either of the women, would render their marriage illegal; but that does not hold in the present instance, for if the widow were supposed to be a man, she could lawfully marry the daughter.—And it is moreover related, in the Nakl Saheeh, that Abdoola the son of Jafir married a wife and a daughter of Alea.

Cases which induce illegality.—If a man commit whoredom* with a woman, her mother and daughter are prohibited to him.—Shafei maintains that they are not prohibited, because whoredom does not induce Hoormat-Moosahirat, or prohibition from affinity, as this law of prohibition is a peculiar distinction bestowed upon the servants of God through the divine favour, and whoredom, being a crime, cannot possibly induce that which is a favour of God.—To this our doctors reply, that the carnal act operates as a principle or cause of a mutual participation of blood between the parties concerned in it, in virtue of the child which is, or may be, the fruit thereof, that partaking of the father and the mother respectively, in toto, for it is usually said "This child is the offspring of such a man and of such a woman;" and this participation being thus established between the child and each of the parents respectively, it is virtually so between the parents themselves, because although a portion of the child be a part of the mother, yet it is attributed, in toto, to the father, whence a part of the mother is attributed to him; and vice versa; and a mutual participation of blood being thus established between the man and the woman, it follows that the mother or the daughter of the latter stands as the actual mother or daughter of the man, because the former would be the grandmother of the child produced by such act of whoredom; she is therefore the root of the root of such offspring, and the offspring is the branch of a branch from her; and it is inconceivable that the child should be a branch of a branch from her, unless the fornicator were considered as a branch from her, and the grandmother the root of the fornicator; and the same reasoning applies with respect to the daughter.

If a woman touch a man in lust [i.e. manu penem fricans, stuprum excitat], the mother and daughter of that woman are thereby prohibited to him.—Shafei says that they are not prohibited. And the same difference of opinion obtains in cases where a man touches a woman in lust, or sees the pudendum of a woman; or where a woman sees the yard of a man in lust; in all which instances our doctors hold that the mother or daughter of such woman are rendered unlawful to the man: but Shafei maintains a contrary sentiment, arguing that seeing or touching do not amount to the absolute act, insomuch that the usual ceremonies required by the law, after the carnal act,* are not here necessary.—To this our doctors reply, that such acts as those, being a cause of copulation, stand as that constructively.—It is to be observed, that by touching in lust, with respect to a man, is meant producing a priapism with the hand, or increasing the turgidity of the virile member, by the same means, where the priapism already exists.—This is an approved definition of that phrase, as to the term lust, with respect to young men in full vigour and equal to the performance of coition; but with respect to old men, and Inæens (or persons naturally impotent), the exciting of lust amounts only to causing the heart to beat more quickly than usual, or increasing that palpitation where it already exists.—By the exciting of lust in women or eunuchs is understood simply causing a desire of coition, or increasing that desire where it already exists.—These definitions are recited at large in the Fatawee Alum-guceree. By seeing the pudendum of a woman is understood, seeing the entrance of the vagina, which is not supposed practicable unless she be in a reclining posture.

If a man indulge in lewdness with a woman until he produce an emission, some have said that this occasions Hoormat-Moosahirat, or prohibition from affinity, [with respect to the kindred of that woman;] but it is certain that this does not occasion prohibition, because the man, by producing an ex-vulval emission, manifests that coition was not his intention; wherefore it does not stand as such. And, in like manner, if a man enter a woman in ano, some have said that this occasions prohibition from affinity, as such an act amounts to touching in lust; but it is certain that this does not occasion prohibition, because the carnal conjunction of the sexes does not stand as procreation on any other principle than as it may be the occasion of offspring, which it cannot possibly be from the performance of the act as above described.

* Such as ablu'tion and so forth

A man cannot marry the sister of his repudiated wife during her Edit.—If a man repudiate his wife, either by a complete or a reversible divorce, it is not lawful for him to marry her sister until the expiration of her Edit.*—Shafei maintains that it is lawful, because by either of those forms of divorce the former marriage was completely dissolved, inasmuch, that if a man were to have carnal knowledge of his repudiated wife during her Edit, knowing the illegality of the same, he would be liable to the punishment for whoredom.—To this our doctors reply, that whatever the nature of the divorce may have been, whether reversible or complete, the marriage with the first sister does still, in fact, continue during her Edit, in virtue of the continuance of several of its effects, such as maintenance, and custody, and inability to marry another man; neither does it appear, in the book of divorce, that any punishment for whoredom is specified in the case of the husband having carnal connexion with his repudiated wife within the term of her Edit; although, according to the book of punishments, he would incur it, because by the act of divorce, the husband's right of cohabitation is dissolved, and consequently any subsequent cohabitation with her would bear the construction of whoredom; but yet his other rights are not dissolved (as was above observed), wherefore, if he were to marry the second sister before the expiration of the former's Edit, it would amount to a marriage with two sisters at one time, which is forbidden.

Marriage with slaves.—A MASTER may not marry his female slave, nor a mistress her bondsman, because marriage was instituted with a view that the fruit might belong equally to the father and the mother, and mastership and servitude are contradictory to each other, wherefore it is not admissible that offspring should thus be divided between the master and the slave.

And with Kitabees.—MARRIAGE with a Kitabee woman is legal, according to the word of God, "WOMEN ARE LAWFUL TO YOU, SUCH AS ARE MAHSANAS OF THE SCRIPTURAL SECTS:" (the term Maḥsana does not, in this passage, imply a Muslamiite, but merely a woman of chaste reputation.)*—Free Kitabee women, and those who are slaves, are equal in point of matrimonial legality, as shall be demonstrated hereafter.

And with Majoosees.—It is unlawful to marry a Majoosee woman, God having said "YE MAY HOLD CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE MAJOOSEES THE SAME AS WITH THE KITABEES, BUT YE MUST NOT MARRY THEIR DAUGHTERS, NOR PARTAKE OF THEIR SACRIFICES."

And with Pagans.—It is unlawful to marry a Pagan woman, according to the words of the KORAN, "MARRY NOT A WOMAN OF THE POLYTHEISTS UNTIL SHE EMBRACE THE FAITH."

And with Sabeans.—A MUSSULMAN may marry a woman of the Sabeans, she believing the scriptures, and professing faith in the prophets; but if she worship the stars, and believe not in any of the divine scriptural revelations, it is unlawful to marry her,—such being idolators.—The diversity of opinion which is recorded between Haneefa and the two disciples, originates in their different ideas with respect to the Sabeans; each arguing according to his own premises, for Haneefa accounts the Sabeans to be Kitabees; whereas the two disciples consider them as worshippers of the stars.

Marriage during pilgrimage.—It is lawful either for a man or a woman to marry during the Ihram† of pilgrimage.—Shafei alleges that it is unlawful. And the same difference of opinion obtains in the case of a Mohrim‡ contracting in marriage a woman to whom he is guardian.—Shafei supports his opinion upon a precept of the prophet, "MOHRIMS marry not, nor cause to marry."—In opposition to this, however our doctors produce the instance of the prophet himself, who married Meyemoona whilst he was a Mohrim; and with respect to the traditionary precept cited by Shafei, as above, it is to be regarded as solely applying to the act of carnal conjunction, that is to say, the word Nikkah§ in that sentence is to be construed into Wuttee,||—as if he had said, "Let not MOHRIMS hold carnal connexion, nor MOHRIMAS admit men to such connexion."—This indeed is rather a weak comment, since the word Nikkah has never been construed into the admitting of man to the commission of the carnal act: but the better principle upon which to answer it is that from the grammatical construction of the sentence, the words of the prophet may be rendered into merely a negative remark, rather than a positive prohibition.

Mussulmans may marry female slaves.—It is lawful for a Mussulman, who is free, to marry a female slave, whether she be a Muslima, or Kitabee, although he be in circumstances to marry a free woman—that is to say, able to pay a dower, and afford an adequate maintenance to such a woman.—Shafei says that a man cannot lawfully marry a Kitabee slave, he holding that it is not lawful for a freeman to marry any slave except of necessity, because by such an act he incurs the consequence of subjecting a portion of his body to bondage; that is to say, his seed (which is a portion of his body) by entering the womb of a slave, is born in bondage; necessity, therefore, he holds can alone legalize such a marriage, and consequently, that ability to pay the dower and maintenance of a free woman prohibits a freeman from marrying a slave; but from this rule he excepts Muslima slaves.—With our doctors, on the other hand, marriage with female slaves of every description is legal, because the text of the KORAN, on which the legality of marriage is founded, extends to all descriptions of women, to slaves as well as to those who are free:—and, with respect to what Shafei objects, that “by such an act a man incurs the consequence of subjecting a portion of his body to bondage,” it may be replied that, by marrying a slave, a man is only withheld from producing free children; but it is not thence to be concluded that he, de facto, subjects a portion of his body to slavery, as this portion (to wit, his seed) is neither free nor otherwise; and as a man is at liberty to abstain from producing the child itself (either by not marrying, or by marrying a woman who is barren), it follows that he is certainly at liberty to abstain from producing it in a state of freedom.

A man already wedded to a free woman cannot marry a slave.—It is unlawful for a man already married to a free woman to marry a slave, the prophet having issued a precept to this effect, “Do not marry a slave upon [along with] a free woman.”—Shafei says that the marriage of a slave upon a free woman is lawful to a man who is a slave; and Malik likewise maintains that it is lawful, provided it be with the free woman’s consent.—The above precept, however, is an answer to both, as it is general and unconditional:—moreover, the legality of marriage is a blessing to males and females equally, but the enjoyment of it is by bondage restricted to one half, inasmuch that slaves can have only two wives, whereas freemen may legally have four (as will be explained hereafter), and slavery operating thus restrictively upon males does so equally upon females;—upon the former it operates by a restriction in point of number, as above; but since, with respect to females, this is impossible, it has its effect by a restriction in point of circumstances; for instance, by restricting the legality of the marriage of female slaves to certain particular circumstances, as in the present case, where it is admitted only under the circumstance of the man not having any free wives.

But a man wedded to a slave may marry a free woman.—A MAN may lawfully marry a free woman upon a slave, the prophet having so declared:—moreover, a woman who is free is lawful under all circumstances, the principle of restriction before mentioned not operating with respect to such a woman.

If a man marry a slave during the Edit of complete divorce of another wife who is free, it is null, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples allege that it is valid, as under the circumstances now recited it does not amount to marrying a slave upon a free woman; whence it is that if a man were to make a vow that he would not marry another woman upon his present wife, and he were afterwards to divorce his wife, and to marry another woman during her Edit, he would not be forsworn. The argument of Haneefa, in this case, is that the marriage with the free wife does still in some shape remain, on account of the continuance of several of its effects; wherefore that with a slave during the term of the free woman’s Edit is not admissible, on a principle of caution: contrary to the case of a vow, as recited above, because there the intention of the vower goes only to express that he would not introduce another wife to the prejudice of her right of Kism; but her right of Kism* is annihilated by divorce.

Four wives allowed to freemen.—It is lawful for a freeman to marry four wives, whether free or slaves: but it is not lawful for him to marry more than four, because God has commanded in the KORAN, saying, “YE MAY MARRY WHATSOEVER WOMEN ARE AGREEABLE TO YOU, TWO, THREE, OR FOUR,” and the numbers being thus expressly mentioned, any beyond what is there specified would be unlawful.—Shafei alleges a man cannot lawfully marry more than one woman of the description of slaves, from his tenet as above recited, that “the marriage of freemen with slaves is allowable only from necessity;” the text already quoted, is, however, in proof against him, since the term Nissa [woman] applies equally to free women and to slaves.

And two to slaves.—It is unlawful for a man who is a slave to marry more than two women; Malik maintains that it is lawful for a slave to marry as many women as a freeman, he holding it as a principle, that a slave, with respect to marriage, is in every particular the same as a free person, inasmuch that (according to him) a slave is authorized to marry without his proprietor’s consent.—The argument of our doctors, in this case, is that slavery operates to the privation of one half of the natural privileges and enjoyments, and the legality of four wives in marriage being of this description, it follows that the privilege of a slave extends to the possession of two wives only, in order that the dignity of freedom may be duly supported.

A man having the full number of wives allowed, cannot marry during the Edit of one of them.—If a man, having four wives, repudiate one of them, it is unlawful for him to marry any other woman during the term of that wife's Edit, whether the divorce, under which she stands repudiated, be reversible or complete. Shafei's doctrine differs from this. His reasoning, and the reply to it, are the same as in the case of a man marrying a sister of his wife during the term of the latter's Edit.

A man may marry a woman pregnant by whoredom.—A MAN may lawfully marry a woman pregnant by whoredom, but he must not cohabit with her until after her delivery. —This is the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf says that a marriage made under such a circumstance is invalid: if, however, the descent of the Fœtus be known and established, the marriage is null, according to all the doctors.—The argument upon which Aboo Yoosaf supports his opinion as above, is, that the illegality of the marriage, in cases where the parentage of the Fœtus is established, originates purely in a principle of tenderness towards the Fœtus, and a Fœtus is an object of this tenderness, although it be begot in adultery, since it is innocent of any offence; whence procuring the abortion of it is illegal; marriage, therefore, with a woman pregnant by adultery is invalid, equally with one where the parentage of the Fœtus is ascertained, and for the same reason. Our doctors, upon this point, argue that the woman is lawful in matrimony, on the authority of the sacred writings, the KORAN saying, "ALL WOMEN ARE LAWFUL TO YOU, EXCEPTING THOSE WITHIN THE PROHIBITED DEGREES:" and the prohibition of cohabitation until after delivery, is merely on account of the impropriety of sowing seed in a soil already impregnated by another, a prohibition which occurs in the traditions. With respect to what Aboo Yoosaf alleges, that "the illegality of the marriage in cases where the parentage of the Fœtus is established, originates purely in a principle of tenderness towards the Fœtus,"—it is altogether unfounded, because the nullity of the marriage in that case originates in a regard for the right, not of the Fœtus, but of the father.

But not a captive taken in that state.—It is unlawful to marry a woman taken in war, being pregnant at the time of her capture, because the parentage of her Fœtus is ascertained.*

A man cannot contract his Am-Walid[†] (being pregnant) to another.—If a man contract his Am-Walid, who is pregnant by him, to another man, it is null, because the Am-Walid is accounted as the Firash of her master, or partner of his bed, inasmuch that the parentage of her child is established by the law in him, independent of any formal claim or acknowledgment thereof on his part; wherefore, if the marriage were valid, it would induce the existence of a right to cohabitation in two individuals with one and the same woman, a right which is null, as it would occasion a doubtful parentage.

OBJECTION.—The Am-Walid being declared the Firash of her master, it would appear that his marriage of her to another would not be legal, although she were not pregnant.

REPLY.—The Firash right of a master in his Am-Walid is of but weak consideration; whence it is, that if he were to deny her child's descent from him, it would become bastardized on the instant, without any asseveration. His Firash right in her, therefore, not being of any account, independent of pregnancy, is not prohibitory to her marriage, unless as connected with that circumstance.

But he may so contract his enjoyed female slave.—If a man have carnal connexion with his female slave, and afterwards contract her in marriage to another man, it is lawful; because an absolute slave is not accounted as a Firash, or partner of her master's bed, since, if she were to produce a child, the parentage would not be established in him unless he were to claim it.—But yet it is advisable that the master, previous to contracting her to another person, suffer one term of her courses to elapse, so as to guard against the possibility of his seed mixing with that of the other.—It is to be remarked, in this place, that the marriage of the slave, under the circumstance now mentioned, being valid, it is lawful for her husband to have carnal connexion with her immediately, and before her purification from her first succeeding courses, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf.—Mohammed alleges, however, that it will be laudable in the husband to abstain from carnal connexion with her until one complete term of her courses shall have elapsed, because it is possible that there may remain in her womb seed of her master,—wherefore it is requisite that it be purified of that seed, the same as in a case of the purchase of a female slave.—The argument of the two Elders, in this case, is that the institute of the law, legalizing her marriage, is in itself a proof that her womb is unoccupied, as the law does not admit any marriage to be legal but under that supposition; wherefore purification, in the present instance, is not made a rule, either laudable or injunctive: contrary to a case of purchase, that of a female slave being held lawful although she be pregnant.

If a man marry a woman, knowing her to have been guilty of whoredom, he may lawfully have carnal connexion with her immediately, before her purification from her courses, according to the two Elders: but Mohammed deems it laudable that he have no such connexion with her until after her purification.—The reasoning of each upon this point is to the same effect as in the preceding case.

An usufructuary marriage is void.—A NIKKAH MATAT, or usufructuary marriage, where a man says to a woman "I will take the use of you for such a time for so much," is void, all the companions having agreed in the illegality of it.—It is related in the Nakl Saheeh, that Ibn Abbas retracted from his first opinion and embraced that of the other companions:—for Ibn Abbas was first of opinion that the usufruct here mentioned is allowable; but Alee informed him that the prophet had declared it unlawful, upon which he retracted from his opinion of usufruct being allowable:—and Ibn Abbas having thus retracted, all the companions appear to have agreed concerning its illegality.

And so also a temporary marriage.—A NIKKAH MOWOKKET, or temporary marriage,--where a man marries a woman, under an engagement of ten days (for instance), in the presence of two witnesses,—is null. Ziffer asserts that such marriage is valid and binding, the condition expressed of a specified period for its continuance being of no effect; because a marriage is not to be held null on account of a null or illegal condition therein expressed.—The argument of our doctors is that a temporary marriage is of the same nature with a usufructuary marriage; and in all contracts regard is had to the sense rather than to the letter, wherefore a temporary marriage is null as well as a usufructuary marriage, whether the period specified be short or long; because the principle on which a contract of marriage falls under the description of Matat, or usufructuary, is its containing a specification of time; and the same is found in a Nikkah Mowokket, or temporary marriage.

Case of a double marriage by one contract.—If a man marry two women by one contract, one of whom is lawful to him, and the other prohibited, his marriage with the one who is lawful holds good, but that with the other is void, because in that only a cause of nullity is found: contrary to where a man puts together a freeman and a slave, and sells them by one agreement, as such sale is null with respect to both, because sale is rendered null by an invalid condition, and the consent to the contract of sale is required with respect to the free person, in order to the legality of it with respect to the slave; this is therefore an invalid condition, as shall be demonstrated in treating of slaves.—It is to be observed that the whole of the stipulated dower, in the case now recited, goes to her with respect to whom the marriage is lawful, according to Hanceefa.—

With the two disciples, on the contrary, the dower is divided into the proper dower to each*, and therefore she with respect to whom the marriage is legal receives the amount of her proper dower, and the remainder drops in favour of the husband; and the same is recorded in the Mabsoot.

Case of marriage by a judicial decree.—If a woman sue a man on a plea of marriage, declaring that such an one had married her, and produce evidence in proof of her affirmation, and the Kazee accordingly declare her to be the wife of such a man, and it should so happen that the man had never been actually married to that woman, yet he may, after this, lawfully reside with her;—and this is a sign of the authority of a judicial decree (or order of the Kazee) in regard to appearance: and if the woman desire carnal connexion, the man may lawfully hold such connexion with her;—and this is a sign of the authority of a judicial decree, in reality.—The authority of the judicial decree extending both to appearance and reality is a tenet of Hanceefa: and is also found in a prior opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.—In a more recent opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, and with Mohammed and Shafei, it is not lawful for the man to have carnal connexion with this woman, because the Kazee has erred in his proof, as the witnesses bore false testimony, and an error in the proof destroys the authority of the decree in regard to reality; wherefore it is, in some measure, the same as if the witnesses were slaves or infidels, in which case the decree would have no authority either in appearance or reality; and so it would appear in the present instance likewise; but here the decree has authority in regard to appearance, on account that the witnesses gave a true testimony in appearance; yet it has no authority in reality, as their testimony is false in point of fact; whereas, where the witnesses are slaves or infidels, the decree is destitute of authority in appearance also, as the proof remains unestablished even in appearance, since the discovery of their being slaves or infidels is practicable.—The argument of Hanceefa is that the witnesses are held, with the Kazee, to bear true testimony, and this is proof, as it is impossible to ascertain whether their testimony be actually true: contrary to the state of bondage, or the infidelity of witnesses, as these are circumstances easily known and ascertained, wherefore their evidence is not proof in any way.—Now the decree being founded on the proof, and the authority of the decree, in respect to reality, being here possible, by previously taking the marriage for granted, as a matter of necessity, it follows that the decree has authority in respect to reality, in order that the contradiction between the two may be obviated in every shape,—for if she were not lawful to him in reality, it would occasion a contradiction between the two, instead of obviating a contradiction: contrary to a case of property claimed generally (that is to say, without any mention of the cause of propriety), such as if a man were to claim a female slave generally, and bring false evidence, and the Kazez decree the slave to the plaintiff, and it afterwards appear that the witness bore false testimony,—for in this case the decree has authority in appearance, but not in reality, because the causes of propriety in the slave are several, such as sale, purchase, gift, and inheritance, and regard cannot legally be had to any one of these as being prior to the others, since no one of them has precedence of the others, and to regard the whole of them as prior, is impossible; wherefore the decree cannot possess any authority [in reality]. Observe that the previously taking the marriage for granted, as a matter of necessity, is on account that a decree signifies the promulgation of a thing which is established, and not the establishment of a thing which is not established,—for, if it were not previously taken for granted, it would follow that a decree signifies the establishment of a thing which is unestablished, wherefore the marriage is necessarily first taken for granted; and this is possible in the case of a claim of marriage, but not in a case of general propriety, for the causes of propriety there are multifarious, and no one of these has priority over the other;—in such a case, therefore, the regarding of any one cause of propriety as prior to the others is impossible.

CHAPTER II.

OF GUARDIANSHIP AND EQUALITY.

An adult female may engage in the contract without her guardian's consent.—A WOMAN who is an adult, and of sound mind, may be married by virtue of her own consent, although the contract may not have been made or acceded to by her guardians; and this, whether she be a virgin or a Siyecba.—This is the opinion of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, as appears in the Zahir Rawayet.—It is recorded, from Aboo Yoosaf, that her marriage cannot be contracted except through her guardian. Mohammed holds that the marriage may be contracted, but yet its validity is suspended upon the guardian's consent: on the other hand, Malik and Shafei assert that a woman can by no means contract herself in marriage to a man in any circumstance, whether with or without the consent of her guardians:—neither is she competent to contract her daughter or her slave, nor to act as a matrimonial agent for any one, so as to enter into a contract of marriage on behalf of her constituent; because the end proposed in marriage, is the acquisition of those benefits which it produces, such as procreation, and so forth: and if the performance of this contract were in any respect committed to women, its end might be defeated, they being of weak reason, and open to flattery and deceit.—Mohammed argues that this apprehension is done away by the permission of the guardian being made a requisite condition.—The reasoning upon which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds in this case is that, in marrying, the woman has performed an act affecting herself only, and to this she is fully competent, as being sane and adult, and capable of distinguishing good from evil, whence it is that she is by law capacitated to act for herself in all matters of property, and likewise to choose a husband; neither does a woman require her guardian to match her for any other reason than as she may, by that means, avoid the imputation which might be thrown upon her modesty if she were to perform this herself; for all which reasons a woman contracting herself in marriage is valid, independent of her guardian, although it should be an unequal match; but yet, in the latter case, the guardian is at liberty to dissolve the marriage.

Unless the match be unequal.—It is recorded as an opinion of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, that the marriage is illegal if there be an inequality between the parties.—It is also recorded that Mohammed afterwards adopted the sentiments of the two elders upon this point, and agreed with them, that the marriage here treated of is lawful, and that its validity is not suspended upon the approbation of the guardian.

An adult virgin cannot be married against her will.—It is not lawful for a guardian to force into marriage an adult virgin against her consent.—This is contrary to the doctrine of Shafei, who accounts an adult virgin the same as an infant, with respect to marriage, since the former cannot be acquainted with the nature of marriage any more than the latter, as being equally uninformed with respect to the matrimonial state, whence it is that the father of such an one is empowered to make seizin of her dower without her consent.—The argument of our doctors is that the woman, in this case, is free, and a Mokhatiba (that is, subject to all the obligatory observances of the law, such as fasting, prayer, and so forth), wherefore no person is endowed with any absolute authority of guardianship over her: contrary to the case of infants, over whom others are necessarily endowed with this authority, the understanding of such being defective, whereas that of an adult is held complete, in consequence of her having attained to years of discretion; for, if it were otherwise, she would not be subject to the observances of the law: from all which it follows that this woman is the same as an adult son; and that all her acts with respect to matrimony are good and valid, the same as his with respect to property; neither is her father empowered to make seizin of her dower without her consent expressed or virtually understood, as he is not at liberty to do so where she has forbidden him.

Tokens of consent from a virgin.—WHENEVER a guardian, being the person empowered to engage in the contract, requires the consent of an adult virgin to a marriage, if she smile or remain silent, this is a compliance; because the prophet has said, "A virgin must be consulted in every thing which regards herself; and if she be silent it signifies assent;" and also, because her assent is rather to be supposed, as she is ashamed to testify her desire; and laughter is a still more certain token of assent than silence: contrary to weeping, as this manifests abhorrence, since tears are most commonly the effect of grief, and not of joy, which is rarely the occasion of them, and therefore not to be regarded. —Some have said that if her laughter be in the manner of jest or derision it is not a compliance; nor is her weeping a disapproval, if it be not accompanied with noise or lamentation.

BUT if a marriage be proposed to an adult virgin by any other than her guardians, or by a Walee Bayced (or guardian of a more distant degree than her father, brother, or uncle), her silence or laughter are not sufficient, until she shall from her lips pronounce an explicit compliance, because here her silence might be construed to arise from shyness towards such a person as being a stranger, and not from her consent to the match; and if it were even to be considered as a token of approbation, yet, under such a circumstance, it must be regarded as doubtful: but this is not the case if the person who proposes the marriage be acting merely as a messenger from her parent, or other immediate guardian; because to such an one the same signs of assent or dissent suffice as were specified in the preceding case.—It is here to be observed that, in requiring the woman's consent as aforesaid, it is requisite that the husband proposed to her be particularly named, and described, so as to enable her to form some idea of him, whereby to ascertain her liking or dislike; but it is unnecessary to name or specify the dower; and this is approved, because marriage may be effected independent of any dower, as that is not essential to it.

IF a man contract an adult virgin in marriage to another without her knowledge, upon her receiving intelligence of it the same tokens suffice, to signify her compliance or approval, as were specified in the former case; that is to say, if she laugh or remain silent she consents, or if she weep she disapproves, provided the person contracting on her behalf be her guardian, and as such empowered so to contract; but if the contract be entered into by any other than her guardian, her consent is not understood until she shall have expressed the same in terms; and in this, as in the preceding case, the naming and describing of the husband to her is a requisite condition, but not the specification of the dower.—It is to be here observed that, if the person who conveys the intelligence to her be a Fazoolee (that is, one who is neither an agent nor guardian), number or integrity are conditions essential to the effect; that is to say, the information must be conveyed to her by two persons, or at least by one person of known good repute, according to Haneefa: but if the informer be acting merely as a messenger from the guardian, then neither number nor integrity are conditions, according to all the doctors. There are many cases similar to this with respect to the point at present in question, such as the recall of an ambassador, and the revocation of the privileges of a Mazoon.

Tokens of consent from a Siyeeba.—IF a guardian propose a marriage to a Siyeeba (or woman with whom a man has had carnal connexion), it is necessary that her compliance be particularly expressed by words, such as, "I consent to it," because the prophet has said, "SIYEEBAS are to be consulted," and also because a Siyeeba, having had connexion with man, has not the same pretence to silence or shyness as a virgin, and consequently the silent signs before intimated are not sufficient indications of her assent to the proposed alliance.

Cases under which a woman is still considered as a virgin, in respect to the tokens of consent.—IF the signs of virginity in a girl should happen to be effaced, either by leaping or any other exertion, or by a wound, or by frequent repetitions of the menses, yet she is still to be considered as a virgin; that is to say, her silence is a sufficient sign of her acquiescence in a marriage proposed, because she is still in reality a virgin, the law accounting every woman such who has not had carnal connexion with the other sex, —and consequently subject to the same shyness and reserve, from her not being accustomed to male society.—And if the signs of virginity be effaced even by fornication, yet she here also stands as a virgin, according to Haneefa. Abou Yoosaf, Mohammed, and Shafei, are of opinion that the silence of such an one is not a sufficient token of consent to a marriage proposed, because she is actually a Siyeeba, since she has actually had connexion with man.—Haneefa in this case argues that people in general still suppose her to be a virgin, and hence consider her speaking as a breach of decorum, and consequently she will refrain from speech; her silence, therefore, must be held sufficient, lest her delicacy be violated: contrary to a case where a woman has lost her virginity either in an erroneous or an invalid marriage, as such an one would not be held a virgin with respect to the point in question, the law having manifested her carnal connexion, by instituting, in her case, observances which are a consequence of it (such as Edit and Dower), and by establishing the parentage of her child, whereas it recommends as laudable, the concealment of fornication: this, however, is only where the case is not of a very notorious nature; for if a woman be known to abandon herself to fornication publicly, her silence would not be deemed sufficient.

and denial.—If a man should say to a woman, "You have heard of your being contracted to me by our friends, and remained silent;" and she reply, "No, I refused you," or, "I dissented," her declaration is to be credited.—Ziffer says that the declaration of the husband is to be credited, on account that silence is the original state of man, wherefore the person who adheres to that is the defendant; and the repulsion of the marriage is supervenient, wherefore the person who adheres to that is the plaintiff; the case is therefore the same as where a person enters into a contract of sale under a condition of option, and pleads a rejection after the time of option has elapsed, and the other denies the rejection,—for in that case the declaration of the denier is to be credited, as he adheres to what is original, to wit, silence. Our doctors, on the other hand, say that the husband, in the present case, on account of his plea of silence, pleads the obligation of the contract of marriage, and consequently of his being the proprietor of the woman's person;* and, that the wife, by pleading the rejection, sets aside the claim of her husband, and must therefore be considered as the defendant, in the same manner as when a depositor pleads the restoration of a deposit, and the proprietor of the deposit declares that he had not returned it to him; because, in such a case, the declaration of the trustee would be credited, since he is in reality the defendant, although in appearance he be the plaintiff, for he frees himself from responsibility, and the original state of man is freedom, and an exemption from responsibility:—it is otherwise with respect to the case of a condition of option in sale, because the obligation of a sale is manifested after the lapse of the time of option, and therefore the person who pleads the rejection is plaintiff both in reality and in appearance. But here, if the husband should produce evidence in support of his silence, the marriage becomes established: if, however, he have no evidence, then an oath must not be imposed upon the wife, according to Haneefa.—This is one out of six cases in which an oath is incumbent upon the defendant, according to Haneefa, in opposition to the opinion of the two disciples; as will be fully treated of under the head of sales.

Infants may be contracted by their guardians.—THE marriage of a boy or girl under age, by the authority of their paternal kindred, is lawful, whether the girl be a virgin or not, the prophet having declared "Marriage is committed to the paternal kindred."² Malik alleges that this is a power the exercise of which does not appertain to any of the kindred except the father.—Shafei maintains that it belongs only to her father or grandfather: and he adds that this privilege does not appertain to any guardian whatever with respect to an infant Siyeeba, although he be her father or her grandfather.—Malik argues that power over freemen is established from necessity; but in the present instance no such necessity exists, as infants are not subject to any carnal appetite; yet it is vested in a father, on the authority of the sacred writings, contrary to what analogy would suggest:—but he also says that a grandfather, not being the same as a father, is not to be included with him. Our doctors, on the other hand, allege that the guardianship vested in a father is in no respect contrary, but is rather agreeable to analogy; because marriage is a point which involves in it many considerations, both civil and religious; and it is not perfect unless the parties be equal in degree according to the customary acceptance; and this equality is not always to be found; wherefore authority is vested in the father to contract his children during their minority, lest an opportunity of marrying them equally might be lost.—Shafei argues, that entrusting the power of contracting marriage to any others than the father or grandfather would be oppressive upon the child, since it is to be supposed that no others are equally interested in its welfare or happiness; on which principle it is that kindred of a more distant degree are not empowered to act with respect to the property of infants, a matter of infinitely less importance than their persons, and consequently the acts of such, with respect to the latter, are unlawful à fortiori.—Our doctors argue, that affinity is a cause of affection in other relations the same as in the parents, and in whatever degree that may be defective, a provision is made against any evil consequence, by vesting in the child an option of acquiescence in the match after puberty, which acquiescence is necessary to constitute its validity: contrary to the case of acts with respect to property, because these are capable of repetition, since they are done with a view to the acquisition of gain, which cannot be obtained but by such repetition; and such being the case, if any loss should happen in the property, it is irretrievable; wherefore authority to act in respect to property is useless, unless it be absolute; and absolute authority cannot be established where there is any defect. The argument of Shafei, in support of his second proposition (to wit, "that this privilege does not appertain to any guardian whatever with respect to an infant Siyeeba, although he be her father or grandfather"), is, that her becoming a Siyeeba is to be considered as endowing her with sufficient understanding and capacity to act and judge for herself, on account of her being thus accustomed to male society, wherefore the law operates upon this consideration,

* Arab. Booza, i.e. Genitale Mulieris. The phrase here adopted is to be thus understood, in marriage and divorce, throughout.

without any regard to the absolute fact of her being endowed with such a portion of understanding or not, as that is a matter which does not readily admit of ascertainment. To this our doctors reply, that the infant requires a guardian whose tenderness and affection must be necessarily admitted; neither can her acquaintance with the other sex be considered as endowing her with any additional portion of understanding in regard to mankind, without concupiscence, which, in a child, does not exist.—It may also be further observed that the precept of the prophet already quoted is general and indiscriminate, and therefore includes all relations equally; which makes it a sufficient answer to Malik and Shafei.

RELATIONS stand in the same order in point of authority to contract minors in marriage as they do in point of inheritance; but this authority, in the more distant relatives, is superseded by the existence of those of a nearer degree.

Case in which the marriage of infants continues binding after puberty.—If the marriage of infants be contracted by the fathers or grandfathers, no option after puberty remains to them; because the determination of parents in this matter cannot be suspected to originate in sinister motives, as their affection for their offspring is undoubted; wherefore the marriage is binding upon the parties, the same as if they had themselves entered into it after maturity.

Case which admits an option of acquiescence after puberty.—But if the contract should have been executed by the authority of others than their parents, each is respectively at liberty, after they become of age, to choose whether the marriage shall be confirmed or annulled.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Abou Yoosaf maintains that, in this case also, no option remains to them, since he considers all guardians to be the same as parents. To this Haneefa and Mohammed reply, that the more distant the guardians stand in their affinity to the parties, the less warm are their affections supposed to be; whence it is to be apprehended that, in contracting the marriage, self interest, or some other sinister motive, might operate in their minds to the disadvantage of the infant under their guardianship, an evil which is provided against by leaving an option to the infant after maturity.—It is to be observed, however, that this case, applying generally to all except the father and grandfather, includes the mother of the infant, and also the Kaze; because the former, as being a woman, is deficient in judgment; and the latter, as a stranger, in affection; and consequently a right of option must be reserved to the infant after maturity.—It is also to be remarked that, in dissolving the marriage, decree of the Kaze is a necessary condition in all cases of option exerted after maturity; contrary to the rule in the exertion of a similar right of option after manumission; that is to say, if a master marry his female slave to any person, and afterwards emancipate her, she will have a right of option upon her emancipation; if she please the marriage continues, but if she disapprove it is dissolved; and the decree of the Kaze is not essential to such dissolution: but it is otherwise in the case of option after maturity; because that option is reserved with a view to guard against injury to the other rights of the parties, which might occur in a variety of instances, and which, if admitted (as, if the marriage were absolute, they must be), would be calculated to introduce many evils into the married state, since the guardian might, for instance, in executing the contract, agree to an inadequate dower, or to an unequal match; and as the dissolution of the marriage thus tends to affect other rights, a decree of the Kaze is essential thereto: but, in the case of the female slave, the right of option after emancipation is intended as a security against an evident injury to herself, as the husband's power over her is extended, and his authority, as well as her obligations, in many respects enlarged, by her emancipation from slavery; whence it is that this right of option is restricted to female slaves only, and does not extend to males, to whom the above principle would not apply; and such being the case, the dissolution of her marriage is to be regarded merely as the removal of a hardship from herself, in which the decree of the Kaze is no way necessary, since all persons are entitled to relieve themselves from evil.

Locus of acquiescence after puberty.—If the female, thus contracted during infancy, be of age when the marriage is first mentioned to her, and she upon that occasion remain silent, her silence (according to Haneefa and Mohammed), is to be construed into consent; but if she continue ignorant of the contract, her right of option is still reserved to her, until such time as she is informed of it, and remain silent as above.—Mohammed, in this case, makes it a condition that the girl be duly informed of the marriage, because she cannot exert her right of option without a knowledge of that circumstance, as the guardian may effect the marriage altogether unknown to her, and it may consequently happen that she never hears of it, and of course she would remain excused (as to her silence) on the ground of ignorance; but he does not make a knowledge of her right of option a condition, because that is an institute of the law, and ignorance is no plea with respect to an institute of the law, with which it is supposed that every person ought to be acquainted; the case is otherwise with a female slave, who being employed in the service of her master has no opportunity to obtain any knowledge of the law, wherefore ignorance of this point is a good plea in favour of the continuance of her right of option.

Circumstances which annul the right of option.—THE right of option in a virgin, after maturity, is done away by her silence; but the right of option of a man is not done away by the same circumstance, nor until he express his approbation by word or by deed, such as presenting her dower, cohabiting with her, and so forth: and in like manner the right of option of the female after maturity (in a case where the husband has enjoyed her before she attained to that state), is not annulled until she express her consent or disapprobation in terms (as if she were to say "I approve," or, "I disapprove," or until her consent be virtually shown by her conduct, in admitting the husband to carnal connexion, and so forth.

Degree of the continuance of a right of option after maturity.—THE option of maturity of a virgin is not protracted to the end of the assembly;* but that of a Siyeeba, or a youth, is not annulled even by the rising from the assembly, because the option of maturity is established by dissent, on account of the apprehension of the ends of marriage being defeated; and whatever is established by dissent is annulled by assent, on account of its advantage being obtained; now the silence of a virgin is assent, but not that of a Siyeeba, or a youth; wherefore the option of the former is annulled, but not that of the two latter:—moreover, a Siyeeba's option of maturity† has not been established by the act of her husband, as is evident; and a circumstance which is not established by the act of the husband is not restricted to that assembly, since that only which is delegated‡ is so restricted, as shall be hereafter demonstrated; § contrary to the option of manumission, as that is not annulled by silence, but is protracted to the end of the assembly, and annulled by the rising from the assembly, because the option of manumission is established by the act of the master, namely, emancipation; and hence regard is had to the Majlis in this case, as well as in that of a woman endowed by her husband with an option of divorce.

in consequence of option is not annulled.—A SEPARATION between a husband and wife in consequence of option after maturity is not divorce, from whatever side it proceed, because it may with propriety proceed from the wife, whereas divorce cannot. And so also, separation in consequence of option after manumission is not divorce, for the same reason.

Rule of inheritance in the marriage of infants.—If a girl who has been contracted in marriage by her guardians, as already stated, should die before she attain maturity, her husband inherits of her: and, in like manner, if a youth so contracted should die before he attains maturity, his wife inherits of him;—and so also, if either should happen to die after maturity, without a separation having taken place:—because the marriage contract was regular and valid ab origine, and would remain so, until dissolved by the dissent of one or both of the parties in the event of their arriving at maturity; but this being precluded by the demise of one of them, the marriage continues good for ever; and consequently all the mutual privileges established in the parties by the marriage are irreversibly confirmed by the decease of either of them:—contrary to the case of a marriage contracted by an unauthorized person, where, if either of the parties were to die before assent being duly expressed, the other would not inherit; because, in this case, the existence of the marriage is suspended upon the consent of the parties, and is consequently rendered null by the demise of either previous to the declaration of their will in it; whereas, in the other case, the decease of either party, previous to maturity or separation, as aforesaid, does not annul, but rather confirms their marriage.

incapable of acting as guardians in marriage.—AUTHORITY to contract others in marriage is not vested in a slave, an infant, or a lunatic, because such persons, being considered in law as incapable of acting for themselves, are incompetent to exercise any authority over others, a fortiori: moreover, this authority is established in guardians and others out of tenderness to persons who, from their situation, require attention and care (such as infants and lunatics); but this would not be manifested by committing the execution of marriage, on their behalf, to persons of the above descriptions.

AN infidel cannot be vested with this authority with respect to a Mussulman, male or female, because the word of GOD says "HE DOETH NOT ADMIT INFIDELS TO ANY CLAIM UPON BELIEVERS;" and, if this authority were vested in infidels, it would be admitting them to such a claim: and hence also it is, that the evidence of infidels regarding Mussulmans is not admitted; and, upon the same principle, that Mussulmans and infidels cannot inherit of each other.

AN infidel is vested with this authority with respect to his children who are infidels, the word of GOD saying, "INFIDELS MAY EXERCISE AUTHORITY OVER INFIDELS;" whence it is that the evidence of infidels regarding infidels is admitted, and that inheritance obtains among them.

Maternal relations may act in defect of the paternal.—IN defect of paternal relations, authority to contract marriage appertains to the maternal (if they be of the same family or tribe), such as the mother, or maternal uncle or aunt, and all others within the prohibited degrees, according to Hancefa,

* Arab. Majlis, meaning the place or company in which she may happen to be at the time of her attaining maturity. It is treated of at large elsewhere. Vide Index.

† By option of maturity, and option of manumission, is meant, option of acquiescence after maturity, or after manumission.

‡ Namely, a power of divorce.

§ See Book of Divorce, Chap. III.

upon a principle of benevolence.—Mohammed alleges that this authority is not vested in any except the paternal kindred; and there is also an opinion of Haneefa on record to this effect.—Of Abou Yousaf two opinions have been mentioned; according to that most generally received, he coincides with Mohammed; and their arguments on this subject are twofold: •FIRST, the prophet has declared “Marriage is committed to the paternal kindred” (as was before quoted); SECONDLY, the only reason for instituting this authority is that families may be preserved from improper or unequal connexion; and this guard over the honour of a family is committed to the paternal relatives, whose peculiar province it is to take care that their stock be not exposed to any mean or debasing admixture, so as to subject them to shame.—The argument of Haneefa is, that authority to contract marriage is instituted out of a regard to the interest of the child, which is fully manifested by committing it to persons whose relation to the infant is so near as to render them interested in its welfare.

Or the Mawla of an infant female slave.—If the Mawla* of an infant female slave, having emancipated her, should contract her in marriage, it is lawful, although she have relations within the prohibited degrees upon the spot, provided there be not among them any relations of the paternal description, because the Mawla stands as a paternal relation with respect to her.

Or the Magistrate in defect of a natural guardian.—WHERE persons are destitute of any natural guardian, the authority of contracting them in marriage is vested in the Imam or the Kazee; because the prophet has, in his precepts, declared, “Persons being destitute of guardians have a guardian in the Sultan.”

Or the nearest guardian present in the absence of others.—If the parents, or other first natural guardians of an infant, should be removed to such a distance as is termed Gheebat-Moonkatat, it is in that case lawful for the guardian next in degree to contract the infant in marriage.—Ziffer and Shafoi allege that it is not lawful, because this authority is vested in the first guardian as a right, in order that the family may be preserved from the shame occasioned by the infant forming a degrading connexion; and this being a positive right, cannot be annulled by the absence of the party, as the law does not admit absence to be destructive of a right; and hence it is that if the absent guardian were to contract the infant in marriage on the spot where he may at that period happen to be, it is lawful; moreover, a relation of a more distant degree is not vested with authority in the existence of a nearer relative, since the more distant is precluded by the nearer.—The argument of our doctors is that authority to contract minors in marriage is instituted out of regard to their interest, as was already noticed; whence it is that this authority is not admitted over any, excepting such as are incapable of paying the necessary attention to their own interest; and this regard is not manifested in committing the business of marriage to the nearer guardian, who is absent, as from the exertion of his prudence or good sense no advantage can, in that situation, be easily derived; the authority, therefore, in this case, devolves to the guardian next in degree who is present:—moreover, as, in case the first guardian were to die, or to become insane, the authority would devolve to the next in degree, so does it likewise in the present case. And with respect to what Ziffer and Shafoi have advanced, that “if the absent guardian were to contract the infant in marriage on the spot where he may at that period happen to be, it is lawful,”—the assertion is not admitted: but even granting this, it is still to be observed, that although the more distant guardian be further removed from the infant in point of consanguinity, yet, being upon the spot, he is enabled to transact for the latter, with the advantage of immediate and local knowledge; and vice versa of the other guardians. Thus they stand upon an equal footing with respect to authority; and whoever of them may enter into a contract of marriage on behalf of the infant, the same holds good, and is not liable to be set aside.—By the absence termed Gheebat-Moonkatat, is to be understood the guardian being removed to a city out of the track of the caravans, or which is not visited by the caravan more than once in every year; some, however, have defined it to signify any distance amounting to three days’ journey.

The guardianship over a lunatic woman rests with her son.—If a lunatic woman have two guardians, one her son and the other her father, the authority of disposing of her in marriage rests with the former and not with the latter, according to Haneefa and Abou Yoosaf. Mohammed says that the father is her guardian in this respect, as feeling a more lively interest in her than the son.—The argument of the two Elders is that a son is prior to all others of the parental kindred; and the right of guardianship goes by this right of priority, in preference to affection: thus any paternal kinsman (such as the son of the father’s brother, for instance), is in this respect prior to the maternal grandfather, although the natural affection of the latter be admitted to be the strongest.

Section.—Of Kafat, or Equality.

Definition of Kafat.—KAFAT, in its literal sense, means equality.—In the language of the law it signifies the equality of a man, with a woman, in the several particulars which shall be immediately specified.

* Meaning the emancipator. For a full definition of this term, see the Emancipation of Slaves.

Equality necessary in marriage.—IN marriage regard is had to equality, because the prophet has commanded, saying, "Take ye care that none contract women in marriage but their proper guardians, and that they be not so contracted but with their equals; and also, because the desirable ends of marriage, such as cohabitation, society, and friendship, cannot be completely enjoyed excepting by persons who are each other's equals (according to the customary estimation of equality), as a woman of high rank and family would abhor society and cohabitation with a mean man; it is requisite, therefore, that regard be had to equality with respect to the husband; that is to say, that the husband be the equal of his wife; but it is not necessary that the wife be the equal of the husband, since men are not degraded by cohabitation with women who are their inferiors.—It is proper to observe, in this place, that one reason for attending to equality in marriage is, that regard is had to that circumstance in confirming a marriage and establishing its validity; for if a woman should match herself to a man who is her inferior, her guardians have a right to separate them, so as to remove the dishonour they might otherwise sustain by it.

In point of tribe or family.—EQUALITY is regarded with respect to lineage, this being a source of distinction among mankind; thus it is said, "a Kooraiish is the equal of a Kooraiish throughout all their tribes;" that is to say, there is no pre-eminence among them, between Hashmees and Nillees, Teyemees or Adwees; and in like manner they say, "an Arab is the equal of an Arab."—This sentiment originates in a precept of the prophet to this effect; and hence it is evident that there is no pre-eminence considered among the Kooraiish tribes: and with respect to what Imam Mohammed has advanced, that "pre-eminence is not regarded among the Kooraiish tribes or families, excepting where the same is notorious, such as the house of the KHALIFES," his intention in this exception was merely to show that regard should be had to pre-eminence in that particular house, out of respect to the Khalifat, and in order to suppress rebellion or disaffection; and not to say that an original equality does not exist throughout. The Kooraishees are the descendants of Nazir, son of Kanaan, as is universally known.—Ibn-Hijr has said that the Kooraishees are descended of Kihir the son of Malik. The term Kooraiish is a diminutive of Kursh, which means a body of people, or congregation; and this appellation was originally applied to them, because they were accustomed to trade through different cities and countries, and after being thus scattered, used to reassemble at Mecca. The Arabs are those who derive their descent from a stock anterior to Nazir, or (according to Ibn-Hijr) anterior to Kihir.

• THE Binno Balfala tribe are not the equals of Arabs of any other description whatsoever, they being notorious throughout Arabia for every species of vice; and none of those before mentioned esteem them as upon an equality with themselves.

—MAWALEES, that is to say, Ajims, who are neither Kooraishees nor Arabs, are the equals of each other throughout, regard not being had among them to lineage, but to Islam.—Thus an Ajim whose family have been Mussulmans for two or more generations is the equal of one descended of Mussulman ancestors;—but one who has himself embraced the faith, or he and his father only, is not the equal of an Ajim whose father and grandfather were Mussulmans; because a family is not established under any particular denomination (such as Mussulman, for instance), by a retrospect short of the grandfather.—This is the doctrine of Hancefa and Mohammed. Abou Yoosaf says that an Ajim whose father is a Mussulman is the equal of a woman whose father and grandfather are Mussulmans.

AN Ajim who is the first of his family professing the faith is not the equal of a woman whose father is a Mussulman.

In point of freedom.—EQUALITY in point of freedom is the same as in point of Islam, in all the circumstances above recited, because bondage is an effect of infidelity, and the properties of meanness and turpitude are therein found.

In point of character.—REGARD is to be had to equality in piety and virtue, according to Hancefa and Abou Yoosaf; and this is approved, because virtue is one of the first principles of superiority, and a woman derives a degree of scandal and shame from the profligacy of her husband, beyond what she sustains even from that of her kindred.—Mohammed alleges that positive equality in point of virtue is not to be regarded, as that is connected with religion, to which rules regarding mere worldly matters do not apply, excepting where the party, by any base or degrading misconduct (such as a man exposing himself naked and intoxicated in the public street, and so forth), may have incurred derision and contempt.

In point of fortune.—EQUALITY is to be regarded with respect to property, by which is understood a man being possessed of a sufficiency to discharge the dower and provide maintenance; because if he is unable to do both, or either of these, he is not the equal of any woman; as the dower is a consideration for the carnal use of the woman, the payment of which is necessary of course; and upon the provision of a support to the wife depends the permanency of the matrimonial connexion; and this is therefore indispensable a fortiori.—This, according to some, is found in the ability to support a wife for one month only; but others say for a year. By a man possessing sufficient to enable him to discharge the dower, is understood his ability to pay down that proportion of it which it is customary to give immediately upon the marriage, and which is termed Moajil, or prompt; the remainder, termed the Mowjil, or deferred, it is not usual to pay until a future season; and hence it is that the ability to pay that part of the dower is not made a condition.—Aboo Yoosaf teaches that regard is to be had only to the man's ability to support his wife, and not to the discharge of the dower, because the latter is of a nature to admit of delay in the payment, but not the former; and a man is supposed to be sufficiently enabled to pay the dower where his father is in good circumstances. According to the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed, however, the fortune of the man is to be considered in general (without regard to any particular ability), inasmuch that a man who may even be qualified both to pay the dower and to provide subsistence, yet may not be held the equal of a woman possessed of a large property; since men consider wealth as conferring superiority, and poverty as inducing contempt. Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, maintains that wealth is not to be regarded in this respect, since it is not a thing of a stable or permanent nature, as property may be acquired in the morning and lost before night.

Ind in point of profession.—EQUALITY is to be regarded in trade or profession, according to Aboo Yoosaf and Mohammed.—There are two opinions recorded of Haneefa upon this point; and there is also an opinion related of Aboo Yoosaf, that the profession is not to be regarded, unless where it is of such a degrading nature as to oppose an insurmountable objection; such, for instance, as barbers, weavers, tanners, or other workers in leather, and scavengers, who are not the equals of merchants, perfumers, druggists, or bankers.—The principle upon which regard is to be had to trade or profession is, that men assume to themselves a certain consequence from the respectability of their callings, whereas a degree of contempt is annexed to them on account of the meanness thereof.—But a reason, on the other hand, why trade or profession should not be regarded is, that these are not absolute upon a man, since he is at liberty to leave a mean profession for one of a more honourable nature.

Case of a woman contracting herself on an inadequate dower.—If a woman contract herself in marriage, consenting to receive a dower of much smaller value than her proper dower,* the guardians have a right to oppose it, until her husband shall agree either to give her a complete proper dower, or to separate from him.—This is according to Haneefa.—The two disciples maintain that the guardians are not possessed of any such authority; and their argument is, that whatever the dower may be above ten Dirms is the right of the woman, and no person is to be opposed in relinquishing that which is her own; as where a woman, for instance, chooses to relinquish a part of the dower, after the amount of it has been specifically stipulated.—To this Haneefa replies, that the guardians assume a certain degree of respect and consideration from the magnitude of the dower; and its smallness is an occasion of shame to them; wherefore regard is had to that, as well as to equality: contrary to the case of a woman relinquishing her claim to any part of her dower after it has been specifically stipulated, because no disgrace falls upon the guardians from such dereliction.

Case of a father contracting his infant child on a disproportionate dower.—If a father should contract in marriage his infant daughter, agreeing to a very inadequate dower; or, if he should contract his infant son, engaging for an extravagant dower, yet this is legal and valid with respect to them.—This, however, is not lawful to any excepting a father or grandfather, according to all the doctors.—The two disciples have said that diminution or excess in the dower is illegal only where it is very apparent; that is to say, a contract of marriage, involving any very disproportionate excess or deficiency of dower, is not held by them to be legal; because the authority of a father or grandfather to contract infants in marriage is founded upon the supposition of their regard for the interest of those infants, and therefore, where this regard does not appear, the contract is null; and in agreeing for a deficient dower on behalf of a female infant, or for an excessive one on behalf of a male, no regard to their interest whatever is manifested.—Similar to this is a case of purchase or sale; that is to say, if a guardian were, on behalf of an infant, to sell a thing for less than its value, or to buy a thing for more than it is worth, at an excessive disproportion, such sale or purchase would be invalid; and so also in marriage:—and hence it is that no person is empowered, with respect to deficient or excessive dowers, excepting a father or grandfather.—To this Haneefa replies, that the law here rests solely upon whatever affords an argument of tenderness for the infant, and that is found in nearness of affinity; and in marriage there are many considerations of more weight and moment than the dower, whereas, in transactions which concern property, that only is a consideration; and where that which is the end appears to be defeated, their authority is done away.—But with respect to others than the father and grandfather, no regard is had to affinity as an argument of tenderness in the present case, since that exists in them in a smaller degree.

A father may contract his infant child to a slave.—If a man contract his infant daughter to a slave, or his infant son to a female slave, it is lawful.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this is according to Haneefa, who argues that the father's neglect of equality in this instance must be supposed to arise from some other considerations of greater weight, wherefore the said contract of marriage is lawful; but if it should appear that the parent has adopted such a match without any view to a particular advantage, the contract is in that case null: and the two Elders coincide with Haneefa in this opinion.—According to the two disciples the contract is illegal, because it involves a twofold disadvantage with respect to the infant;—a want of equality in the first instance; and secondly, a want of residence, as a slave cannot be or remain anywhere but with the owner's consent.

Section.—Of a Power of Agency to contract Marriage.

Agents in marriage, and their powers.—

AGENTS in matrimony are persons employed and authorized by the parties concerned to enter into contracts of marriage on their behalf; and the power so delegated is termed Wikalit-ba-Nikkah.

It is lawful for a nephew to contract the daughter of his uncle in marriage with himself.—Ziffer alleges that this is unlawful.

If a woman give authority to a man to contract her in marriage with himself, and he accordingly execute the contract in the presence of two witnesses it is lawful. Ziffer and Shafei affirm that this is illegal, because no person is competent to transfer and make himself the proprietor of that which is transferred; as in a case of sale, for instance, where, if the proprietor constitute a person his agent of sale with respect to any particular property, and the agent sell the same to himself, both the agency and the sale are void, no man being competent to act as the transferrer of property, and to become himself the master of that property.—Shafei, however, alleges that a guardian may lawfully contract his ward to himself on the plea of necessity, since, if he were not allowed this privilege, she might never be married; but a mere agent has no such plea, because in this case her guardian will contract her.*—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that an agent in matrimony is merely a negotiator, and the obligations of the contract do not, in any respect, affect the contractor of a marriage; neither would any objections which may arise apply to the simple negotiation, but to the rights and obligations which it involves: contrary to the case of sale, as cited by Ziffer and Shafei, because there the agent appears to be acting not merely as a negotiator, but also as a principal, in the contract of sale, and is consequently affected by its obligations. It may be remarked in this place, that as the contractor of a marriage is merely a negotiator, so where a person becomes empowered to contract on both sides, his single declaration "I have contracted," comprehends both the declaration and the acceptance, and consequently there is in this instance no occasion for two separate sentences.†

* This proceeds upon a supposition that the guardian is not within the prohibited degrees, and that no other proper person offers.

† See the beginning of this Book.

Cases of a contract executed by an unauthorized person.—If a man should contract in marriage the slave of another without the owner's consent, the validity of the deed is suspended upon the will of the Owner: if he approve, it is lawful; if he disapprove, it is null.

In the same manner, if a man contract a woman in marriage without her knowledge in the presence of two witnesses, or if a woman contract a man in marriage without his consent, the validity is suspended upon the same circumstance.—This is an opinion of our doctors; because they hold that in a case of a contract entered into by a Fazoolce, or unauthorized person, and to which there exists any person who has a right to assent, the same stands as a complete contract, the validity of which is suspended upon that person's approbation.—Shafei maintains that all acts whatever of a Fazoolce are null; because the use of a contract is for the purpose of establishing its effect, like that of sale, for instance, which is used for the purpose of establishing a right of property, and that of marriage, for the purpose of establishing a right of enjoyment; and a Fazoolce is incapable of establishing the effect, on account of his want of authority; wherefore the act of the Fazoolce is nugatory.—The argument of our doctors is, that the foundation of the contract, namely, declaration and acceptance, has proceeded from a competent person (that is, from one who is sane and adult), and has reference to its proper subject; neither can any injury be sustained if the contract be executed, inasmuch as there exists, in respect to it, a person who has a right of assent, and who, if he think proper, will signify such assent, and give the contract force, or, if otherwise, will reject it: and in reply to what is urged by Shafei, we observe that the effect of a contract is sometimes deferred to a period subsequent to the time or date of the contract; as in a contract of sale under a condition of option, where possession is deferred until such time as the condition of option drops.

If an unauthorized person say to two persons, "Be ye witness that I have married such a woman who is absent;" and afterwards the woman should hear of it, and consent, yet the marriage is void: but if, on the unauthorized person speaking as above, a third person were to say, "I have married that woman to that man," and the woman on hearing it should consent, the marriage is lawful. And, in like manner, if a woman should say "Be ye witness that I have contracted myself to such a man who is absent," and the man should afterwards hear of it and consent, the marriage would, notwithstanding, be void; but if, on the woman thus speaking, a bystander were to say, "Be ye witness that I give consent on behalf of such a person;" and the man, on hearing of it, should give his consent, the marriage is valid. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. Abou Yoo-saf alleges that if a woman were to say, "I have contracted myself to such a man" (he being absent), and the man, on afterwards receiving intelligence of this, were to declare his assent, the marriage is valid. In short, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, one person is not competent to act as a Fazoollee in a contract of marriage, either on behalf of both parties, or as a Fazoollee on one side, and a principal on the other; whereas Aboo Yoosaf holds a contrary opinion. But, if two unauthorized persons enter into a contract of marriage on behalf of both parties,—that is to say, one on the part of the man, and the other on that of the woman,—or, if the persons enter into such a contract, one as a Fazoollee, and the other as a principal,—it is lawful, with our doctors (Haneefa, Mohammed, and Aboo Yoosaf). The argument of Aboo Yoosaf, in the case before stated, is that one person may in marriage stand as two, and the declaration of that person may be considered as two declarations* (whence it is that if one person be authorized by both parties, the marriage is effected by his single declaration); and, in the case of an unauthorized person, the only difference is, that the validity of the contract remains suspended upon the ultimate consent of the parties, as in a case of Khoola, where, if a man were to declare that "he had repudiated his wife by the form of Khoola for such a consideration" (the wife being absent), and she were afterwards to receive intelligence of this, and to assent, the Khoola is lawful; and so also, in a case of divorce or of manumission, where if a man were to declare that he had divorced his wife for one thousand Dirms (she being absent), and intelligence of this reach her, and she consent,—or, if a man declare that "he has emancipated such an one, his slave, for a recompense of one thousand Dirms" (the slave being absent), and the latter, hearing of this assent, the proceeding is lawful.—To this Haneefa and Mohammed reply that, in the case before recited, the declaration of the unauthorized person, "I have contracted such a woman to such a man," or, "I have married such a woman," amounts to a contract on one part only, which is not valid, wherefore the legality of it is not suspended upon the consent of the parties, as its completion rests on the reply, which is not approved unless it proceed from a person present in the assembly or company where the contract is made, and during the continuance of that company; and, like a sale, it is incapable of being protracted to any period beyond that assembly: but where a person, on the contrary, acts on the authority of both parties, the contract is valid, because here his declaration applies equally to both; and where the contract is entered into by two unauthorized persons (acting for, or, as it were, representing the respective parties), it is complete, as it here possesses all the essential properties of a contract; and so also in cases of Khoola or of divorce, or manumission for a compensation (as cited by Aboo Yoosaf), because in such instances the declaration stands as a conditional vow on the part of the husband or the master, so as to be binding upon him, and from which he cannot with propriety retract; and hence the engagement is completed solely by him.

Cases of the matrimonial agent exceeding man commission another, as his agent, to procure him a wife, and the agent should contract him to two women, by one declaration,* his marriage is not valid with either, for, being unlawful with both, on account of its contradicting the tenor of the commission with which he was charged, and unestablished with either, on account of unspecified priority, a separation from both must necessarily ensue.

If a person commission another, as his agent, to contract him in marriage to a woman, and the agent should contract him to a female slave the property of some third person, it is valid (according to Haneefa), because here the agent appears to have acted in strict conformity with the tenor of his commission, as the term woman is general, applying equally to the whole sex, to slaves as well as to others; nor can there be any doubt, since the case supposes the slave to be the property not of the agent, but of some third person;—neither is there any impropriety in it, as the case supposes the authorizer not to be previously married to a free woman.—The two disciples allege that a marriage thus made by an agent is illegal, unless it be contracted with a woman who is the equal of the constituent; because, by the term woman, generally expressed, is to be understood such as it is customary to wed, and men commonly marry their equals; the term woman, therefore, thus indefinitely expressed, means such a woman as it is usual for such a man to marry.—To this Aboo Haneefa replies, that in custom there is an indefinite latitude, it being common for men, even of considerable rank, to marry female slaves, as well as free women who are their equals; and such being the case, the agent is not restricted to any particular description of women, as the term woman must be taken generally: and even admitting that custom does thus prevail in marriage, it may be replied that custom is of two different descriptions, one applying to words (as Daba, for instance, a term applying to beasts in general, but which custom hath restricted to a horse); and the other to actions (such, for instance, as men clothing themselves in new garments on the festival of Yd); now, in the present case, custom applies to facts, and not to terms, and therefore does not admit the construction of being restrictive.—It will hereafter be shown, in treating of Agency, that the two doctors regard equality, in the present case, upon another principle, to wit, that a man not being necessitated to marry any woman, of course his desire of being married by an agent relates only to a woman who is his equal.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE MIHR, OR DOWER.

Marriage without a dower is valid.—A MARRIAGE is valid, although no mention be made of the dower by the contracting parties, because the term Nikkah, in its literal sense, signifies a contract of union, which is fully accomplished by the junction of a man and woman; moreover, the payment of dower is enjoined by the law, merely as a token of respect for its object (the woman), wherefore the mention of it is not absolutely essential to the validity of a marriage:—and, for the same reason, a marriage is also valid, although the man were to engage in the contract on the special condition that there should be no dower: but this is contrary to the doctrine of Malik.

Ten Dirms the lowest legal dower.—THE smallest dower is ten Dirms.*—Shafei says that whatever sum may be lawful as the price of a commodity in purchase and sale, is lawful as a dower, because the dower is the right of the woman, and consequently it must depend upon herself to determine the amount of it. The arguments of our doctors in this case are twofold; First, a precept of the prophet, which expressly declares "There is no dower under ten Dirms;" Secondly, the law enjoins a dower with a view to manifest respect for the wife, wherefore it must be fixed, in its smallest degree, at such a sum as may be respectable; and this is ten Dirms, that being the lowest amount of a theft inducing the punishment of amputation of a limb, which shows that such sum is the least that can be regarded in an important or respectable light.

Case of a dower of ten Dirms.—If a man assign, as a dower, a sum under ten Dirms, yet his wife shall receive the whole ten Dirms, according to our doctors.—Ziffer alleges that she shall receive a Mihr-Misl, or proper dower; because where the sum specified is so small as not to bear the construction of a dower, it is the same as if none whatever had been named.—The argument of our doctors is, that the impropriety of naming or stipulating so small a sum is on account of the injunction of the law, which cannot be fulfilled with less than ten Dirms, and the woman will certainly be satisfied with ten Dirms, as she had agreed to accept of less than ten: neither is it proper to take an example, in this case, from that in which no dower whatever has been named, because it may sometimes happen that a woman may grant the right of possession without any return, and out of pure love; but no woman will agree to a trifling return. And here, if the husband were to divorce the wife before consummation, her due on account of the dower is five Dirms, according to our three doctors. Ziffer holds that she is in this case entitled only to a Matat, or present, the same as would be due where no dower had been named.—The meaning of the term Matat shall be hereafter fully explained.

The wife entitled to her whole dower, upon the consummation of the marriage, or the death of the husband.—If a person specify a dower of ten or more Dirms, and should afterwards consummate his marriage, or be removed by death, his wife, in either case, has a claim to the whole of the dower specified, because, by consummation, the delivery of the return for the dower, namely, the Booza, or woman's person,* is established, and therein is confirmed the right to the consideration, namely, the dower; and, on the other hand, by the decease of the husband the marriage is rendered complete, and every thing becomes established and confirmed by its completion, and consequently is so with respect to all its effects.

And to one-half, upon divorce before consummation.—If the husband, in the case now stated, were to divorce his wife before consummation, or Khalwat Saheeh,† she, in this case, receives half her specified dower; God having commanded, saying, "If YE DIVORCE THEM BEFORE YE HAVE TOUCHED THEM, AND HAVE ALREADY SETTLED A DOWER ON THEM, YE SHALL PAY THEM ONE-HALF OF WHAT YE HAVE SETTLED."

OBJECTION.—It would here appear that the whole dower should of right drop, because the object of the contract reverts to the woman untouched, the same as in sale, where the whole price drops, if the buyer and seller break off the contract.

REPLY.—There are two analogical conclusions applicable to this subject; First, what is recited in the above objection; Secondly, it would appear that the whole dower is due, because the husband did not make use of his possession, but suffered it to pass from him untouched of his own choice; as in sale, where the whole price of a purchase is due, if the purchaser suffer the goods to perish in the hands of the seller; and these two conclusions directly contradicting each other, they are both abandoned, and we adhere to the sacred text as above.—This case supposes

* Literally, Genitale arum Mulieris.

† Retirement, solus cum sola, where there is no legal or natural impediment to the commission of the carnal act. It is elsewhere translated, complete retirement.

* The value of the Dirmy is very uncertain. Ten Dirms, according to one account, make about six shillings and-eightpence sterling.

the divorce to take place before Khalwat, or retirement, because that with a wife is held by our doctors to amount to carnal knowledge, as shall be hereafter explained.

Where no dower is stipulated in the contract, the wife receives her proper dower.—If a man marry a woman without specifying any dower, or on the express stipulation that she shall not have a dower, and he either have carnal connexion with her, or die, she is in that case entitled to her Mihr-Misl, or proper dower.—Shafei alleges that where the husband dies, nothing whatever remains due: but many of his disciples and followers admit that the woman's proper dower is due in case of carnal connexion. The argument of Shafei is that the dower is purely a right of the woman; whence it is in her power to relinquish it a priori, for the same reason as she is at liberty to remit it afterwards.—To this our doctors reply that in the dower are involved rights of three different descriptions; the FIRST, the right of the law, which is that it shall not consist of less than ten Dirms (as has been already said); the SECOND, the right of the guardians, which is that it shall not be short of the woman's proper dower; and the THIRD, the right of the woman, which is that it shall become her property. Now the right of the law and the right of the guardians are to be regarded in the execution of the contract, but not its continuance; consequently, in the continuance, the dower is the right of the woman solely; and hence it is that she is empowered to give it up or relinquish it in the continuance of the contract, but not a priori.

Or a present, in case of divorce before consummation.—If a man marry a woman without any specification of a dower, or on condition of there being no dower, and divorce her before carnal connexion, the woman in this case receives a Matat, or present; God having commanded, saying, "GIVE HER A PRESENT, THE RICH ACCORDING TO HIS WEALTH, AND THE POOR ACCORDING TO HIS POVERTY." Thus a present is incumbent upon the husband, on the authority of the sacred writings:—but this is contrary to the doctrine of Malik.—The Matat, or present, here mentioned, is to consist of three pieces of dress, composed of such materials as are suitable to the woman to whom it is given; and these are, the Dirra, or shift; the Khoomar, or veil; and the Mulhaffet, or outer garment. The quantity is determined at three pieces of dress, on the authority of Aysha and Ibn Abbas.—From the restriction of the present to such materials as are suitable to the woman, it would appear that, in the adjustment, regard should be had to the woman's state and condition (and such is the doctrine of Koorokhech), because it is a sort of substitute for the woman's proper dower:—but the more approved doctrine on this point is, that regard be had solely to the state and condition of the husband, because of the words of the sacred text before quoted,—"THE RICH ACCORDING TO HIS WEALTH, AND THE POOR ACCORDING TO HIS POVERTY.—It is to be remarked, that the present must not exceed in value one-half of the woman's proper dower, nor be worth less than five Dirms: the same is recorded in the Mabsoot.

Case of a dower specified after marriage.—If a man marry a woman without naming any dower, and the parties should afterwards agree to a dower, and specify its amount, such dower goes to the woman, if the husband either consummate the marriage or die; but if he divorce her before consummation, she receives only a present. With Abou Yoosaf she, in this case, receives one-half of the dower specified (and such also is the opinion of Shafei), because here the dower has been made obligatory and specifically determined, and consequently one-half is due, according to the words of the text, "YE SHALL PAY THEM ONE-HALF OF WHAT YE HAVE SETTLED." The argument of our doctors is that, in the present case, the specification of the dower identifies a thing which was due on account of the contract, to wit, the woman's proper dower; and as this is incapable of subdivision, consequently that which is its substitute cannot be halved.—With respect to the text above quoted, it is to be regarded as applying solely to what has been agreed to and specified at the period of the contract: this being agreeable to what is customary.

Case of an addition made to the dower after marriage.—If a man make any addition to the dower in behalf of his wife subsequent to the contract, such addition is binding upon him.—This is contrary to the doctrine of Ziffer, as shall be demonstrated in treating of an increase of price in a contract of sale.—But although such after-addition to the dower be thus approved, yet it drops in consequence of divorce before consummation.—According to an opinion of Abou Yoosaf, the woman is entitled to the half of the additional, together with that of the original dower.—The cause of this difference of opinion is that, with Haneefia and Mohammed, nothing is halved but what has been rendered obligatory, and specifically determined; whereas Abou Yoosaf holds whatever is engaged for after the contract to be the same as that which is made obligatory in the contract, and therefore considers it as subject to the same rule.

A wife may remit the whole dower.—If a woman exonerate her husband from any part, or even from the whole, of the dower, it is approved; because, after the execution of the contract, it is her sole right (as was already explained), and the case supposes her dereliction of it to take place at a subsequent period.

Case of Khalwat-Saheb, or retirement.—If a man retire with his wife, and there be no legal or natural obstruction to the commission of the carnal act, and he afterwards divorce her, the whole dower in this case goes to her.—Shafei maintains that she is here to receive no more than her half dower, because the husband cannot obtain possession of the object of the contract but by actual coition; and the right to the dower is not corroborated and confirmed without enjoyment.—The argument of our doctors is, that the woman has completed her part of the contract, by delivering up her person, and by removing all obstructions, which is the extent of her ability; her right to the recompense is therefore confirmed and corroborated; in the same manner as in a case of sale, where if the seller have offered delivery of the goods sold, and there be nothing to obstruct seisin on the part of the purchaser, and the latter neglect to make seisin, he is considered as having made seisin, and the purchase is afterwards as a trust in the hands of the seller, and the whole of the price is obligatory upon the purchaser.

Circumstances in which retirement does not imply consummation.—If a man retire with his wife whilst one of them is sick, or fasting in the month of Ramzan, or in the Ihram of a pilgrimage, whether obligatory* or voluntary, or of a visitation at the shrine of the prophet (termed an Amrit), or whilst the woman is in her courses—this is not regarded as a Khalwat-Saheeb, or complete retirement, inasmuch, that if the man were to divorce his wife after such a retirement, the woman is entitled to her half dower only; because all the above circumstances are bars to the carnal act;—sickness, from the weakness and imbecility with which it is attended, or from its rendering the commission of the carnal act injurious to one or the other of the parties;—and fasting in Ramzan, because it would induce upon the party a necessity of expiation and atonement;—and pilgrimage, or visitation, because it would induce a necessity of atonement by sacrifice;—and the woman's courses, because they oppose an obstruction both natural and legal.

Exception.—But if one of the parties, be observing a Nifi [voluntary] fast only, the woman is entitled to her whole dower, because the breach of such a fast is a matter of indifference: a fast of atonement, or in consequence of a vow, is the same as a voluntary fast in this respect, and for the same reason.

Case of retirement of an eunuch.—If a Majboob eunuch retire with his wife, and afterwards divorce her, she is entitled to her whole dower, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples maintain that the half dower only goes to her, on account that a Majboob is still more incapacitated than a sick person: contrary to the case of an Ineen (or one naturally impotent), because the point of law rests upon the existence of the instrument of generation, which is there found, but not in the former case.—Haneefa, on the other hand, argues, that all which is due on the part of the woman is the delivery of her person (by admitting the husband to feel and touch her), and this being, to the extent of her ability, completely performed, it follows that the consideration is completely due to her.

It is incumbent upon the woman to observe an Edit, (or appointed term of probation), after the divorce, in all the cases here recited, for the sake of caution, on a principle of propriety, from the apprehension or possibility of her womb being occupied by seed. The Edit is, moreover, a right of the law and of the fatus; and credit is not to be given to the parties that they have not committed the carnal act, because this (in precluding the necessity of Edit) would amount to an extinction of rights (as above specified) distinct and separate from these of the parties: but it is otherwise with the dower, because that is a matter of property, the right in which cannot be decided upon principles of caution (like the Edit), nor under any circumstance admitting of doubt; the dower, therefore, is not due, where retirement is not of the description of Khalwat-Saheeb. Kadooree, in his commentary upon his own work, has observed that, if the obstruction to the carnal act be merely of a legal nature (such as fasting), the observance of Edit is incumbent, because here the natural ability to the performance of the act is supposed: but if the obstruction be of a positive nature (such as sickness or infaney), the Edit is not requisite, because the ability to perform the act does not here exist.

Cases in which the present to the wife is laudable, or incumbent.—It is laudable to bestow a Matat, or present, upon every woman divorced by her husband, excepting two descriptions of women, namely, one whose dower has been stipulated, and whose husband divorces her before consummation,—and one whose dower has not been stipulated, and who is also divorced before consummation; for in their behalf a present is not merely laudable, but incumbent. Shafei says, that a present is incumbent in behalf of every divorced woman, excepting one whose dower has been stipulated, and who is divorced before consummation; because the present is made incumbent in the way of a gratuity, or compensatory gift, from the husband, on account of his having thrown the woman into a forlorn state by his separation from her; but, in the excepted instance, the half dower is a substitute for the present, as divorce is here a dissolution of the contract, and the present need not be bestowed repeatedly. The argument of our doctors is, that the present is a substitute for the proper dower in the case of a resigned woman (that is, a woman who resigns herself to her husband without a dower), on account that, as the proper dower drops, the present becomes incumbent; because, in a contract of marriage, a return is essential: the present, therefore, is a substitute for the proper dower; and such being the case, it must not be required in addition either to the whole dower, which is the original thing, or to any part of it: whence the present is not incumbent where any part of the dower is due. As to what Shafei advances, that "the present is made incumbent in the way of a gratuity, or compensatory gift, from the husband, on account of his having thrown the woman into a forlorn state by his separation from her,"—we reply, that this act of his does not amount to an offence, as the husband is privileged by the law so to do, wherefore no recompense is due from him on that account; and hence it is that the present is regarded merely as respectful and laudable.

Case of a reciprocal bargain between two contractors.—If a person contract his daughter, or his sister, in marriage to another, on the condition of the other bestowing a sister or daughter in marriage upon him, so as that each contract shall stand as a return for the other, respectively, both the contracts are lawful. Shafei maintains that both the contracts are null, as they make one half of the woman's person, reciprocally, a dower, and the other half the subject of marriage; because, where the person marries his daughter to the other, and also constitutes her the dower for the other's daughter, it follows that the daughter's person* is divided between the other person and his daughter,—one half to that person, as husband, in virtue of the marriage, and the other half to his daughter as her dower; and as the matrimonial possession, or propriety, is incapable of being participated (since it is ordained as a complete enjoyment, and not as a participated one), it follows that the bargain is nugatory. To this our doctors reply, that the contractor has named, as a dower, a thing incapable of being so (since a woman's person, in the sense it here bears, is incapable of being the property of a woman);—but yet the contract holds good, and a Mahr Misl, or proper dower, remains due [to each of the women], the same as where wine or a hog are assigned as a dower.—With respect to what Shafei urges, that "the matrimonial propriety is incapable of being participated,"—it is admitted; but this participation is not induced in the present case, as the person of either of the daughters is not made the right of the other daughter in virtue of the contract.

on a condition of service

—If a free man marry a woman, on the condition, in return, of serving her for a stated time (a year, for instance), or of teaching her the Koran, yet her proper dower is incumbent upon him notwithstanding, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed has said that she is, in this case, to receive a sum amounting to the estimated value of his service for one year. But if a slave, by his owner's consent, marry a woman on the same terms, it is lawful, and the woman is entitled to the stipulated service only. Shafei is of opinion that the woman is entitled merely to the service stipulated in either of these cases; because whatever may be lawfully received as a fixed return, is capable of constituting a dower, since a mutual exchange may be thereby effected, and consequently the case is the same as if the man had married the woman on condition of a stated service to be performed by another person, or on a stipulation of himself watching her flocks for a stated period. The arguments of our doctors, on this point, are twofold:—FIRST, the possession of a woman's person is not to be sought (that is to say, to desire, it is not lawful), except in lieu of property; and teaching the Koran is not property; neither does usufruct constitute property (according to the sentiments of our doctors), because that is not substantial or permanent, whereas property is a thing of a permanent nature, and what constitutes actual wealth; service, therefore, not being property, to seek the possession of a woman's person, in return for the services of a freeman, is unlawful:—contrary to a case where a slave obtains a woman in marriage on the condition of his serving her, since here possession is sought for that which is actual property, the service of a slave being considered as such, because this comprehends a surrender or delivery of the slave's person, and the person of a slave is actual property, and of course the usufruct thereof; wherefore it is analogous to the bestowing of the slave himself as a dower: but with a husband who is free this cannot be the case: SECONDLY, it is not lawful that a woman should be in a situation to exact the service of her husband who is a freeman, as this would amount to a reversal of their appointed stations, for one of the requisites of marriage is, that the woman be as a servant, and the man as the person served; but if the service of the husband to the wife were to constitute her dower, it would follow that the husband is as the servant and the wife as the served; and this being a violation of the requisites of marriage, is therefore illegal; but it is otherwise with the service stipulated to be performed by another free person, with that person's consent, as this offers no violence to the requisites of the contract; and so also, in the case of service of a slave, because the service performed by a slave to his wife is, in fact, performed by his master, by whose consent it is that he undertakes it; and the same with the case of tending flocks, because this is a service of a permanent nature, and admitted to be performed for wives, and therefore does not violate the requisites of marriage; for the service of the husband to his wife, as a dower, is prohibited only as it may be degrading to the former: but the tending of flocks is not a degrading office. Mohammed, according to his tenets, holds (as was already observed) that the woman is, in this case, entitled to receive a sum amounting to the estimated value of the service, because he maintains that what was stipulated (to wit, the service) is property, but of such a nature as it is not in the husband's power to make delivery of, since by such an act he would violate the requisites of marriage; the case, therefore, is the same as if a man were to marry a woman, assigning, as a dower, a slave, the property of another, in which case he would have to pay the woman the value of such slave. Hanecfa and Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, hold that the woman is entitled to a proper dower; because they maintained that the service here stipulated is not property, as a woman cannot legally exact service of her husband, being a freeman, in any situation whatever, lest a reversal of stations should be induced, as was just observed; the naming, therefore, of service as a dower, is the same as naming wine, or a hog; for, not being capable of legal delivery, it is not a subject of appreciation; and such being the case, recourse is had to the original rule in defect of any dower, and this dictates a proper dower.

Cases of a wife remitting or returning the dower to her husband, either wholly or in part.—If a man marry a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms, and the woman make seisin of the said thousand, and then present the same to him, and he take possession of such gift, and afterwards divorce her before consummation, the husband, in this case, has a claim upon his wife for five hundred Dirms, because he is not considered, in law, as having received, in the form of the gift, that identical thing which becomes obligatory upon his wife in consequence of divorce before consummation, since money is incapable of identification either in the fulfilment or the annulment of contracts. So also, if the dower consist not of money, but of articles of weight or measurement of capacity, as iron or copper.—But if the wife were to make a gift to her husband of the thousand Dirms, without having herself been in possession of the same,* and he were afterwards to divorce her before consummation, in this case neither party has any claim whatever upon the other. This proceeds upon a favourable construction; for analogy would suggest that the husband should receive from his wife the amount of half the dower, because the whole dower remains untouched with the husband in consequence of the gift, which amounts to a discharge, but the wife does not appear to be discharged from what becomes obligatory upon her in consequence of divorce before consummation.—The reason for a more favourable construction of the law upon this point is, that the identical thing which becomes obligatory upon the wife in favour of the husband, in consequence of divorce before consummation, has come to him, in his being discharged from half the dower (through the wife's gift), and the end being thus obtained, any difference in the manner in which it is obtained will not be regarded,—that is to say, the end was, that the husband should recover half the dower after divorce before consummation, and that end has been obtained, not indeed through divorce, but through antecedent gift, which answers the same purpose.

If a man marry a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms, and the woman make seisin of five hundred Dirms, and afterwards make a gift to her husband of the whole thousand,—as well of the portion in her possession, as of that which she has not received,—or of the latter only,—and the husband afterwards divorce her before consummation, neither party in this case, has any claim upon the other, according to Hanecfa.—The two disciples maintain that the husband has, in this case, a claim upon the wife for one half of that proportion of which she had possession; because they conceive of a part from the whole;—that is to say, if the wife were to make a gift of the whole dower to her husband, without having herself made previous seisin of any part thereof, the husband has no claim to resume anything out of it;—and, on the contrary, if she were first to make seisin of the dower, and then to make a gift of the same to her husband, he would have a claim of resumption upon her for one half; and consequently, when she has made seisin of any particular part or portion of it, he has a claim of resumption upon her for the half of that part of which she had made seisin; and again, on the other hand, because a gift of any part of the dower to the husband amounts to an abatement with respect to that part, and is therefore altogether excluded from the contract;* and consequently, when the gift is of that half which had remained unseised, it is the same as if the contract had regarded the half only (as where a seller, for instance, makes a gift of half the price of the commodity sold, in which case it is the same as if the price agreed upon were no more than the remaining half); and such being the case, it follows that the proportion of abatement (in consequence of gift) becomes altogether excluded from the dower, and that the half of which seisin had been made stands as the complete dower;—and as, where seisin had been made by the wife of her whole dower, and she had presented the same to her husband, he would still (upon divorce before consummation) have a claim of resumption upon her for one half (as has been shown in former case), so here, in like manner, he has a claim of resumption for a moiety of the seised proportion, that standing as the complete dower. The argument of Abou Haneefa in this case is, that the end of the husband hath been already obtained, in a moiety of the dower remaining untouched with him without any return; wherefore, upon divorcing his wife before consummation, he would have no occasion to make any resumption: and with respect to what the two disciples advance, that "an abatement becomes altogether excluded from the contract," it may be replied, if this were to be admitted, it would follow that, in a case where a man marries a woman on a dower of twenty Dirms (for instance), and the woman makes a gift to him of fifteen Dirms out of the twenty, ten Dirms would remain obligatory upon the husband; because, the abatement being excluded from the contract, it would be the same as if he had married her upon a dower of five Dirms; and if he had married her upon such a dower, he would be bound for ten Dirms, on the principle of law, that if a man marry a woman on a dower of fewer than ten Dirms, ten Dirms are obligatory upon him: this idea would consequently lead to an unjust and unfounded conclusion, and is therefore inadmissible.

* That is to say, relinquishes her right to it.

* The phrase in the original is remarkable, "LEHAZA YEWLUKKO B'ASSIL AL AKID,"—and therefore is connected with the origin of the contract;—that is to say,—with a period antecedent to the contract, and consequently not included in it. The term here adopted appears to be the clearest by which the translator could express the sense.

If a man marry a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms, and she make a gift to him of a part less than the half,—two hundred, for instance,—and take possession of the remainder, and the husband afterwards divorce her before consummation, he has, in this case (according to Abou Haneefa), a claim of resumption upon her for such a sum as, together with what she had previously bestowed upon him, makes a moiety of the whole, namely (in the supposition before mentioned) three hundred Dirms:—according to the two disciples, on the contrary, his claim of resumption is for the half of what the woman had made seisin of, namely, four hundred Dirms.

The same when the dower consists of effects.—If a man marry a woman on a dower consisting of certain specified effects, and she make a gift of the same to him, either before or after seisin, and he afterwards divorce her before consummation, he, in this case, has no claim of resumption whatever upon the woman.—This proceeds upon a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest that he should have a claim to the amount of the value of half the effects, because here it becomes obligatory upon the woman to make restitution of half the dower, as was already explained, and she is incapacitated from making restitution by delivery of half the actual effects, in consequence of her gift; wherefore it would appear that she should make it by paying the estimated value of one half.—But the reason for a more favourable construction of the law in this case is, that the husband, who is entitled to recover from the woman one half of what she had taken possession of, in consequence of his having divorced her before consummation, has already actually obtained this (through her gift); whence it is that the woman would not be at liberty to give her husband any other thing in lieu of those effects, because the consideration consists of a thing capable of identical specification, and of course the said effects, which have been in possession of the woman, and by her made over in gift to her husband, constitute a dower of a certain specific description; thus the husband appears to have received that actual thing which had been rendered obligatory upon the wife by divorce before consummation:—contrary to the case of a dower consisting of a debt; for here, if the wife were to make seisin of such debt, and then to make a gift of the same to her husband, and he afterwards to divorce her, as above, he would, in this case have a claim of resumption upon her for the value of one half of the dower, because a debt of this nature is, like money, incapable of identical specification:—and contrary, also, to a case where a woman, having taken possession of effects, as a dower (as was stated in the preceding case), sells such effects to her husband, because, in this case, they have come back to him for a consideration, and his claim is to the recovery of the half of her dower without any consideration.—And if the dower consist of an animal, or of effects, which are a debt upon the husband,* the rule is the same as in the case of one consisting of specified effects; because the thing seised by the woman is of such a nature as, if she had herself borrowed it, must be restored by her in substance; and articles of this description are all capable of identical specification.

Cases of stipulation in behalf of the wife.—If a man marry a woman on a dower of one thousand Dirms,† on a condition that he is not to carry her out of her native city,—or that he is not to marry, during his matrimonial connexion with her, any other woman, in this case, if he observe the condition, the woman is entitled to the above specified dower only, as that consists of a sum sufficient to constitute a legal dower, and she has agreed to accept it; but if he should infringe the condition, by either carrying her out of her native city, or marrying another wife, she is in this case entitled to her proper dower, because he had acceded to a condition on behalf of the woman which was advantageous to her, and that not being fulfilled, the woman is not supposed to be satisfied with the thousand Dirms, and must therefore be paid her complete proper dower; the same as in a case where a woman had agreed to accept of one thousand Dirms, as a dower, on condition of being treated with

* That is to say, an animal, or effects, which had been borrowed or procured upon credit by the husband.

† This case proceeds on the supposition of one thousand Dirms being of less value than the woman's proper dower.

he were to say, "I assign this slave as a dower"), and it should afterwards appear that the person so mentioned as a slave was at that time free, in this case a proper dower is due, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Abou Yoosaf says that here the husband owes the estimated value of the free person aforesaid, supposing he were a slave; for he argues that the man has filled the woman with the expectation of a certain property, the delivery of which he afterwards finds impossible; the value therefore is obligatory upon him, or an article similar to that agreed for, if it be of the species of Zooatal Imsal, as in a case where a man marries a woman on a dower consisting of a specified slave, and the slave dies before delivery.—Abou Haneefa, on the other hand, says, that where nomination and pointed reference* are united, regard must be had to the latter, because indication is more clear and express under that form, and hence the case is the same as if the man had engaged to give, as a dower, wine or a hog.† Mohammed (coinciding with Haneefa with respect to the slave, and dissenting from him with respect to the vinegar, as aforesaid) says that it is a rule, that if the thing named be of the same species with the thing specified by pointed reference, the contract is connected with the latter; but if the thing named be of a species distinct and different from the thing pointedly specified, it [the contract] is connected with the thing named; because indication is more effectual from naming a thing, than it is from pointing that thing out, inasmuch as it is thereby known what that thing is, whereas by pointing it out the substance only is known;—on which principle it is that if a man purchase a ring stone, on the condition of its being a ruby, and it should prove to be only a garnet, the bargain is void, on account of the difference of species; but if a person were to purchase a stone on condition of its being a ruby, and it should prove to be an emerald, yet the bargain holds good, because these are held by lapidaries to be of the same species:—now, in the present instance, the slave and the free person are of one and the same species; the contract, therefore, is connected with the thing identically specified or pointed out, and on this principle her proper dower is due to the woman; but wine and vinegar being of distinct species, and totally different from each other (inasmuch as the latter is lawful in use, and the former prohibited,) the contract is there connected with the thing nominally specified, and consequently the woman is entitled to vinegar equal in quantity to the wine.

If a man marry a woman, agreeing to give her, as a dower, two slaves specified, as if he were to say, "I assign, as a dower, those two slaves;" and it should happen that one of the persons so specified as slaves is free, in this case, according to Haneefa, the woman is not entitled to more than the single slave remaining, provided the value be equal to ten Dirms, because the slave is particularly assigned, and where the assigned dower is admitted to be incumbent, this prohibits the obligation to a proper dower;—as where a man, for instance, marries a woman, assigning her, as a dower, a piece of cloth of the value of five Dirms, in which case the woman gets the piece of cloth aforesaid, together with five Dirms in money, in such a manner as that the whole shall amount to ten Dirms, being the lowest legal dower, beyond which nothing is incumbent. Abou Yoosaf alleges that, in this case, the woman gets the slave, together with the amount of the estimated value of the other person, supposing he were a slave, because here the man has filled her with expectation of two slaves, the delivery of one of which afterwards appears to be impossible; wherefore the value of the latter is obligatory upon him. Mohammed has said (and there is also one opinion recorded of Haneefa to the same effect) that the woman gets the slave, together with a property sufficient to complete her proper dower, if that should exceed the value of the slave; because, if both the persons named as slaves by the husband, in specifying the dower, were actually free, the whole proper dower (according to Mohammed) would be due; and consequently, where one only is a slave, that slave is due, together with such property as (along with the slave) amounts to a proper dower.

A woman is not entitled to any dower under an invalid marriage dissolved before consummation.—If the Kazeer separate a man from his wife, before cohabitation, on account of their marriage being invalid, the woman is not entitled to any part of her dower, because, where the marriage is invalid, no obligation with respect to dower is involved in the contract, as that, in such a case, is also null; nor is the dower held to be due on any other ground than the fruition of the conjugal enjoyment, which is not found in the present instance.—In the same manner no dower is due after Khalwat Saheeh, or complete retirement, because, on account of the invalidity of the marriage, the law does not consider retirement as indicating the commission of the carnal act, and consequently it does not stand as such. It is, however, to be observed that in an invalid marriage a *separate dower is not due on account of every repetition of the carnal act, because here the right of possession is doubtful, and the case is therefore the same as where a man has repeated carnal connexion with the slave of his son,—or where a man has repeated carnal connexion with his wife, and it should afterwards appear that he had suspended the divorce of that woman upon the circumstance of his marrying her,—in either of which cases one dower only is due, because of a doubt respecting the right of possession; contrary to a case where a man has repeated carnal connexion with the slave of his father, his mother, or his wife, and pleads his conception of the same being lawful; for in this case a dower is incumbent upon him for every repetition of the act, because here no doubt exists, as he appears, on every repetition, to have had carnal connexion with a slave who is the absolute property of another:—and, contrary, also, to a case where a man has repeated carnal connexion with a female slave held in partnership between himself and another, for in this case an half fine is incumbent upon him for every repetition (according to the determination in the Burhan al Aima of Abdal-azeez-Bin Amroo), because he has every time committed the carnal act in the share of his partner.

* Tasmecat and Isharet: the former term means simply naming a thing, or (as expressed above) nomination; by the latter is understood pointing a thing out, such as "This slave," &c.

† That is to say, the condition is altogether void, and a proper dower is of course due; for if the man were to say, "I will give as a dower this slave," and the person so spoken of should appear to be free, it is evident (regard being had to the relative "this," denoting pointed reference) that the condition or agreement is ipso facto null, as regarding a thing which does not exist.

But in case of consummation, she is entitled to her proper dower, not exceeding what is specified in the contract.—If a man engage with a woman in an invalid marriage, and have carnal connexion with her, she is in this case entitled to her proper dower: but she is not entitled to more than the specified dower,* according to our doctors.—This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, who conceives an analogy between this and an invalid sale; that is to say, in an invalid sale, if the stipulated price of the thing sold be short of its actual value, the latter is due to whatever amount; and so also in the present case.—The argument of our doctors, in this case, is that the thing which the husband has received (namely, the possession of the woman's person) is not property, and therefore is not appreciable in any other way than by the assignment of a dower; now if a dower assigned should exceed the proper dower, the excess is not incumbent, because of the invalidity of the assignment, for that is a part of the contract, which being invalid, the assignment is so likewise; and, on the other hand, if the dower assigned be short of the proper dower, the difference is not incumbent, because, with respect to that, assignment has not been made: contrary to an invalid sale, because there the thing sold is appreciable, and consequently the amount of the return will be adjusted by its value.

And she must observe an Edit after separation.—THE observance of an Edit, after separation, is incumbent upon a woman with whom a man has had carnal connexion in an invalid marriage. And here the Edit is to commence as from the date of separation, and not from that of the last carnal connexion.

A child born in an illegal marriage is of established descent.—THE descent of a child born of a woman enjoyed in an illegal marriage is established [in the reputed father], because in this regard is had to the child's preservation, since if the descent were not to be established, the child might perish for want of care.—Mohammed holds (and decrees are passed agreeable to this doctrine) that, in the establishment of genealogy under an invalid marriage, the time* is calculated from the first carnal connexion, not from the date of the marriage, because one which is invalid does not give a claim to the carnal act, so as to stand as such, whereas the reverse is the case in a valid marriage, as that establishes such claim: and hence, in the establishment of genealogy, the time is calculated from the date of the marriage.

Rate of the Mihr Misl, or proper dower.—THE Mihr Misl (or proper dower) of any woman is to be regulated, in its amount or value, by that of the dower of her paternal relations, such as her paternal sisters or aunts, or the daughters of her paternal uncles, and so forth, according to a precept of Ibn Mussaood, "To the woman belongs such a dower as is usually assigned to her female paternal relatives:"—moreover, men are accounted of the class of their paternal tribe, and the value of a thing cannot be estimated but by attending to the value set upon its class.

A woman's proper dower is not to be estimated by the dower of her mother or her maternal aunt, where they are not descended of her father's family, on account of the precept of Ibn Massaood already recorded: yet if her mother should be descended of her father's family (being, for instance, the daughter of his paternal uncle), in this case a judgment may be formed from her dower, as being descended from the family of the father.

In regulating the proper dower of a woman, attention must be paid to her equality with the women from whose dowers the rule is to be taken, in point of age, beauty, fortune, understanding, and virtue, because it varies according to any difference in all these circumstances; and, in like manner, it differs according to place of residence, or time (that is to say, times of trouble and confusion, as opposed to times of tranquillity); and the learned in the law have observed that equality is also to be regarded

* That is to say, if her proper dower should exceed in value the dower specified in the contract, yet the woman is entitled to the specified dower only, and not to her proper dower.

* The probable term of pregnancy, by which the child's descent is to be judged of and ascertained. (For a further elucidation of this point see Book of Divorce, Chap. XIII.)

in point of virginity, because the dower is different according as the woman may be a virgin or otherwise.

A woman's guardian may become surety for her dower.—If the Walce [guardian] of a woman become surety for her dower, it is approved, because he is competent to such responsibility (that is, to take such obligation upon himself), and he is surety in a thing which is a legal subject of bail (namely, the dower), since that is a debt, in which bail is approved: and the woman is afterwards at liberty to require her dower either of her husband or of her guardian, as in all other cases of bail: and if the guardian pay the dower, he shall take the same from the woman's husband, where he has become surety at his desire, as is the invariable rule in bail. The bail is in like manner approved, if the wife be an infant: contrary to where a father sells the property of his infant child, and becomes bail for the amount, which is not lawful, because a guardian is, with respect to marriage, a negotiator merely; but, in sale, he is the executor of the contract (whence it is that its obligations rest upon him, and its rights appertain to him); and the father's discharge is also approved, if he clear the purchaser of the whole price of the infant's property; and he is moreover at liberty to take possession of the price after the infant shall have attained maturity; wherefore, if his bail were to be approved, it would admit the principle of a man becoming surety in his own behalf, which is absurd.

OBJECTION.—A father is at liberty to take possession of the dower of his infant daughter, in the same manner as of the price of his infant child's property; wherefore if the bail of the father with respect to the dower be approved, it follows that he is bail in his own behalf.

REPLY.—The authority vested in a father to take possession of the dower is because of his parental relation, and not on account of his being a party in the contract (for which reason it is that he is not at liberty to take possession of the dower after the maturity of his child), so that he does not in this case, appear to be bail in his own behalf.

A woman may resist consummation until she be paid the prompt proportion of her dower.

—A WOMAN may refuse to admit her husband to a carnal connexion until she receive her dower of him, so as that her right may be maintained to the return, in the same manner as that of her husband to the object for which the return is given, as in sale.

A WOMAN is also at liberty to resist her husband carrying her upon a journey until she shall have received her dower of him, for the same reason.

On the other hand, the husband has no power to restrain his wife from going on a journey, or from going abroad, or visiting her friends, until such time as he shall have discharged the whole of the Mahr Moajil, or prompt dower, because a husband's right to confine his wife at home is solely for the sake of securing to himself the enjoyment of her person, and his right to such enjoyment does not exist until after the payment of the return for it.

Unless the whole dower be deferable.—WHAT is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the whole dower, or a certain portion of it, being Moajil, or prompt; but if the whole be Mowjil, or deferred,* the woman is not at liberty to refuse the embraces of her husband, as she has dropped her right by agreeing to make her dower Mowjil,—the same as in a case of sale, where, if the price of the article sold be made deferable, the seller is not at liberty to detain the article sold on account of the price.—Abou Yoosaf controverts the doctrine which is here advanced, and maintains that, in this case also, the wife is at liberty to refuse to admit her husband to carnal connexion, as long as he omits to make payment of the dower.

And she may also resist a repetition of the connexion, after consummation, in the like circumstances.—It is further to be observed, that even if the husband should have committed the carnal act, or should have been in complete retirement with the wife, yet the rule is the same; that is to say, she is still at liberty to refuse to admit him to carnal connexion, or to resist his carrying her upon a journey, until such time as she shall have received the whole of her prompt dower from him.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa.

—The two disciples, on the contrary, allege that the woman, in this case, has no such liberty of refusal or resistance. It is to be remarked, however, that this difference of opinion subsists only where the original carnal act, or complete retirement, has taken place with the woman's consent; but if she have been enjoyed by force, or if she be an infant or an idiot, her right of refusal or resistance, as above, does not cease, according to the united opinion of all our doctors.

But she is, notwithstanding, entitled to her subsistence.—It is proper to observe, that where the woman refuses to admit the husband to a repetition of the carnal act, as above stated, yet she has, nevertheless (according to Haneefa), a claim to her subsistence, as her refusal does not, in this case, proceed from any stubbornness or disobedience, since it is not exerted in resistance to a right, but rather in maintenance of one.—The two disciples hold that she is not entitled to any subsistence; and their argument on this occasion is, that the sole object of the contract has been duly delivered to the husband, either by the single carnal act, or by the single complete retirement, as aforesaid; on which account it is that her right to her whole dower is confirmed and established, and consequently no right of further detention of her person remains with her; as in a case of sale, where the seller having delivered the article sold to the purchaser, before receiving the price, has no further right over it.—Haneefa, on the other hand, reasons that the woman in resisting refuses and withholds a thing which she has opposed to a return, and over which she has, of course, a right of detention, until such return shall have been duly made to her: and with respect to what the two disciples allege, that “her right to her whole dower is confirmed and established by the single carnal act, and so forth,” it may be replied, that the whole becomes confirmed to her by a single commission of the carnal act, or a single instance of complete retirement, necessarily, because every thing beyond that is then unknown, and consequently cannot obstruct the operation of what is known; but the right of resistance still remains because the dower is opposed to the whole, the same as to the single instance, of enjoyment.

The husband obtains full authority over his wife upon payment of her dower.—WHEN the husband has duly paid to his wife the whole of her dower, he is at liberty to carry her wherever he pleases, because the word of God says, “YE SHALL CAUSE THEM TO RESIDE IN YOUR OWN HABITATIONS.” Some have alleged that the husband is not at liberty to carry his wife to another city different from her own, although he should have paid her the whole dower, because journeying and travelling may be injurious to her; but he is at liberty to carry her to the villages in the vicinity of her city, as this does not amount to travelling.

Cases of dispute between the parties concerning the amount of dower.—If a man marry a woman, and they afterwards dispute concerning the rate of her dower, the declaration of the wife is to be credited to the amount of her proper dower, and that of the husband, with respect to any excess. This proceeds upon a supposition of his having had carnal connexion with her: but if he should have divorced her before consummation, his declaration alone is to be credited with respect to the half dower. This is the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf alleges that the declaration of the husband is to be credited, whether before divorce or after, unless where it goes to establish something trifling, that is to say, something so small as is known to be short of what such a woman has a right to expect in marriage according to general usage; and this is approved. The argument of Aboo Yoosaf is that, in the case in question, the woman is plaintiff suing for an excess, and the husband defendant; and the declaration of a defendant, when made upon oath, is to be credited; wherefore that of the husband, in the present instance, must be so, unless he testify to some-argue against him: and the ground upon which this proceeds, is that the appreciation of the woman's person is a matter of necessity; and, therefore, so long as it is possible that anything can be decreed from the stipulated dower, the proper dower is not regarded.

—The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed in this case is that, in all claims, credit must be given to the declaration of that person in whose favour apparent circumstances bear testimony, and apparent circumstances do bear testimony with one who attests the proper dower, as that is the standard object in marriage;—similar to a case where a dispute arises between a dyer and the owner of a piece of cloth, concerning the charge for dying, in which case the declaration of that person will be credited in whose behalf the value of the dye or colour bears testimony.* Concerning what is here advanced, that “if the husband should divorce his wife before consummation, his declaration alone is to be credited with respect to the half dower;” it is to be observed that this (which is recorded by Mohammed in the Jama Sagheer and Mabsoot) apparently contradicts what he has advanced in the Jama Kabeer, to wit, that “the woman must, in this case, be decreed a proportionable Matat, or present”—(which is conformable to the inference of Haneefa and Mohammed, who hold that, as a present is due, on account of a contract of marriage, after divorce, the same as a proper dower, before divorce, the one must be decreed her in the former case, as well as the other in the latter);—but this apparent contradiction between the above authorities may be reconciled by adverting to the different manner in which the case is put in them respectively; thus, in the Mabsoot, the case supposes one thousand Dirms and two thousand,—that is to say, the husband declares that the dower is only one thousand Dirms, and the wife claims two thousand; now the value of a customary present does not equal the half of those sums, and of course, to decree a present here would be no advantage to the plaintiff:—in the Jama Kabeer, on the other hand, the case supposes ten Dirms, and one hundred Dirms,—that is to say, the husband avers the dower to be only ten Dirms, and the wife claims one hundred; and her proper present may be estimated, suppose at twenty Dirms; here therefore a proper present may with propriety be decreed to her: and what occurs upon this subject in the Jama Sagheer being destitute of any mention of the amount of the dower, that rests upon what is said in the Mabsoot.

* Because, as different colours bear a different price, the value of the colour used is certainly the only standard by which the amount of the charge for dying can be judged of.

† Arab. Misl: that is, proportionable to her rank and circumstances, in the same manner

—As a more full exposition of the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed, in a case where a dispute arises between the husband and wife concerning the amount of the dower on the continuance of the marriage, let us suppose that the husband declares one thousand Dirms, for instance, and the wife claims two thousand, in which case, if the proper dower of the woman do not exceed one thousand, the declaration of the husband is to be credited; but if it be two thousand, or upward, that of the wife; and whoever of the two produces evidence in support of his or her declaration, the same is to be credited, under either of the above circumstances; and if they both produce evidence under the first of the above circumstances (that is, the woman's proper dower not exceeding one thousand Dirms), the evidence on the part of the wife is to be credited, because by such evidence her right to the excess is established;—but if, under the second (that is the woman's proper dower being two thousand or upwards), the evidence on the part of the husband is to be credited, because that goes to prove that the wife has made an abatement in her dower: but if the proper dower be one thousand five hundred Dirms, both parties must be required to make oath, after which one thousand five hundred are to be decreed to the woman. This is according to the Takhreej of Razi. Koorokhee says that the oath must be tendered to both parties in all the three circumstances, after which the proper dower must be decreed.—All this applies to a case where the husband and wife dispute with respect to the amount of the dower itself, and not with respect to its specification: but if their dispute respect the latter, one of the parties asserting that a dower had been named, and the other denying, in this case the proper dower must be decreed, according to all the doctors, that being the original dower, independent of any specification.

Or between one of the parties, and the heirs of the other.—If, after the death of the husband or wife, a dispute should arise between the survivor and the heirs of the deceased, concerning the amount of the dower, the rule in this case is the same as when the dispute arises between the parties during life, because a claim to the woman's proper dower does not cease in consequence of the demise of either.

Or between the heirs of both parties.—AND if both husband and wife were to die, and a dispute to arise between their heirs with respect to the amount of the dower, in this case the declaration of the husband's heirs shall be credited, although they should declare a sum less than the usual and customary dower of such a woman as the wife deceased.—This is according to Haneefa. Mohammed holds that the rule is the same here as where the dispute arises between the parties during life.—And if the heirs dispute with respect to the specification of the dower, one party insisting that a dower had been named, and the other denying, the declaration of the latter is to be credited, according to Haneefa. In short, with Haneefa, the woman's proper dower is not at all regarded after the demise of both parties, as shall be hereafter demonstrated. The two disciples, on the other hand, maintain that the proper dower should in that case be decreed.

The heirs of a deceased wife may take the amount of the specified dower out of the deceased husband's property.—IN case of the death of both husband and wife, it belongs to the heirs of the latter to take the dower out of the estate of the husband, where it has been specifically named; but if it should not have been specified, they cannot claim anything whatever, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that the woman's heirs are entitled to her dower in either case,—that is to say, to the specified dower, in the former case, or to the woman's proper dower, in the latter;—in the former, because the specified dower was a debt upon the husband, confirmed by the circumstance of his decease, and consequently must be paid out of his estate, unless it should be known that the wife had died first, in which case the husband's portion of inheritance would drop from the dower [that is, must be deducted from it] on account that he also is an heir;—and, in the latter, because the woman's proper dower had become a debt upon the husband, the same as a specified dower, and therefore does not drop in consequence of his death, any more than where only one of the parties dies.—Haneefa argues that, in this case, a supposition of the death of both husband and wife affords a conclusion that their peers and cotemporaries are already out off by death, and no longer remain, because it is most probable that they would not both die until after a length of time; and after the lapse of such a period, their peers and cotemporaries no longer remaining, from whom can the Cawzee judge of or decide what the value of the woman's proper dower ought to be?—Haneefa, however, holds also that where the husband and wife both happen to die before the lapse of any length of time, so as that their peers and cotemporaries are still remaining, her heirs are entitled to her proper dower.

Case of a dispute concerning articles sent by a husband to his wife.—If a husband were to send anything to his wife, and she were to denominate it a present, while he asserts that he has given it in part payment of her dower, in this case the declaration of the husband must be credited, because he is the giver, and consequently must be supposed to know his own intentions best;—moreover, it is evidently the business of the husband to liquidate the obligation which lies against him before he proceeds to perform gratuitous acts; his declaration, therefore, must be credited, except where the thing sent consists of victuals ready dressed for eating (such as roasted, or boiled, or stewed, and so forth), in which case the assertion of the woman must be credited, because it is usual and customary for husbands to send such articles as presents to their wives, not counting it in the dower; but in respect to wheat or barley, the declaration of the husband should be credited for the reason above mentioned.—Some have observed that articles, the supply of which is generally held incumbent upon the husband, such as shifts, and robes, and veils, are not to be counted in the dower, apparent circumstances arguing against this.

Section.

Of the dower of infidel subjects, and of aliens, where none has been stipulated, or where it consists of carrion.—If a Christian man marry a Christian woman without stipulating any dower, or making it consist of carrion,* such as may be deemed lawful by those of their profession, and have carnal connexion with her, or divorce her before consummation, or die and leave her, the woman is not entitled to any dower whatever, although both parties should have embraced the faith within the interim.—And the law is the same where the parties are aliens married on like terms in a foreign country. The opinion of the two disciples concerning aliens is the same as that of Abou Haneefa: but with respect to Christians, being Zimmies (that is, subjects of the Mussulman government), they hold that the woman is entitled to her proper dower, where the husband either consummates the marriage by committing the carnal act, or dies; and that she is entitled to a present when he divorces her before consummation.—Ziffer alleges that the alien woman is entitled to her proper dower in either case (that is, in the event either of the husband's death, or of divorce), because the law does not hold it allowable to seek or desire marriage but in return for property, and this rule equally affects Infidels and Mussulmans, as marriage forms a part of the temporal law, the obligations of which extend to all alike. To this the two disciples reply, that aliens do not take upon themselves any obligation to the observance of the laws of Islam, neither are they capable of so doing, on the account of a difference of country: contrary to the case of Zimmies, who are subject to the Mussulman law in all temporal concerns, or acts to which the temporal law has reference (such as whoredom, usury, and so forth), since they are fully capable of taking upon themselves an obligation to the observance of those laws, as being native subjects of the Mussulman country. Haneefa reasons upon this, that Zimmies do not subject themselves to any of the laws of Islam, either with respect to things which are merely of a religious nature (such as fasting and prayer), or with respect to such temporal acts as, though contrary to the Mussulman law, they may hold to be legal (such as the sale of wine, or of swine's flesh), because we are commanded to leave them at liberty, in all things which may be deemed by them to be proper, according to the precepts of their own faith; wherefore, with respect to all such acts, Zimmies are the same as aliens; but from these is to be excepted whoredom, that being held universally, and by all sects, to be a criminal act; and as to usury, no such thing can have legal existence, it being excepted from all the obligations to which the person can be subject, because of a saying of the prophet, "Observe that between us, and whosoever takes usury, no engagements exist."—The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that what Mohammed has advanced in the Jama Sagheer, "If a Christian man marry a Christian woman without any dower"—and so forth,—may be understood in two ways,—one, the absolute exception of a dower (that is, especially stipulating that there shall be none); and the other, merely the omitting to mention it in the contract. Some have said, concerning this case, that where the dower is either made to consist of unlawful articles, or is not mentioned in the contract, there are two traditions; according to one, the woman is entitled to her proper dower (as maintained by the two disciples), and according to the other, nothing whatever is due: and it is from this variance in the traditions that the difference of opinion arises between Haneefa and Mohammed.

Of the dower of infidel subjects, where it consists of wine or pork.—If a Zimmie marry a Zimmie, making the dower to consist of wine or pork, and one or both should afterwards embrace to the faith, yet the woman is nevertheless entitled to the unlawful article settled upon her, although the conversion take place previous to seisin, provided the unlawful article had been identically specified; but if this be not the case, the woman, in the instance of wine, is to receive the estimated value of such wine, or in that of pork, her proper dower.—This is according to Haneefa. Abou Yoosaf alleges that the woman is entitled to her proper dower in either instance. Mohammed, on the contrary, maintains that she is in either instance entitled to the estimated value of the unlawful article specified, whatever it be.—The reasoning upon which the opinion of the two disciples proceeds in this case is that by seisin, or possession, the right in the thing possessed becomes fully established and confirmed; seisin, therefore, is similar to a contract of marriage, since, like that, it produces a right which had not before existed; and consequently the seisin of wine or pork by a Mussulma, as a dower, is illegal, the same as a contract itself including a specification of such unlawful articles, as a dower; and this, whether those articles may have been identically specified, or only

* Meaning the flesh or carcass of any animal which dies a natural death.—The original word signifies the flesh of any fowl or quadruped (not being Game) which has not been lawfully slain.

generally mentioned.—Abou Yooasaf further remarks that as, where the time of seisin is connected with the time of the execution of the contract, if both parties were then to embrace the faith, her proper dower would become due to the woman, so in the present instance likewise:—with Mohammed, on the other hand, the mention of the unlawful article, as a dower, is approved, as being held, by the sect of the parties, to be property; but yet the delivery is forbidden, on account of the parties having embraced the faith; wherefore the value becomes obligatory upon the husband, the same as where a man makes dower of a slave who dies before the delivery.—The argument of Haneefa on this subject is that a dower identically specified becomes the property of the woman on the instant of the contract of marriage being executed, for which reason it is that a woman is empowered to make what use of her dower she may think expedient, by giving it away, or transferring her property in it, either for or without a return; and the only difference that possession makes is, that the husband is thereby exonerated from responsibility with respect to it, this being simply a transition of it from the possession of the husband to that of the wife, which does not become prohibited here by the Islam of the parties, any more than in the case of a claim of restitution of wine which had been forcibly seized;—that is to say, if a person were to make a forcible seizure of wine from a Zimnee, and this Zimnee should afterwards become a Mussulman, he is nevertheless still at liberty to claim restitution of the wine thus forcibly seized; and so likewise in the present case (contrary to a case where a Zimnee purchases wine or a hog, and afterwards becomes a Mussulman before he has taken possession of his purchase; for in this case it is unlawful for him to take possession, and the bargain becomes void, because, in sale, a right of transaction with respect to the property sold does not take place until after seisin is made of it by the purchaser, which becomes forbidden by his subsequent Islam):—but where the unlawful article is not identically specified, nothing but actual possession can establish a property in it, and this becoming prohibited by the subsequent Islam of the party, and being thereby precluded, the price or value of the pork would not be due to the woman, because the receipt of that is the same as of the property itself,—hog's flesh being of the class of things denominated Zooatal-Keem, whereas wine is not of this nature, being of the class of Zooatal-Insul, for which reason, if the husband were to offer the value before Islam, the wife would be compelled to accept of that of the pork, but not of that of the wine.—It is to be remarked that if the husband, in the present instance, were to divorce his wife before consummation, the same difference of opinion exists among our doctors; those who (as above) determine for a proper dower, decreed ing her a present; and those who make the value of the article obligatory upon the husband, decreeing her an half of such value.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE MARRIAGE OF SLAVES.

Slaves cannot marry without the consent of their proprietor.—THE marriage of a male or a female slave is not lawful without the master's consent. Malik has said that the marriage of a male slave is valid independent of the consent of his master, because he is competent to pronounce divorce, and is therefore equal to the contracting of marriage. The arguments of our doctors on this subject are twofold:—FIRST, a precept of the prophet says, "Whatever slave marries without his owner's consent is an adulterer;"—SECONDLY, marriage, with respect either to male or female slaves, is a blemish,* on which account they are not at liberty to enter into such a contract without the approbation of their owners.

Nor Mokatibs.—NEITHER is it lawful for a Mokatib to enter into a contract of marriage without his owner's consent; because a slave of this description, although he be, by virtue of his contract of Kitabat, rendered free with respect to acquisition, of necessity, yet remains, with respect to matrimony, subject to the laws of bondage. And, for the same reason, it is not lawful for a Mokatib to contract his own male slave in marriage without the consent of his owner.

Although such may contract their own female slaves in marriage, nor Mokatibs, although they have the same privilege.—BUT he may lawfully contract his female slave, as hence arises an acquisition, in her dower.—In like manner, it is not lawful for a Mokatib to marry without her owner's consent; but she may lawfully contract her female slave in marriage, as hence arises an acquisition to her as above. Neither is it lawful for a Modabbir or Am-Walid to marry without their owner's consent, because his authority with respect to them still exists.

A slave may be sold for the discharge of his wife's dower.—If a slave marry with his master's consent, the dower [to the woman whom he marries] is a debt upon his person, for the payment of which he may be sold, because the debt has become obligatory upon the slave on account of the existence of its cause (namely, marriage, proceeding from a competent person), and the obligation of the debt extends to the master also, he having consented thereto, and accordingly devolves upon him, in order that the creditor may be protected from injury; as in the case of debts contracted by a slave in mercantile dealing.

And a Modabbir or Mokatib are to discharge it by labour.—A MODABBIR or Mokatib (in case of marriage) must discharge the dower by labour, as not being liable to be sold, because the property in them is not capable of being transferred from one to another; this debt of the dower, therefore, is to be discharged by their acquisitions, so that the wife may not be subjected to loss; but their persons are not liable to be attached for payment.

* As tending to depreciate their value.

How far a master's desiring his slave to divorce his wife, is an argument of his assent to the slave's marriage.—If a slave marry without his owner's consent, and the latter afterwards should say to him, "divorce" [your wife] or "put her away," his [the owner's] assent to the marriage is not implied, because such a mode of address bears the construction of obstructing or resisting execution of the contract, as the terms divorce and separation apply to that, as well as to the dissolution of the contract of marriage already executed: it is therefore to be thus construed, either because this is suitable to the state of a disobedient and refractory slave, or because the prevention of a marriage is an act of less magnitude than the assenting to it. But if the owner were to say to his slave, "repudiate her by a divorce reversible," this implies his assent to the marriage, because a reversible divorce is not supposed but in a case of marriage [already executed], wherefore assent to the marriage is hereby signified.

Obligation of the dower in a case of invalid marriage, contracted by a slave at the desire of his owner.—If a person desire his slave to marry such a female slave, and he accordingly wed her by an invalid marriage,* and have carnal connexion with her, Haneefa holds that the slave shall be sold for the discharge of her dower. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that the dower shall be exacted of him (the slave) upon his becoming free.—The foundation of this difference of opinion is that, with Haneefa, assent applies equally to a legal and to an invalid marriage, and consequently the debt [of the dower] is upon the owner; but with the two disciples, assent applies to a valid and regular marriage only, wherefore the debt is not upon the owner (whence it is that it may be required of the slave on his becoming free at any subsequent period), for they argue that the intent of marriage is to guard against incontinence, and that end is obtained by regular, but not by invalid marriages, wherefore if a person were to make a vow that he will not marry, his vow applies solely to regular marriage: contrary to a case of sale; that is to say, if a person were to empower another in sale, such power extends both to regular and to invalid sale, a variety of privileges being therein involved, such as the right of emancipation, and so forth. Abou Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that the word "marry" [in the owner's desire expressed to his slave] is general, and is therefore to be considered as having a general application, the same as sale; and there are a variety of points involved in an irregular marriage, as well as in sale, such as genealogy [of children born in such marriage], and the obligations to the payment of dower, and to the observance of Edit; and with respect to the instance of a vow, as produced by the two disciples, it is not admitted as applicable by Haneefa.

Case of an indebted Mazoon, contracted in marriage by his owner.—If a man contract his Mazoon, or privileged slave, who is a debtor, to any woman in marriage, it is lawful; and the wife [in virtue of her right to her dower] becomes a joint creditor with the others; that is to say, the slave is to be sold for the discharge of all his debts, and the price arising from the sale is to be divided between his wife and the other creditors, in proportion to their respective claims. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this rule holds only where the marriage has been effected upon a Mihr Misl, or less; but if the dower exceed the Misl proportion, the other creditors are, in that case on an equality with the wife, so far as the amount of her Mihr Misl, or proper dower, and the payment of the excess must be postponed till after the discharge of the debt to the creditors; the ground of which is, that the owner's authority over his slave, with respect to matrimony, is founded on his having the property of his person (as shall be hereafter explained), and that right of property still remaining, the marriage of the slave is completely legal and valid.

OBJECTION.—In consequence of the marriage the right of the creditors is rendered null both by design, and in effect; wherefore it would be requisite that, in discharging the debts of the Mazoon, those due to the first creditors ought to be first paid; whereas it is otherwise in this case, for they are all put on an equality.

REPLY.—The right of the creditors is not designedly rendered null by the marriage; but the marriage being held valid, the debt of dower is due in consequence of the existence of its cause; and there is nothing to invalidate its existence; the dower, therefore, is the same as a debt of damage;—that is to say, where a Mazoon slave, being already in debt, destroys or wastes the property of a stranger, the latter comes in as a joint creditor; and the slave is as a sick debtor; that is to say, if a sick person, being in debt, marry a woman, she comes in as a joint creditor with the others, to the amount of her proper dower, and so in this case likewise.

A master may withhold permission from his female slave to dwell in the house of her husband.—If a master contract his female slave in marriage to another man, he is not under any obligation to send her to the house of her husband, she still remaining attached in service to her master; and the husband shall be desired to visit his wife at opportune seasons, at her master's house, because his right to her service still remains in virtue of his property in her; and if he were under any obligation to send her to the house of her husband, his right would be rendered null.

* That is, under such circumstances of affinity, &c., as invalidates the marriage.

if he so permit, her husband must permit her, but not otherwise.—AND if the master should give permission to his female slave to dwell in the house of her husband, her subsistence and lodging are incumbent upon the husband; but if he should not permit this, nothing whatever is incumbent, because subsistence is the recompense for the matrimonial restraint; and if she live in the house of her husband, she is under this restraint, but not otherwise. And if the master thus permit her to dwell with her husband, still he is at liberty, notwithstanding, to call for and require her legal service at any subsequent period, because his right of usufruct still continues, in virtue of his property in her; and this right is not relinquished by such permission any more than by her marriage.

THE compiler of the Hedaya remarks that Imam Mohammed has said, "A master contracting his male or female slave in marriage is lawful," without making any mention of the consent of the slave to such marriage, which shows that this consent is not a condition; and such is the opinion of our doctors, who hold that a master is empowered to contract his slaves in marriage by compulsion; that is to say, that the marriage of such, where it is contracted by the master, holds good independent of their consent. According to Shafci, a master is not empowered to contract his male slave in marriage by compulsion; and there is also an opinion of Hanceefa recorded to this effect: this doctrine proceeds upon the principle that marriage is a natural privilege of man, and a slave is a possession of his owner by the laws of property, but not by the laws of nature; wherefore the master is not endowed with any absolute authority with respect to his marriage, contrary to the case of a female slave, whose owner, as being entitled to the carnal use of her person, is at liberty to transfer the same to any other. The argument of our doctors on this subject is that a master, in causing his slave to marry, acts with a view to the preservation of his property, because, by marrying, the slave is withheld from the commission of whoredom, which is a cause of destruction or damage; the master, therefore, is fully empowered with respect to the marriage of his male slaves, the same as of his females; but he is not thus empowered with respect to his Mokatib, or Mokatiba, because these are, as to privileges, the same as free persons, and their consent is therefore a condition; for if it were otherwise, their privileges and powers of action would be totally annulled.

c On account of the punishment which attends it.

An owner slaying his female slave consummation has no claim to her &c

IF a man marry his female slave to another person, and afterwards put her to death, before her husband has had carnal connexion with her, no part of the dower whatever is, in this case, due from the husband, according to Hanceefa. The two disciples hold that, in this case, the dower is due from the husband, in the same manner as it would be if the female slave had died a natural death; and the foundation of their opinion is that a person who is slain dies by his own fate, death implying merely the termination of life, and life being terminated by the act of killing. The case, therefore, is here the same as if the female slave had been slain by a stranger; that is to say, if the female slave had been slain by a stranger, her dower would remain due from the husband, and so also in the present case. The argument of Hanceefa is, that the owner of the slave, who, as being her Mawla, claims the consideration, has by his act prevented the delivery of the return (to wit, the person of the woman), and consequently his right to the consideration is extinguished, in the same manner as when a free woman apostatizes; that is to say, if a free woman apostatize from the faith before she has admitted her husband to the carnal embrace, no dower whatever is due to her, she [by her act of apostasy] having prevented the delivery of the return; and so likewise in the present instance. With respect to what is advanced by the two disciples, that "a person who is slain dies by his own fate," it may be answered, that although this be admitted, yet it holds with respect to a future state only, and not with respect to this world, murder, according to worldly institutes, being in the eye of the law considered as an act of destruction, inducing retaliation, fine, and so forth; and it is therefore to be regarded as an act of destruction with respect to the dower, that also being a temporal institution.

The dower of a free woman is due, although she kill herself before consummation.—If a free woman kill herself before she has admitted her husband to carnal connexion, her dower is nevertheless due from him, contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, who conceives an analogy between this case and that of a woman apostatizing before carnal connexion, or of a master slaying his female slave; for he argues that no dower whatever is here due from the husband, as the wife, to whom the consideration belongs, has by her act of suicide, prevented the delivery of the return. The arguments of our doctors are that, in worldly institutes, no regard is paid to the offence committed by a man upon his own person, wherefore suicide is to be held as dying a natural death, contrary to the case of a man killing his female slave, that being an act to which worldly institutes have regard, and, as such, subjecting the perpetrator of the murder to the performance of acts of expiation.

If a man marry the female slave of another, and be desirous of committing the act of Azil with her (i.e. emissio seminis in ano, vel inter Mamillas), this shall depend upon her master's permission, according to Haneefa; and such also is the Zahir Rawayet. According to the two disciples, the permission to this act rests with the slave, because [as being the man's wife] carnal connexion is her right; but by Azil that carnal connexion which is her right is frustrated. Her consent, therefore, is a requisite condition to the legality of the act, the same as that of a free woman, contrary to the case of a female slave, who is the property of the person having such connexion with her,* because carnal connexion is not her right (whence it is that she is not entitled to claim the carnal act of her master or owner), and consequently her consent is not a condition. The principle upon which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds in this case is, that the act of Azil defeats the intention of marriage, which is the production of children, and this is a right of the master;† whence it is that his consent is a condition, and not that of the slave. And herein appears a distinction between the state of a free woman and that of a slave [in marriage].

A female slave, upon obtaining her freedom, has a right to annul the marriage contract, where it was executed with her owner's consent.—If a female slave marry with her owner's consent,‡ and afterwards become free, she is then at liberty either to break off the marriage or to continue it, whether her husband be a slave or a freeman, because, upon Barrera (who was a Mokatiba of Aysha) becoming free, the prophet said to her, "You are now mistress of your own person, and therefore at your own disposal," which tradition evinces that she is at liberty as above, whether her husband be a slave or a freeman, since the cause of her right of option, as there mentioned (that is, her being mistress of her own person), exists equally in either case. Shafei maintains that she has no such right of option where her husband is a freeman. The tradition above quoted, however, is in proof against him; moreover, the power of the husband with respect to his wife is greater after her emancipation than it was before, because before she was free he had power to pronounce only a double sentence of divorce, whereas afterwards he is authorized to pronounce three divorces, on which account she is justly empowered to set aside the contract of marriage, so as that her husband may not obtain any additional authority with respect to her in consequence of her emancipation. And the rule is the same where a Mokatiba marries with her owner's consent, and afterward becomes free. Ziffer says that a Mokatiba has no right of option, because the contract of marriage proceeded by, and was executed with, her especial consent, and she receives the dower,* and such being the case, she can have no subsequent right of option, contrary to the case of an absolute slave, whose consent in marriage is not regarded. The argument of our doctors is that the reason for her right of option (to wit, the accession, to the husband, of an additional authority with respect to her) appears in the case of a Mokatiba, the same as in that of an absolute slave, for before freedom the term of her Edit was only two menstruations, and she was subject to no more than a duplicate sentence of divorce; whereas, in her state of freedom, her Edit includes three menstruations, and she is subject to three divorces.

But not otherwise.—If a female slave marry without her owner's consent, and be afterwards made free, her marriage then becomes legal and valid, because, being of sound mind and mature age, she is competent to the declaration and acceptance; moreover, the illegality of the marriage was on account only of the owner's right, which being done away, it remains lawful: and the woman has not any option, as in the former case, because the marriage is not in this case valid until after emancipation, which consequently occasions no accession of power to the husband; and hence the case is the same as if she were to bestow herself in marriage after emancipation.

Case of a man marrying a female slave without her owner's consent.—If a man marry a female slave, without her owner's concurrence, on a dower of a thousand Dirms, her proper dower being one hundred Dirms only, and he have carnal connexion with her, and her owner afterwards emancipate her, the specified dower goes to him [the owner], because the husband has here obtained possession of an article which was the property of the owner, who is therefore entitled to the return: but if the marriage be not consummated until after emancipation, the specified dower goes to the woman, because in this case the husband appears to have obtained possession of an article which was her property, and she of course is entitled to the return, since the marriage, in consequence of her emancipation, takes effect from the period of the contract; and hence the specification of the dower is valid, and that which was specified is incumbent; and accordingly, no other dower is due on account of carnal connexion previous to the efficiency of the marriage, where that has been suspended [upon the event of the owner's approbation, or the slave's freedom], because the marriage, deriving its legality

* As where a master has connexion with his female slave in virtue of property.

† Because he has a property in the children born of his slave.

‡ That is, at his instigation.

* In opposition to the case of an absolute slave, whose dower is received by her Mawla, or proprietor, and by him appropriated.

from the original contract, its efficiency is considered as existing from the instant the marriage takes place; nothing, therefore, but one dower can be due.

Case of a father cohabiting with the slave of his son.—If a father enjoy the female slave of his son, and she produce a child, and he [the father] claim it, the slave becomes his Am-Walid, and he is answerable to his son for her value; but he is not so for her dower, because a father being at liberty to possess himself of the property of his son, whenever that may be requisite to his own preservation, it follows that he may possess himself of his son's slave, where he requires her for the preservation of his progeny, since he thereby provides for his own continuance, he being virtually continued in his offspring; but the preservation of his progeny being a matter of less immediate importance than that of his life, he must pay a price in exchange for the slave, whereas he might take his son's victuals without paying any price.—And here the father's property in the slave is established antecedently to his claim of the child, possession being a condition essential to such claim, which does not hold good unless he be either fully possessed of her in all respects, or at least have a right of possession in her; and neither of these exist in him (inasmuch that he might legally marry her);—it is therefore requisite that his property in her be considered as existing a priori; and this being admitted, the father appears to have had carnal connexion with his own slave, and consequently is not subject to the payment of an Akir.—Ziffer and Shafei maintain that the slave's dower is a debt upon the father; because they hold that his property in her is a consequence of his Istee'ad, or claim of the child,—that is, that his right of possession is thereby established, the same as in a partnership slave; now the effect of a thing is not found until after that thing has taken place; and such being the case, as the carnal connexion appears to have been had, in the first instance, with the property of another, a dower is due.

Case of a son contracting his female slave in marriage to his father.—If a man marry his female slave to his father, and she produce a child, she does not become Am-Walid to the father, neither is her price a debt against him, because he is answerable for her dower; and the child born of her is free, such a marriage being approved by our doctors.—This is contrary to the doctrine of Shafei, according to whom a marriage of this kind is illegal. The argument of our doctors is, that the slave is not at all the property of the father, because, the son being her proprietor in every respect, it is impossible that the father should be so in any view; the son, moreover, is endowed with privileges [in regard to her] which do not appertain to his father, such as selling or bestowing her in marriage, or emancipating her, which evinces that the father is not in any respect her proprietor, although, in a case where he has carnal connexion with her, punishment drops, on account of erroneous possession; and his marriage with her being admitted as legal, the conservation of his seed is effected by means of marriage, [not by means of Istee'ad], so that his property in her is no way established [by the circumstance of her bearing a child to him], and consequently she does not become his Am-Walid.—And here the father is not answerable for the value either of her or of her child, as he does not become proprietor of either; but he owes her dower, he having taken that upon him by his marriage; and the child is free, because his owner would otherwise be his brother; and he is, virtually emancipated of course.

The marriage of a free woman with a slave is annulled by her procuring his emancipation.—If a free woman, being the wife of a slave, should say to the proprietor of such slave, "Emancipate him on my behalf for a thousand Dirms," and he accordingly emancipates him, the marriage is annulled.—Ziffer maintains that it is not annulled.—Our doctors argue, on this occasion, that the slave obtains his freedom from the woman, whence it is that the right of Willa rests with her, and also, that if she were under obligation to perform an expiatory act, and intend her husband's release to stand as such, her expiation is thereby fulfilled.—With Ziffer the emancipation is held to proceed from the owner, because the woman has required him to emancipate the slave "on her behalf," which is absurd, since manumission cannot take effect upon a slave who is not the property of the emancipator; consequently, her requisition being improper, emancipation is to be regarded as proceeding solely from the owner.—Our doctors, on the other hand, say that there is one mode in which the requisition of the woman may be rendered proper, viz. by considering her property in the slave to have existence previous to emancipation, as an essential (for her right of possession is a condition of the validity of emancipation on her behalf), and such being the case, her requisition "emancipate him, &c." bears the construction of her desiring the owner first to transfer to her his property in the slave for such a consideration, and then to emancipate him "from her;" and the reply of the owner, "I have emancipated him," is as if he were to say that he had transferred him, and then set him free "from her;" and upon the woman's property in him being established, it necessarily follows that the marriage is annulled, the marriage of a free woman with her slave being illegal, since possession by right of property is irreconcilable with possession by matrimony.—But if the woman were to say to the owner of her husband, "emancipate him from me," without mentioning any consideration, in this case the marriage is not annulled, and the Willa rests with the master. This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Abou Yoosaf says that this and the preceding case are the same, and that the marriage is here likewise annulled, because in this instance also the transfer must be supposed to have previously taken place (though without any return), in order that the act may be lawful.

OBJECTION.—Transfer of property, without a return, amounts to gift, and that is not valid without seisin; now here seisin does not appear; consequently how can the transfer be valid?

REPLY.—Seisin is not in this case regarded, any more than in Zihar; thus, if the expiation of Zihar were incumbent upon any person, and he were to desire another to give the victuals,* as from him, and the other do accordingly, the gift is understood independent of seisin; and so here likewise.—The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that seisin being declared, in the ordinances of the prophet, to be a condition of gift, cannot be dispensed with; neither can it be established merely by supposing or assuming it, as an essential, because seisin is a sensible act,—contrary to sale, which is a legal transaction; and in the case of expiation, as cited by Aboo Yoosaf, the poor stand as the deputies of the expiator, in the seisin of the victuals, but the slave (in the case here treated of) cannot stand as the wife's deputy, because nothing is received by him, so as to constitute him her deputy in seisin.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE MARRIAGE OF INFIDELS.

The marriage of an Infidel couple is not dissolved by their jointly embracing the faith.

—If an Infidel man and woman marry without witnesses, or whilst the woman is in her Edit from a former Infidel husband, and this be no objection by the rules of their own sect, and they afterwards embrace the faith together, their marriage remains valid.—This is according to Haneefa.—Ziffer maintains the marriage to be invalid in either case—(that is to say, whether it be entered into without witnesses, or during the woman's Edit), but that Infidels are not liable to be called to an account until they embrace Islam, or until they appeal to the law,—that is to say, carry the matter before the judge.—The two disciples coincide with Haneefa in the first case [the defect of witnesses], but agree with Ziffer in the last [the Edit]. The argument of Ziffer is that the word of the sacred writings extends to all men alike, and consequently to Infidels; but the parties, as being Zimmies, are not liable to molestation; but this exemption from molestation is an effect of indulgence, and does not proceed from any idea of the marriage being legal; and of course, where it becomes a subject of litigation, or the parties become Mussulmans, separation must ensue, the illegality of their marriage still remaining.—The arguments of the two disciples are that the illegality of Poliandry is universally admitted amongst Mussulmans, and that Infidel subjects have engaged to follow the temporal law in all such points as are universally admitted; but with respect to the illegality of marriage without witnesses there subsists a difference of opinion among the Mussulmans; and Infidels have engaged only to follow such temporal laws of Islam as are universally admitted, and not such as are disputed; hence, in the case of Poliandry a separation becomes necessary, but not in the case of marriage without witnesses. Haneefa argues that the marriage is not rendered illegal by the injunctions of the law, because those injunctions are not addressed to Infidels; neither does any reason exist why the Edit should be obligatory on account of the right of a husband who has no faith in the necessity of it: contrary to a case where the Infidel woman is the wife of a Mussulman, because he has faith in the necessity of Edit; and therefore the illegality of her marriage [with the Infidel] should in this case be established, on account of his [the Mussulman's] right; and the marriage being valid ab initio, on account of no illegality appearing therein, continues to exist as such, since testimony is not a condition with respect to the period of its existence; and the circumstances of appeal to the law, or of conversion to the faith, take place during the existence of the marriage: neither does the circumstance of the Edit forbid the continuance of the marriage; as when a man (for instance) has carnal connexion, erroneously, with the wife of another, in which case an Edit is incumbent upon the woman, but the marriage continues to hold good.

Unless it be a marriage within the prohibited degrees.—If a Majoosee wed his mother or his daughter, and they afterwards become Mussulmans, they are to be separated. This holds with the two disciples, because a marriage within the prohibited degrees is universally admitted to be null, on which account the rule extends to Infidels as well as Mussulmans (as before mentioned, from them, in the case of Edit), and the parties, upon their conversion, being necessarily liable to molestation on account of such marriage, it follows that a separation must take place upon that event; and it holds also with Haneefa, because, although such marriage be deemed lawful in the Rawayet Saheeh, yet the circumstance of the wife being within the prohibited degrees forbids the continuance of it after conversion, on which account separation is to take place: contrary to the circumstance of Edit, which (according to Haneefa) does not forbid the continuance of the marriage.

But if one of them only be converted, a separation takes place.—If only one of the parties be converted to the faith, a separation follows; but if one only appeal, Haneefa holds that separation does not take place: contrary to the opinion of the two doctors, according to whom separation takes place in this case also.—The reason, with Haneefa, for making this distinction between these two cases is, that the right of one party is not invalidated by the appeal of the other, as the faith of the one is not altered by the appeal of the other: but where one of the parties becomes a Mussulman, although the faith of the other be not altered by that event, yet the faith of an Infidel is not sufficient to controvert or oppose the Islam of a Mussulman, as Islam is the subjector and cannot be subjected.—But where both the parties enter into a litigation, it is universally agreed that separation takes place, because this mutual litigation amounts to both authorizing any third person to effect a separation between them, which if they were to do, the separation so effected would be legal.

Apostates are incapacitated from marrying.—It is not lawful that an apostate marry any woman, whether she be a believer, an Infidel, or an apostate, because an apostate is liable to be put to death; moreover, his three days of grace are granted in order that he may reflect upon the errors which occasion his apostacy; and as marriage would interfere with such reflection, the law does not permit it to him.

In like manner, it is not lawful that a female apostate marry any man, whether Mussulman or Infidel, because she is imprisoned for the purpose of reflection (as above), and her attention to her husband would interfere therewith; moreover, this circumstance of her imprisonment necessarily prevents the matrimonial intercourse;—now marriage is lawful, not in respect to itself, but to its ends, and consequently, where these are defeated, it cannot be deemed in any respect legal.

If either the father or mother be Mussulman, their children are Mussulmans.—WHENEVER either the husband or the wife is a Mussulman, their children are to be educated in the Mussulman faith. And if either one or other [of an Infidel couple] become a Mussulman, and they have infant children, those are to be considered as Mussulmans, in virtue of the Islam of one of their parents, because this is tenderness to the children.

Or where one is of a superior order of Infidels, and the other of an inferior, their children are of the superior order.—If one of a married couple by a Kitabee, and the other a Majoosee, their children are to be regarded as Kitabees, because, in this also there is a degree of tenderness with respect to the children, as a Majoosee is worse than a Kitabee. This is contrary to the doctrine of Shafei, who holds the infidelity of a Majoosee, and that of a Kitabee, to be equal: but with our doctors a Kitabee is held superior to a Majoosee.

Upon the conversion of one of the parties, the magistrate is to require the other to embrace the faith, and must separate them, in case of recusancy.—WHEN the wife becomes a convert to the faith, and her husband is an Infidel, the magistrate is to call upon the husband to embrace the faith also; if he accede, the woman continues his wife; but if he refuse, the magistrate must separate them; and this separation, with Haneefa and Mohammed, is a divorce.—In like manner, if the husband become a Mussulman, and his wife be a Majoosee, the magistrate is to call upon her to embrace the faith also; if she accede, she remains his wife; but if she refuse, the magistrate must separate them; but this separation is not divorce.—Aboo Yoosaf has said that the separation is not divorce in either case.—What is here advanced of the magistrate calling upon the party to embrace the faith, is an opinion of our doctors.—Shafei maintains that the magistrate is not to make any such requisition, because this is molestation, and we have engaged not to molest Zimmeees, as they have entered into a contract of subjection to us.

OBJECTION.—It would hence appear that the matrimonial right of possession should not terminate in this case; whereas Shafei also holds that it is terminated.

REPLY.—The matrimonial intercourse is not admissible between a Mussulman and an Infidel; for which reason it is that the matrimonial right of possession is terminated on the instant of conversion, where either party embraces the faith, before consummation, because in this case the right has not been confirmed; but, on the other hand, if conversion take place after consummation, the termination is delayed until the end of three menstruations, because the right has on this occasion been confirmed; as holds in divorce.—The argument of our doctors is that, upon either party embracing the faith, the ends of marriage are defeated, on account of difference of religion; hence it is absolutely necessary that recourse be add to some means by which a separation may be effected;—now Islam, as an act of piety, is incapable of being rendered a cause of separation; the Infidel party is therefore to be called upon to embrace the faith, in order that the ends of marriage may be answered by conversion, or that a cause of separation may be established in case of refusal. The reason upon which Aboo Yoosaf founds his opinion is that the occasion of separation, to wit, refusing the faith, may proceed from either the man or the woman; a separation, therefore, on account of such refusal, is not divorce, any more than on account of a right of property;—that is to say, if, of husband and wife, either become the owner of the other, a separation ensues; but this separation is not divorce; and so also in the present case.—In reply to this, Haneefa and Mohammed argue that the husband, when he refuses the faith, wilfully withholds the customary benevolence from his wife, where he has it still in his power to continue it to her, by becoming a Mussulman; and such being the case, the magistrate acts merely as his substitute, in effecting the separation; in the same manner as where a husband is impotent, or deprived of his penis; but a woman is not empowered to divorce, for which reason the magistrate cannot be regarded as her substitute in effecting the separation when she has refused the faith.

It is to be observed, that where the separation takes place on account of the woman's refusal of the faith, she is still entitled to her dower, provided her husband has consummated the marriage, as in this case her right has been confirmed by the carnal act; but if the marriage should not have been consummated she cannot receive any dower, because the separation has proceeded from her, and her right to the dower is not confirmed; thus the case here is the same as where a woman apostatizes, or admits the son of her husband to carnal connexion.

And if the conversion of either happen in a foreign country, separation takes place upon the lapse of the woman's term of probation.

—If the wife embrace the faith in a foreign country, and her husband be an Infidel,—or, if a foreigner there become a Mussulman, and his wife be a Majooseen,—the separation between them does not take place until the lapse of three terms of the wife's courses, when she becomes completely repudiated.—The reason of this is, that Islam cannot be made an occasion of separation (as has been before observed); and the requiring the other party to embrace the faith is impracticable, as the authority of the magistrate does not extend to a foreign land, nor is it acknowledged there; yet separation is indispensable for the removal of evil; the condition, therefore, of separation (to wit, the lapse of three terms of the woman's courses), must stand in the place of separation effected by the magistrate; and in this rule no distinction is made between a woman enjoyed, and one unenjoyed.—Shafei makes a distinction, on this occasion, between a woman enjoyed and one unenjoyed, in the same manner as he distinguishes between them when they reside in a Mussulman territory, and one of them embraces the faith; as has been before explained.

If the wife be an alien, she is not to observe an Edit, from separation, in consequence of her husband's conversion.—When a separation takes place between husband and wife, in consequence of the conversion of the former, and the latter is an alien, she is not subject to any observance of Edit, according to all the doctors.—Hanefah holds the rule to be the same, where the woman becomes a convert and her husband is an alien; that is, that the woman, in this case also, is not subject to any observance of Edit, but the two disciples maintain that she must here observe an Edit the same as would be incumbent upon her if she were to come into the Mussulman territory; as shall be hereafter demonstrated.

The conversion of the husband of a Kitabee does not occasion separation.—If the husband of a Kitabee become a Mussulman, their marriage still endures, because the marriage of a Mussulman with a Kitabee being legal ab initio, its continuance is so a fortiori.

Case of a convert removing from a foreign land into a Mussulman territory.—If either husband or wife become a convert to the faith in a foreign country, and afterwards remove thence into the Mussulman territory, a separation takes place between them:—this is contradicted by Shafei:—but if either party be brought, as a captive, out of the foreign country, separation takes place between them, according to all the doctors: if, however, both the parties be brought captives together, we hold that there is no separation; whereas Shafei says that separation takes place.—Hence it may be collected that the circumstance of the parties residing apart in different countries is held to be a cause of separation by our doctors, but not that of their capture; and that Shafei maintains the reverse of this opinion.—The argument of the latter is that separation of country is a cause of termination of authority, but has no effect in occasioning an absolute separation in this case, any more than where an alien resides under protection in a Mussulman territory, whilst his wife remains in her own country; or where a Mussulman goes under protection into a foreign land, leaving his wife in the Mussulman territory; in neither of which cases would separation take place, and so in this instance likewise:—capture, on the other hand, leads to this, that the captive is the sole and exclusive property of the captor, which cannot be established without a termination of the former's marriage, as it is on the same principle that a captive stands virtually released from all his debts.—Our doctors, in support of their opinion, argue that by separation of country all matrimonial intercourse between the parties, whether actual or consequential, is entirely broken off, and thus this separation resembles illegality by affinity; capture, on the other hand, occasions property in the person, which does not forbid marriage at first, for if a man contract his slave in marriage, it is lawful; and so, also, it does not forbid the continuance of the marriage; as in the case of purchase, where if a person should purchase a female slave, the wife of another, the marriage does not, on that account, become null.—And in reply to what Shafei has advanced with respect to capture,—it is admitted that this makes the captive the exclusive property of the captor, in respect to substance, but the object of marriage (to wit, the use of the woman's person), is not substance, and therefore capture does not annul the marriage: moreover, between a protected foreigner and his wife separation of abode does not virtually take place, as his ultimate intention is to return home whence he may b regarded, virtually, as in a foreign country, during his residence in the Mussulman territory.

A woman, retiring from a foreign to a Mussulman country, is at liberty to marry.

—If a woman come out of a foreign country into the Mussulman territory, and there become either a Zimnee, or a convert to the faith, it is lawful for her to marry;* and Haneefa holds that she is not under any obligation to observe an Edit. The two disciples say that she must observe an Edit, because separation takes place upon her entering the Mussulman territory, and she then becomes subject to the Mussulman laws. The argument of Haneefa is that the Edit is a consequence of an antecedent marriage, enjoined on account of the importance of the matrimonial tie; but this tie is of no importance whatever with respect to foreigners, for which reason it is that Edit is not enjoined upon a woman who is a captive.

But if pregnant, she must wait until her delivery.—If the woman in question be pregnant, she must not marry until she be delivered. This is the doctrine of the Zahir Zawayet. It is recorded from Haneefa that her marriage is approved; but her husband must not have carnal connexion with her until after her delivery, as is the rule with women pregnant by fornication. The ground of the former opinion is that the parentage of the fetus is ascertained [as from some alien], and therefore the former matrimonial tie is regarded, with respect to the establishment of parentage, and must consequently be so, with respect to forbidding her marriage likewise, on a principle of caution.

In a case of apostacy, separation takes place without divorce.—If either husband or wife apostatize from the faith, a separation takes place without divorce, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed alleges that if the apostacy be on the part of the husband, the separation is a divorce, because he conceives an analogy between this case and that of the husband refusing the faith: for as, in the latter instance, he by his refusal appears wilfully to withhold the customary benevolence from his wife, where he has it still in his power to continue it to her, so likewise in the former, by his apostacy. Aboo Yoosaf holds here to his opinion as before recited in the case of refusal. Haneefa makes a distinction between refusal of the faith and apostacy from it; and his reason for this distinction is that apostacy annuls marriage, because the blood of an apostate no longer remains under the protection of the law, and his life is Mobah [free to any one to take]; now divorce is used for the purpose of dissolving a marriage which actually exists; and hence apostacy cannot possibly be considered as divorce: contrary to the case of refusal of the faith, because it is on account of the ends of matrimony being thereby defeated that separation is enjoined, in that instance, as has been already said; and for this reason it is that the separation is there suspended upon a decree of the magistrate, whereas in apostacy it takes place without any such decree. It is to be observed, however, that if the apostacy be on the part of the husband, his wife is entitled to her whole dower where he has had carnal connexion with her; or to half her dower in defect of this; and where the apostacy is on the part of the wife, she is in like manner entitled to her whole dower, if her husband has had carnal connexion with her; but if not, she has no claim whatever either to dower or alimony, because the separation is in this case a consequence of her own act.

But if a man and wife apostatize together, their marriage still continues.—If the husband and wife should both apostatize together, and afterwards return to the faith at the same time, their marriage is, by a favourable construction of the law, permitted to endure. Ziffer says that it is annulled, because the apostacy of any one of them forbids the duration of it, and where that appears in both, it is found in one of them: but our doctors, in support of their opinion, cite an instance recorded to have happened in the time of the blessed companions [of the prophet], when the tribe of Binney Haneefa, after having apostatized, returned to the faith, and the companions did not direct them to renew their marriage; and their apostacies were all considered as having taken place at the same time, because of the uncertainty of the dates. But if, after their joint apostacy, either the husband or wife were singly to return to the faith, their marriage is dissolved, because here one of them persists in apostacy, and that forbids the continuance of marriage, the same as it does the matrimonial engagement at first.

CHAPTER VI.

OF KISSM, OR PARTITION.*

A man must cohabit equally with all his wives.—If a man have two or more wives, being all free women, it is incumbent upon him to make an equal partition of his cohabitation among them, whether he may have married them as virgins or as Siyeebas, or whether some of them be of the former description, and others of the latter; because the prophet has said, "The man who hath two wives, and who, in partition, inclines particularly to one of them, shall in

* Although she be already married in the foreign country.

* By Kissm is understood that equal partition of cohabitation which a husband is required, by law, to make among his wives, where he has a plurality of them.

the day of judgment incline to one side" (that is to say, shall be paralytic); and it is recorded by Aysha that he made such equal partition of cohabitation among his wives,—saying, "O God, I thus make an equal partition as to what is in my power; do not therefore bring me to account for that which is not in my power" (by which he means the affections, these not being optional).

THE wife of a prior marriage, and a new wife, are alike in this point, because the tradition above cited is general in its application, and also, because partition is one of the rights of marriage, and in these both descriptions of wives are equal.

But the mode of partition is left to himself.—It is left to the husband to determine the measure of partition; that is to say, if he choose, he may fix it at one day of cohabitation with each of his wives, successively, or more; and it is also to be remarked that by the equality of partition incumbent upon the husband is to be understood simply residence, but not coition, as the latter must depend upon the erection of the virile member, which is not a matter of option, and therefore, like the affections, not always in the husband's power.

Partition, where the wives are of different rank or degree, must be adjusted accordingly.

—If a man be married to two wives, one of them a free woman, and the other a slave, he must divide his time into three portions, cohabiting two portions with the former and one with the latter, because the same is recorded of Alee: and also, because, as it is lawful to marry a free woman upon a slave, but not a slave upon a free woman,* it hence appears that the rights of the former in marriage are short of those of the latter.—And a Mokatiba, Modabbira, or Am-Walid, are, with respect to their right of partition, the same as slaves.

Partition is not incumbent whilst the husband is on a journey.—WOMEN have no right to partition whilst their husband is upon a journey, and hence, during that period, it is at his option to carry along with him whomsoever he pleases; but it is preferable that he cause them to draw lots, and take with him on the journey her upon whom the lot may happen to fall.—Shafei says that the determination of this point by lots is incumbent upon the husband, because it is recorded of the prophet, that whenever he intended a journey he caused his wives thus to draw lots.—Our doctors, however, allege that the prophet's reason for this was only that he might satisfy the minds of his wives; wherefore drawing lots is laudable merely, because a man's wives have no claim whatsoever to partition during the period of their husband being on a journey, since he is at liberty not to carry any of them along with him, and consequently it is lawful for him to take any one of them.

THE time of a journey is not to be counted against a husband;—that is to say, he is under no obligation, on his return, to make up for the partition lost within that time, by a proportionable cohabitation with the wife or wives whom he may have left at home, they having no claim whatever to his cohabitation with them during such period.

If one wife bestow her turn [of cohabitation] upon another, it is lawful; because Soolah the daughter of Zooma gave up her turn to Aysha: but if a woman give up her turn, she is not at liberty to resume it, because she drops a right which is not as yet established in her, and absolute dereliction cannot take place unless it be of a right already established,—wherefore her resumption here is as if she were to withhold from bestowing her turn upon the other.]

BOOK III.

OF RIZA, OR FOSTERAGE.

Definition of the term.—RIZA, in its legal sense, means a child sucking milk from the breast of a woman for a certain time, which is termed the period of fosterage.*

Degree of fosterage which occasions prohibition.—PROHIBITION is attached to fosterage in whatever degree, if it be found within the usual period of infants subsisting at the breast.—Shafei says that prohibition is not established unless the child have sucked the breast at least five different times, inasmuch that if an infant were to suck for any particular space of time, whether a day or an hour, uninterruptedly, this would not occasion prohibition, because the prophet has said, "Sucking, or giving suck, for once or twice, does not render prohibited."—Our doctors support their opinion upon the authority of the sacred text, God saying, in the Koran, "YOUR MOTHERS WHO HAVE SUCKLED YOU ARE PROHIBITED UNTO YOU;"—and also upon a precept of the prophet, that "whatever is prohibited by consanguinity, is also prohibited by fosterage,"—where no distinction whatever is made between a smaller and a greater degree of it.

* Fosterage, with respect to the prohibitions occasioned by it, is of two kinds: FIRST, where a woman takes a strange child to nurse, by which all future matrimonial connexion between that child and the woman, or her relations within the prohibited degrees, is rendered illegal; SECONDLY, where a woman nurses two children, male and female, upon the same milk, which prohibits any future matrimonial connexion between them.

* By marrying one woman upon another it is to be understood a man marrying a woman when he is already possessed of a wife; the expression is merely idiomatical.

OBJECTION.—A greater degree of fosterage is essential to the establishment of prohibition, because the latter is here founded solely in an apprehension of a participation of blood,* on account of the growth and increasing bulk of the body, which cannot take place without fosterage, in a considerable degree; moreover, it occurs in the traditions that fosterage is the source of a child's growth.

REPLY.—Although prohibition be founded in an apprehension of a participation of blood, on account of growth, yet that is a point which is incapable of being absolutely ascertained, and hence prohibition by fosterage is attached, not to the degree, but to the mere act of fosterage, which is the occasion of such increase of growth: and with respect to the saying of the prophet, as mentioned by Shafei, our doctors reply that if the date of descent† of the text [of the Koran] before quoted was posterior to that of this saying, its authority is thereby superseded, and if it was prior thereto, yet the saying is rejected, because it contradicts the text.

Length of the period of fosterage.—THE period of fosterage is thirty months, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold it to be two years, and of the same opinion is Shafei. Ziffer maintains that it is three years, because something in addition to two years is absolutely requisite (according to what shall be hereafter shown), and such addition is fixed at one year, because that space admits of the child's state undergoing a complete alteration. The argument of the two disciples is the word of GOD, to wit, "HIS [the child's] TIME IN THE WOMB ‡, and [until] HIS WEANING IS THIRTY MONTHS:" now the smallest space of pregnancy is six months, and hence two years remain for fosterage; moreover, the prophet has said that "after two years there is no fosterage." The arguments of Haneefa are twofold; FIRST, the text already quoted, where it appears that GOD makes mention of two things, one the Hamal [or time of gestation], and the other the Fisal [or weaning], for both of which he indiscriminately mentions one period, namely, thirty months, wherefore it applies to each in toto; the same as in a case of two debts; that is to say, if a man (for example) where to make a declaration that he owed such a person "one thousand Dirms, and five bushels of wheat, payable within two months," this period of two months applies to each debt equally, and so in this case likewise. It may indeed be objected that, admitting this, it would follow that the time of being in the womb is also thirty months, whereas it is otherwise,—pregnancy being by law restricted to two years: but to this we reply, that the reisa cause of restriction short of that period operating upon Hamal (it being recorded in the traditions that a child does not remain in the womb of the mother above two years), whereas there is none upon Fisal, which of course stands as it appears to be: moreover, as a sucking child is nourished at the breast for two years, so is it also after the expiration of that term: for the weaning is not precisely determined to any particular period, but is effected by degrees, as the child insensibly forgets the breast and inclines to other food; it is therefore necessary that some space for fosterage be allowed in addition to the two years, and this additional space is fixed at six months, being the shortest term of pregnancy, as the lapse of that period affords a reason for altering the manner of the child's subsistence, because the subsistence of a fetus is irreconcilable with that of a suckling; * and with respect to the traditionary saying of the prophet, as cited by the two disciples, it has reference solely to the period of the claim of fosterage; that is to say, it only goes to show that no obligation arises from fosterage; so as to render payment or hire of the same obligatory upon the [child's] father, beyond the space of two years; and the text of the Koran, which says, "MOTHERS SHOULD Suckle THEIR CHILDREN FOR TWO YEARS," has also reference to the period of the claim of fosterage.

Sucking beyond the term of fosterage is not an occasion of prohibition.—If a child continue to suck after the proper period of fosterage is elapsed, prohibition is not hereby established; † because the prophet has declared that there is no fosterage after the expiration of the proper period; and also, because prohibition is not established by any fosterage, except such as is a cause of growth and increase, which are obtained only by

* Arab. Jazeeyat, a term which has no sense in our dictionaries in any manner applicable to the present case. It appears, from the context, to signify a participation of bodily substance, causing two persons to partake of one common nature.

† The Koran was declared by Mohammed to have been delivered down to him in different portions at various times, and those he termed the Noozools, or descents.

‡ Arab. Hamal. By this is generally understood pregnancy; but as the text here quoted has reference to the child, and not to the mother, the translator is under the necessity of rendering it in a phrase applicable to the former.

* That is to say, it is to be supposed that within the last six months the woman may have conceived, and may, at the end thereof, produce a child; and a woman cannot, without injuring the fetus, give suck to another, either during or after her pregnancy.

† That is to say, if, after the expiration of the proper period of fosterage, another child be brought to the breast, and the former nursing still continue to suck, these two are not hereby prohibited to each other in marriage, although they would have been so if they sucked together during the fosterage of the first child.

the fosterage within its proper period, since grown-up persons would not find any effectual nourishment from sucking.

A CHILD'S forsaking the breast before the expiration of the period of fosterage is not regarded; that is to say, if a child withhold from taking its milk before the period of fosterage has elapsed, and there be still milk in the mother's breast, and any other infant suck the milk before the expiration of that period, in this case prohibition by fosterage is established between those children.—This is the Zahir Rawayet.—Hasan has recorded it as an opinion of Haneefa, that this is the case only where the first child has not as yet become attached to another species of food, so as to be capable of subsisting altogether without milk; but if the child have adopted entirely another species of food, this circumstance is to be considered as a weaning, and prohibition by fosterage cannot in this case be established, because where the child is arrived at such a state as that other food suffices, the manner of its subsistence is altered, and that growth and increase which the child derived from sucking is at an end, wherefore the property of participation of blood, which is the occasion of prohibition, is not afterwards found.

Is the suckling of a child, after the expiration of the period of fosterage, allowable or not?—Upon this point there are various opinions: some have said that it is not so, because the act of suckling at all is permitted solely out of necessity, the milk being a constituent part of the woman's frame, the use of any portion of which, except as a matter of necessity, is prohibited; and this necessity ceases upon the expiration of the period of fosterage.

Exceptions from the general rule of prohibition by fosterage.—“WHATSOEVER is prohibited by CONSANGUINITY is so likewise by FOSTERAGE” (according to the saying of the prophet already quoted), except a sister's mother by fosterage,* whom it is lawful for a man to marry, although he cannot lawfully marry his sister's mother by blood, as she must either be his own mother, or the enjoyed of his father, both of whom are prohibited to him; contrary to her mother by fosterage.—A sister's mother by fosterage may be conceived in three different ways; FIRST, where a man has a sister by blood, who has a foster-mother, whom he may lawfully marry;—SECONDLY, where a man has a foster-sister, who has a mother by blood, whom he may likewise lawfully marry;—and THIRDLY, where a male and female infant, between whom there is no affinity, suck at the breast of one woman, and the female infant also sucks at the breast of another woman, in which case the male infant may lawfully marry the last woman, who is the foster-mother of the female infant (that is to say of his foster-sister.)

A MAN may also lawfully marry the sister of his foster-son, although it be not lawful for him to marry the sister of his son by blood, as she must be either his own daughter or the daughter of his enjoyed wife, both of whom are prohibited to him.

Cases of illegality induced by fosterage.—It is not lawful for a man to marry the wife of his foster-father, or of his foster-son (in the same manner as he is prohibited from marrying the wife of his natural father or son) because of the tradition before quoted.

OBJECTION.—It has been declared, in the sacred writings, that it is lawful for men to marry the wives of their sons by blood, and this particular restriction to blood should seem to imply that marriage with the wives of foster-sons was lawful; whereas it is otherwise.

REPLY.—The restriction above mentioned refers to the exclusion of the wives of children by descent, and not to the exclusion of the wives of foster-sons, for the reasons already mentioned.

PROHIBITION is attached to the milk of the man (that is to say, to the milk of which he is the cause); if, for example, a woman nurse a female child, the latter is prohibited to her husband, and to his father and son, because the husband, through whom the woman's breasts have been filled with milk, is as a father to that child.—It is recorded, as an opinion of Shafei, that prohibition is not attached to the milk of a man; because this prohibition arises from an apprehension of participation of blood, and the milk is a secretion from the blood of the woman, and not of the man.—The arguments of our doctors in this case are threefold; FIRST, the saying of the prophet, as before quoted, “Whatsoever is prohibited by consanguinity is also prohibited by fosterage,”—and prohibition by consanguinity being found in both father and mother, it follows that it is found in both these relations by fosterage;—SECONDLY, the prophet once said to Aysha (who had complained to him of Afa, the brother of Aboo Keis, appearing before her whilst she had only a single cloth upon her), “The act of Afa, in thus approaching you, is of no consequence, as he is your paternal uncle by fosterage,” which proves that affinity by fosterage is established on the paternal side, and that as the woman who suckles is the child's mother, so is her husband's father, by fosterage;—THIRDLY, the man is the cause of the entrance of the milk into the woman's breasts, and therefore the milk is, out of caution, to be regarded (with respect to the point of prohibition) as deriving its existence from him.

A MAN may lawfully marry the sister of his foster-brother, it being allowed to him to marry the sister of his brother by blood (that is, the maternal sister of his paternal brother).

* This is a very equivocal and vague expression, as appears by the succeeding definition of the various descriptions to which it applies.

It is to be observed as a rule that when a male and female infant suck from one breast, they are prohibited to each other in marriage, because they have one common mother, and are therefore as brother and sister.

It is not lawful for a female to marry any of the sons of the woman who has suckled her, because they are her brothers,—nor the sons of those sons, because they are her nephews.

It is not lawful for a male to marry the husband's sister of the woman who has suckled him, as she is his paternal aunt by fosterage.

Cases of admixture of the milk with any foreign substance.—If the milk be drawn from the nurse's breast, and mixed with water, prohibition is still attached to it, provided the former exceed the latter in quantity; but if the water exceed, prohibition is not attached.—Shafei maintains that prohibition is attached, in the latter case also, because there is actually some of the milk in that water, and therefore it is indispensably to be regarded, especially in a point of prohibition, that being a matter of caution.—To this our doctors reply that anything less in quantity than that with which it is mixed is regarded as virtually non-existent, as in the case of a vow, for instance, where, if a man swear that "he will not drink milk," and he afterwards drink it mixed with a greater proportion of water, he is not forsworn.

If the milk be mixed with other food, prohibition is not attached to it, although the former exceed the latter in quantity. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that if the milk exceed, prohibition is attached. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this opinion of the two disciples proceeds upon a supposition that the milk and victuals do not undergo any culinary preparation after admixture; but that, if they be boiled, or otherwise prepared by fire, all the doctors admit that prohibition is not then occasioned.—The two disciples argue that regard is to be had to that which exceeds (as in the case of mixing milk with water), provided it have not undergone any change by boiling or other cause.—The argument of Haneefa is that the food is the subject, and the milk only a dependent, with respect to the end it is intended for, to wit, sustenance; the case is therefore the same as if the proportion of the food exceeded that of the milk.

If the milk be mixed with medicine in a proportion exceeding the latter in quantity, prohibition is attached to it, because the milk is designed for sustenance, which is the end, and the purpose of the medicine is only to strengthen the child's stomach, or to forward digestion.

If the milk of the nurse be mixed with that of an animal, in a proportion exceeding the latter in quantity, prohibition is attached to it; but not if the milk of the animal exceed the other; regard being here had to that which exceeds, as in the admixture of milk with water.

Or with the milk of another woman.—If the milk of one woman be mixed with that of another, in this case Abou Yoosaf holds that regard should be had to the excess,—that is to say, that prohibition is attached to that woman's milk which exceeds the milk of the other in quantity,—because here the two milks, when mixed together, become as one substance, and hence the smaller quantity is to be considered (in the effect produced), as a dependant on the greater quantity.—Mohammed and Ziffer contend that prohibition is attached to both milks equally,—both are of the same nature, and a thing cannot be said to exceed a homogeneous thing, because the admixture with any article of a homogeneous nature adds to the sum, but does not occasion any destruction or change in the matter; and the end intended is the same in both. There are two opinions recorded from Haneefa upon this subject, one coinciding with Abou Yoosaf, and the other with Mohammed.

Prohibition is occasioned by the milk of a virgin.—If the breasts of a virgin should happen to produce milk, prohibition is attached to it,—that is to say, if a male child were to subsist upon it, the virgin becomes his mother by fosterage, and his marriage with her is prohibited, according to the word of God in the Koran, "YOUR MOTHERS WHO HAVE SUCKLED YOU ARE PROHIBITED UNTO YOU," which text being generally expressed, applies to all women alike:—moreover, the milk of the virgin is a cause of growth in the child, which induces an apprehension of participation of blood.

Or of a corpse.—If milk be drawn from the breasts of a deceased woman, prohibition is attached to it.—This is contrary to the opinion of Shafei, who says that in the establishment of prohibition by fosterage, the primary subject of such prohibition is the woman whose milk has been sucked by the child, the prohibition pervading through the medium of that woman to others [her relatives], but, by her decease, the original subject of prohibition is removed, she being then a dead substance; whence it is that if a man were then to commit the carnal act with her, he would not be subject to the punishment of fornication, nor would prohibition by affinity be by that act established. The argument of our doctors is that prohibition by fosterage arises from an apprehension of participation of blood, which appears in the increasing growth of the [child's] body, and this last is occasioned by milk; as in the present case.

Cases in which milk does not occasion prohibition.—If a woman's milk be administered to a child in a gyster, prohibition by fosterage is not attached to it.—This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet.—It is recorded from Mohammed that prohibition is thereby established, in the same manner as a fast would be vitiated by it:—but the reason of this apparent inconsistency (according to the Zahir Rawayet) is that the cause of violating the fast is the restoration of the body, which is effected by the glyster; whereas the cause of prohibition by fosterage is the increase of the body's growth, which is not thereby effected, nothing being sustenance to men except what is administered by the mouth. •

If a man's breasts should happen to produce milk, prohibition is not attached to it, because the substance thus produced is not, in fact, milk, and consequently increase of growth is not obtained by means of it.—The principle upon which this proceeds is that milk cannot be secreted in the breasts of any person but one who is capable of child-bearing.

PROHIBITION by fosterage is not attached to the milk of a goat (or other animal); that is to say, if two infants, a male and a female, were to subsist together, upon the milk of one goat, prohibition by fosterage is not established between them, because between mankind and brutes there can be no participation of blood (that is to say, such participation as would occasion affinity), and prohibition by fosterage arises from participation of blood.

Case of one of two wives suckling the other.—If a man marry an infant and an adult, and the latter should give milk to the former, both wives become prohibited with respect to that man [their husband], because if they were to continue united in marriage to him, it would imply the propriety of joint cohabitation with the foster-mother and her foster-daughter, which is prohibited, in the same manner as joint cohabitation with a natural mother and daughter.—It is to be observed on this occasion, that if the husband should not have had carnal connexion with the adult wife, she is not entitled to any dower whatever, because the separation has proceeded from her, before consummation:—but the infant has a claim to her half dower, the separation not having proceeded from her.

OBJECTION.—The separation proceeds from her, because sucking the milk from the breast was her act.

REPLY.—Although the sucking was certainly her act, yet the act of such an one is not considered as destructive of her right, for which reason it is that if she should happen to kill her inheritee, this would not set aside her right of inheritance.—If, moreover, it should appear that the adult had acted with any sinister view of dissolving the marriage, the husband is in this case empowered to take from her the half dower which he pays to the infant; but not unless she have acted with such a view, even though she were aware of the infant being the wife of her husband. It is recorded from Mohammed, that the husband is authorized to take the infant's half dower from the adult, in either case,—that is to say, whether a dissolution of the marriage may have been her intention or not; but the former (which is the Zahir Rawayet) is the more orthodox opinion, because, although the adult has by her act fixed and rendered binding upon the husband the half dower aforesaid (which had before stood within the possibility of dropping*), and her so doing amounts to a damage, yet she here stands (not as the actual perpetrator, but) as the cause of the damage, since the act of giving her milk to the infant is not the occasion of dissolving the marriage any further than as it induces a consequence of joint cohabitation with a step-mother and step-daughter:—moreover, the annulling of a marriage is not what renders a dower obligatory, but is rather the occasion of its dropping; but the half dower is incumbent, in the manner of a Matat, or present, in compliance with established custom; and the annulling of the marriage is the condition of its becoming incumbent; and in this view the adult is the cause of the damage; and as being the cause only, and not the actual perpetrator, transgression is made a condition of her responsibility, the same as in the case of digging a well,—that is to say, if a person were to transgress, in digging a well, by sinking it in another person's ground, or in the highway, he is responsible for the Deeyat of any one who might happen to fall into it, whereas, if the well were sunk in his own ground, he would not be responsible:—now this transgression is not found in the adult, unless where she is aware of the infant being the wife of her husband, and that her view in suckling it is a dissolution of the marriage; but where she is not aware of that circumstance, or being so, yet gives her milk, not with any view of dissolving the marriage, but rather of preserving the infant from perishing, in neither of these cases is transgression supposed to exist; and, in the same manner, it does not exist, if she knew that the infant is the wife of her husband, but be not aware that her suckling it will occasion a dissolution of the marriage.

OBJECTION.—No regard is paid to ignorance of the law in a Mussulman territory; how, therefore, can ignorance be pleaded in her excuse in the present case?

REPLY.—Regard is here paid to her ignorance, not in order to avert the sentence of the law (which induces responsibility upon her), but solely to avert the construction of intent of dissolution, or of wilful transgression, to which her act might otherwise be liable, and which being thus disproved, she is exonerated from responsibility, as these are the only causes thereof, and neither of them can apply to her.

Evidence to fosterage requires the full

• That is to say, the obligation of which might possibly have been annulled or cancelled by the occurrence of some accident previous to the payment of it, such as the decease of the infant before consummation of the marriage, &c.

number of witnesses.—THE evidence of women alone is not sufficient to establish forsterage; nor can it be established but on the testimony of two men, or of one man and two women.—Imam Malik has said that it may be established on the evidence of one woman, provided she be an Adil, because prohibition is one of the rights of the law, and may therefore be established upon a single information,—as, for instance, where a person purchases flesh meat, and any one bears testimony to its being part of a Majoosec sacrifice, in which case prohibition is established with respect to it.—The argument of our doctors is that the establishment of prohibition in marriage is in no respect different from the extinction of a right of possession; and the annulling of a right of possession cannot take place but upon the evidence of two men, or of one man and two women:—contrary to the case of flesh meat, as the prohibition to the eating may be established without affecting the proprietor's right of possession, it still remaining his property under that prohibition:—the prohibition of this article, therefore, appears to be merely a matter of religion, and in which, consequently, a single evidence suffices.

CHAPTER I.

OF TALAK-AL-SONNA, OR REGULAR DIVORCE*.

Distinctions of divorce.—DIVORCE is of three kinds;—FIRST, the Ahsan, or most laudable;—SECOND, the Hoosn, or laudable (which are the distinctions of the Talak-al-Sonna); and THIRD, the Biddat, or irregular.

Talak Ahsan.—THE Talak Ahsan, or most laudable divorce, is where the husband repudiates his wife by a single sentence, within a Tohr (or term of purity)[†], during which he has not had carnal connexion with her, and then leaves her to the observance of her Edit, or prescribed term of probation. This mode of divorce is termed the most laudable, for two reasons;—FIRST, because the companions of the prophet chiefly esteemed those who gave no more than one divorce until the expiration of the Edit, as holding this to be a more excellent method than that of giving three divorces, by repeating the sentence on each of the two succeeding Tohrs;—SECONDLY, because in pursuing this method the husband leaves it still in his power, without any shame, to recover his wife, if he be so inclined, by a reversal of the divorce during her Edit: this method is, moreover, the least injurious to the woman, as she thus remains a lawful subject of marriage to her husband, even after the expiration of her Edit[†], which leaves a latitude in her favour unprobated by any of the learned.

Talak Hoosn.—THE Talak Hoosn, or laudable divorce, is where a husband repudiates an enjoyed wife by three sentences of divorce, in three Tohrs. Imam Malik asserts that this method classes with the Biddat, or irregular, and that no more than one divorce is admitted as unexceptionable, because, as being in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure, it is only the urgency of release from an unsuitable woman that can give a sanction to divorce; and this urgency is fully answered by a single Tohr. The arguments of our doctors on this topic are twofold;—FIRST, a precept of the prophet delivered to Ebn Amir, “One thing required by the SONNA is that ye wait for the TOHR, and pronounce a divorce in each TOHR;”—SECONDLY, the propriety of a divorce rests merely upon the proof of the urgency, and not upon the establishment of the actual urgency itself, that being a matter concealed and unascertainable [but by virtual proof,] and the act of proceeding to divorce at a time when the desire of coition with the woman is fresh renewed (to wit, at the recommencement of her Tohr), is a proof of the urgency; opposition to Talak Biddat, which signifies a novel, unauthorized, or heterodox mode of divorce: the terms regular and irregular are here adopted, as being the most familiar.

* Meaning the space which intervenes between the menstrual fluxes.

† Contrary to any other mode of divorce, as a wife repudiated in any other way cannot be again married to her first husband, unless she be previously married to, and divorced by, another man.

* Talak-al-Sonna literally means “divorce according to the rules of the Sonna,” in and the repetition of divorce at the two subsequent returns of the Tohr amounts to no more than a repetition of the proof, and is therefore allowed of. Some of the learned have said that, in this species of divorce, it is most advisable that the husband delay pronouncing the first sentence of it until towards the termination of the Tohr, so as that the Edit may not be too much protracted; but it is evident that the husband should rather pronounce the divorce at the commencement of the Tohr, because, if he were to delay it, he might probably be tempted to have carnal connexion with the woman in the interim, under an intention of divorcing her, and then divorce her after such carnal connexion, which is forbidden.

Talak Biddat, or irregular divorce, is where a husband repudiates his wife by three divorces at once,—(that is, included in one sentence), or, where he repeats the sentence separately, thrice within one Tohr; and if a husband give three divorces in either of those ways, the three hold good, but yet the divorcer is an offender against the law.

SHAFEEI has said that all these three descriptions of divorce are equally unexceptionable and legal, because divorce is in itself a lawful act, whence it is that certain laws have been instituted respecting it: and this legality prevents any idea of danger being annexed to it: moreover, divorce is not prohibited, even during the woman's courses, the prohibition there applying to the protraction of the Edit, and not to divorce.—Our doctors, on the other hand, say that divorce is in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure, as it dissolves marriage, an institution which involves many circumstances as well of a temporal as of a spiritual nature; nor is its propriety at all admitted, but on the ground of urgency of release from an unsuitable wife: and there is no occasion, in order to procure this release, to give three divorces at once, whereas there is an excuse for giving three divorces separately in three Tohrs, as this exhibits repeated proofs of the urgency of it:—and with respect to what Shafei advances, that “the legality of divorce prevents any idea of danger being annexed to it,” we answer that the legality of divorce, in one respect (that is to say, inasmuch as it is a destroyer of subjection), does not admit the idea of its being dangerous, but that, in another respect (to wit, its occasioning the dissolution of marriage, which involves concerns both of a spiritual and temporal nature), it must be considered as attended with danger.

THE pronouncing of two divorces within one Tohr comes under the description of Biddat, or irregular, the same as that of three divorces, as already intimated.

A QUESTION has arisen among the learned, whether the pronouncing of a single divorce irreversible within one Tohr be of the description of Biddat or not?—Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, has said,—“Whoever an irreversible divorce, although it be within the Tohr, forsakes the Sonna, as there is no urgent necessity for such a sentence to effect release from the wife, since by the lapse of the Edit that end is obtained;” but again, in the Zeeadat, he says that this method is not to be reprobated, on account of the occasional urgency of immediate release, which by an irreversible divorce is obtained, it not being then suspended upon the lapse of the Edit.

—SONNA [that is, attention to the mode prescribed by the Sonna] in divorce appears in two shapes, adherence to number, and to time; to the former, by restricting the sentence to that of a single divorce reversible, in which the enjoyed and the unenjoyed wife are the same;—and to the latter (in which the enjoyed wife is solely considered), by pronouncing the divorce in a Tohr during which the husband has not had carnal connexion with her;—because it is the proof of urgency that is regarded; and the act of proceeding to a divorce at a time when the desire of coition with the woman is fresh renewed (as at the recommencement of her Tohr), is the best proof of such urgency; for during the actual time of the courses the woman is not an object of desire, and in a Tohr where she has been enjoyed, desire is lessened towards her. With respect to an unenjoyed wife, the Tohr and the courses are equal,—that is to say, the pronouncing of divorce upon her whilst she is in the latter situation is not irregular, nor reprobated, any more than whilst in the former. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, he considering an unenjoyed wife in the same point of view as one enjoyed:—but our doctors observe that the desire of coition, with respect to an unenjoyed woman, is ever fresh, and is not lessened by the circumstance of her courses, so long as the husband's object (namely, coition), remains unobtained; whereas, with respect to an enjoyed wife, desire is renewed upon the Tohr.

de adherence to the Sonna in repudiating a wife not subject to the courses.—If the wife be a person who, from extreme youth or age, is not subject to the courses, and her husband be desirous to repudiate her by three divorces in the regular way, he is first to pronounce a single sentence of divorce upon her, and at the expiration of one month another, and in like manner a third at the expiration of the next succeeding month; because the term of one month corresponds with a return of the courses, as is mentioned in the KORAN.—It is here to be observed that if the first divorce be given in the beginning of the month, the three months from that period are to be counted by the lunar calendar, and if in the middle of it, by the number of days, with respect both to the completion of divorce and of the Edit.—This is the rule with Hancefa.—The two disciples maintain that the second and third months are to be invariably counted by the lunar calendar, the deficiency of the first month to be taken from the fourth succeeding month, so as to complete it. And it is also to be observed that it is lawful for the husband to divorce this wife immediately after carnal connexion, without the intervention of any time between the embrace and the divorce.—Ziffer says that the husband ought to allow the intervention of a month, because that term corresponds with a return of the courses, and also, because in consequence of the embrace desire becomes languid, and is not renewed until after the lapse of some time.—Our doctors argue that there can be no apprehension of pregnancy with respect to the woman in question; and divorce, after the carnal embrace, in the case of a woman who is subject to the courses, is not reprobated on any other account than as it induces a possibility of pregnancy, which renders the duration of her Edit dubious, that of a pregnant woman being determined by her delivery. and, of one not pregnant, by courses; and as to what Ziffer alleges, that “desire becomes languid in consequence of the embrace,” it may be replied, that although this be admitted, yet in the present instance desire is greater than in common cases, as the husband can indulge his carnal appetite with such a wife without any apprehension of her producing children, the support of whom might fall upon him; she therefore is an object of desire to him at all times equally, so that this state [of a woman not being subject to the courses] is the same as the state of actual pregnancy; now it is lawful to divorce a pregnant wife immediately after carnal connexion with her, because no doubt is induced with respect to the duration of her Edit, and the time of pregnancy is a time of desire, as a husband feels desire towards a pregnant wife, either because she produces a child to him, or because the embrace with her does not occasion pregnancy; his desire, therefore, is not lessened towards such a wife by enjoyment.

Or one who is pregnant.—If a man be desirous of repudiating his pregnant wife by three divorces in the regular way [that is, according to the Sonna], he is first to pronounce a single sentence of divorce upon her, and at the expiration of one month another, and in the same manner a third at the expiration of the next succeeding month. This is according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf.—Mohammed and Ziffer say that the Talak-al-Sonna, with respect to a pregnant woman, consists in giving her a single divorce only, because divorce is in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure; moreover, the only rule instituted by the law in effecting a triplicate divorce is, that the husband first pronounces one divorce, and at the expiration of a month, or the passing of the next courses, another, and in the same manner a third at the expiration of the following month, or the passing of the next succeeding courses; now the courses do not occur to a pregnant woman, nor does the lapse of a month stand in place of a return of her courses (as with a woman whose youth or age prevents her having them), her whole period of pregnancy being as one long Tohr; and hence it follows that it is improper to pronounce more than a single sentence, the rule of the Sonna being restrictive to one divorce in one Tohr.—To this Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf reply that, although divorce be in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure, yet it is admitted on the ground of urgency, and the lapse of a month is the proof of that urgency, and is therefore to be regarded here, the same as in the case of a woman whose youth or age prevents her having the courses: the foundation of this is that the period in question is such a time as affords a Fedwal of desire to persons in health and vigour, and therefore the act of divorce being proceeded in at such a season affords proof of the urgency of it, with respect to a pregnant woman, the same as to any other: contrary to a woman whose Tohr is long [that is, by constitution or accident protracted to any unusual length], as the lapse of a month is not a proof of necessity with respect to such an one; this proof of necessity being found in her only on the renewal of the Tohr after the courses, the recurrence of which, with regard to her, is at all times possible, whereas, with regard to a pregnant woman, it is impossible.

Case of divorce pronounced during menstruation.—If a man repudiate his wife during her courses, it is valid; because, although divorce within the term of the courses be disapproved, yet it is lawful, nevertheless, as the disapproval is not on account of any thing essential, but merely because a divorce given during the courses occasions a protraction of the Edit.—This kind of disapproval, or interdict, is termed Nihce-le-glurchee,* and does not forbid legality, whence a divorce given during the courses is valid; but yet it is laudable that the husband reverse it, as it is recorded that the son of Omar having divorced his wife during her courses, the prophet desired Omar to command his son to take her back again; which tradition shows that divorce during the courses is valid, but that reversal is in this case laudable.—This doctrine of the laudability of reversal is maintained by many of our modern doctors; but it is certain that, in this case, reversal is not only laudable, but incumbent, for three reasons; FIRST, in the tradition above quoted, the prophet desires Omar positively “to command his son,” and command is always injunctive;—SECONDLY, the pronouncing of divorce during the courses is an offence, which it is incumbent upon a man to expiate by every means within his power; and this may be effected, in the present instance, by doing away its consequence, namely, the Edit;—THIRDLY, the protraction of the Edit is injurious to the woman, wherefore reversal is incumbent, in order that she may not be subjected to injury:—thus it is indispensably incumbent upon the husband to reverse the divorce, when given during the courses; after which, when she has become purified from her courses, and has again had them, he may then either divorce her on the commencement of her second succeeding Tohr, or suffer her to remain. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this last is what is said in the Mabsoot. Tehavee has said that, if the husband choose, he may regularly divorce his wife on the commencement of the Tohr immediately succeeding the courses in which he had given divorce, and reversed it, as above. Koorokhee says that what is thus mentioned by Tehavee is the doctrine of Hancfa. That which is taken from the Mabsoot is the opinion of the two disciples; and the ground of it is that the regularity of divorce depends upon the intervention of a complete menstrual discharge between every two sentences; and the first of these is defective, on account of divorce having been pronounced in the middle of it, so that as part had previously elapsed, whence it would appear necessary to complete it from the next following return; but it is not lawful to have regard to one part only of the courses, and not to the other: consequently, regard must be had to the next returning courses in toto. --The ground of Tehavee's opinion is that, the divorce, with its effects, having been annulled entirely by the reversal, it is the same as if no divorce whatever had taken place during the woman's courses; and hence it is perfectly regular to pronounce divorce in the Tohr next immediately succeeding.

If a man were to address his wife, saying, "You are divorced thrice, according to the Sonna,"—and he have no particular intention in so doing, then supposing the wife to be one with whom he has had carnal connexion, and also subject to the courses, she becomes once divorced in that and each of the two succeeding Tohrs; and if the husband intended in so saying, either that three divorces should take place collectively upon the instant, or, that a single divorce should take effect at the end of each succeeding month, the divorce, in each instance, takes effect according to his intention, whether she be in her courses or her Tohr at the period of its thus taking effect upon her.—And if she be one whose Edit is calculated by months (such as a woman, for instance, whose courses are stopt through age), and the husband have no particular intention in thus addressing her, in this case a single divorce takes effect upon the instant, another at the expiration of a month, and a third at the expiration of the next succeeding month; because the term of a month corresponds, in such an one, with the Tohr of a woman who is subject to the courses, as was formerly observed; or, if he intended that three divorces should take place collectively upon the instant, the three take place accordingly, in the manner already stated.

But if the husband were only to say, "You are divorced according to the Sonna," omitting the word "thrice,"—in this case the intention of three divorces collectively is not efficient. The proofs and arguments upon this passage are all drawn from the Arabic, and derive their weight from certain peculiarities in that idiom.

Section.

Of the persons who are competent to pronounce divorce.—THE divorce of every husband is effective, if he be of sound understanding, and mature age; but that of a boy, or a lunatic, or one talking in his sleep, is not effective, for two reasons:—FIRST, because the prophet has said, "Every divorce is lawful, excepting that of a boy or a lunatic;"—SECONDLY, because a man's competency to act depends upon his possession of a sound judgment, which is not the case with infants, or lunatics:—and one talking in his sleep is the same, in this point, as a boy or a lunatic, since his words in this case are not the result of a deliberate option.

A divorce pronounced by compulsion, is effective.—THE divorce of one acting upon compulsion, from threats, is effective, according to our doctors.—Shafei maintains that it is not effective, because a person who is compelled has no option, and no formal act of law is worthy of regard unless it be purely optional: contrary to the case of a jester, who, in mentioning divorce, acts from option, which is the cause of its validity.—Our doctors, on the other hand, allege that the person here mentioned pronounces divorce under circumstances of complete competency [maturity of age and sanity of intellect], the result of which is that divorce takes effect equally with that of a person uncompelled, for with him necessity* is the reason of its efficiency; and the same reason applies to the divorce of a compelled person, as he is also under necessity of divorce, in order that he may be released from the apprehension of that with which he was threatened by the compeller.—The foundation of this is that the man alluded to has the choice of two evils; one, the thing with which he is threatened or compelled; and the other, divorce upon compulsion; and viewing both, he makes choice of that which appears to him the easiest, namely, divorce; and this proves that he has an option, though he be not desirous that its effect should be established, or, in other words, that divorce should take place upon it; nor does this circumstance forbid the efficiency of his sentence; as in the case of a jester; that is to say, if a man pronounce a divorce in jest, it takes effect, although he be not desirous that it should; and so likewise the divorce of one who is compelled.

* Namely, the necessity of separation from a wife who may be odious or disagreeable to him.

Or in a state of inebriety, is valid.—If a man pronounce a divorce whilst he is in a state of inebriety from drinking any fermented liquor, such as wine, the divorce takes place. Koorokhee and Tehavce hold that divorce ought not to take place in this case; and there is also an opinion recorded from Shafei to the same effect. The argument upon which they maintain this doctrine is that reality of intention is connected with the exercise of reason, which is suspended during intoxication from wine; in the same manner as where a person has taken any allowed but inebriating medicine, such as laudanum, in which case a divorce pronounced would not take effect, and so in this case also. But to this our doctors reply that, in the case now under consideration, the suspension of reason being occasioned by an offence, the reason of the speaker is supposed still to remain, whence it is that his sentence of divorce takes effect, in order to deter him from drinking fermented liquors, which are prohibited. But yet if a man were to drink wine to so great a degree as to produce a delirium or inflammation of the brain, thereby suspending his reason, and he in that situation pronounce divorce, it will not take effect.

And so also that of a dumb person.—THE divorce of a dumb person is effectual, if it be expressed by positive and intelligible signs, because signs of the dumb are authorized by custom, and are therefore admitted to stand in the place of speech, in the present instance in order to answer the necessity of him who makes them. The various species of signs used by the dumb in divorce shall be set forth hereafter.

Of divorces in respect to free slaves.—THE utmost number of divorces, with respect to a female slave, is two, whether her husband be a slave or free: and the same with respect to a free woman is three.—Shafei has said that, in the number of divorces, respect is to be had to the state of the man; that is to say, if the husband be free he is empowered to pronounce three divorces, although his wife be a slave; whereas, if he be a slave, he is not authorized to give more than two divorces, although his wife should be a free woman, the prophet having said “In divorce the state of the HUSBAND is to be regarded, and in the EDIT that of the WIFE:”—moreover, personal consequence is an essential circumstance in all points of authority, and that appertains to a freeman in a higher degree than to a slave, whence his authority is most extensive.—The arguments of our doctors are twofold upon this topic;—FIRST, a precept of the prophet, declaring, “The divorces of a female slave are TWO, and her EDIT is TWO courses;”—SECONDLY, it is the woman who is the subject of legality, and this legality entitles her to benefits; but slavery entitles only to half of these benefits; hence it follows that the divorce of a female slave should not exceed one and a half, but such subdivision of it being impossible, her divorces extend to two.—As to the saying of the prophet quoted by Shafei, that “in divorce the state of the husband is to be regarded,” it means no more than that the efficiency of divorce proceeds from him.

A master cannot divorce the wife of his slave.—THE divorce of a slave upon his wife takes place; but that of a master upon the wife of his slave is of no effect, because the matrimonial propriety being a right of the slave, the relinquishment of it rests with the slave, not with his master.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE EXECUTION OF DIVORCE.

(in respect to the execution of it) is of two kinds; Sareeh or express, and Kinayat, or by implication:—and first of express divorce.

The manner of express divorce.—TALAK SAREEH, or express divorce, is where a husband delivers the sentence in direct and simple terms, as if he were to say, “I have divorced you,” or “you are divorced,” which effects a Talak Rijai, or divorce reversible,—that is to say, a divorce such as leaves it in the husband’s power lawfully to take back his wife at any time before the expiration of the Edit: and these forms are termed Sareeh, or express, as not being used in any sense but divorce; and it appears in the sacred writings that reversal after an express divorce is lawful.—The intention is not a condition of divorce taking place from these forms, for the same reason as was already assigned, to wit, because they directly express divorce, as not being used in any other sense.—And it is to be observed that a reversible divorce only is effected by these forms, although the intention of the husband be a complete divorce, because his intention is here to effect that upon the instant which the law suspends upon the lapse of the Edit, and is therefore unworthy of regard: and if his intention should be merely to express a delivery from bondage (which the term Talak is occasionally used to imply), and he make a declaration to this effect before the Kazee, it is not admitted, as it disagrees with his apparent design: but yet it is admitted before God, because he intended in those words a meaning which they are capable of bearing: and if his intention be to express a release from bodily labours, his declaration to this effect is not at all admitted, either before the Kazee, or before God, as the word Talak does not bear the construction of release with respect to bodily labour, although it may occasionally bear that construction with respect to bondage: and it is also to be remarked that no more than a single divorce can be effected by these forms, although the intention be more.—Shafei alleges that divorce takes place according to whatever the intention may be.—The proofs on each side are drawn from the Arabic.

Different formulas of express divorce.—If a man say to his wife, "You are [under] divorce," or "You are divorced by divorce," or, "You are divorced according to divorce," without any particular intention, or intending thereby one divorce, or two divorces, a single divorce reversible takes place; and if his intention be three divorces, a triple divorce takes place accordingly.—The proofs are drawn on this occasion from the Arabic.

If a man were to say to his wife (as above), "You are divorced by divorcement," and declare that by the word "divorced" he meant one divorce, and by the word "divorcement" a second divorce, his declaration is credited, because each of these words are capable of being construed into an intention of effecting divorce, and hence two reversible divorces take place, provided the woman has been enjoyed by him.

If a man apply divorce to the whole woman, by saying (for instance), "You are divorced," in this case divorce takes place, on account of its application to its proper subject, namely, the woman, the relative "You" implying the woman's person in toto: and the rule is the same where he applies it to any particular part or member, from which the whole person is necessarily understood, as if he were to say, "your neck," or "your trunk," or "your head," or "your body," or "your vulva,"—"is divorced,"—for by such words the whole person is implied, the terms trunk and body bearing that sense evidently, and the others in common use; and they moreover occur, both in the traditions, and also in the Koran; and, according to one tradition, the term blood may also be used in the same sense. Divorce takes place also where it is applied to any general portion of the wife, as if the husband were to say to her, "your half," or "your third, is divorced,"—because any general portion is a proper subject of all acts, such as sale, purchase, and so forth, and is therefore equally so of divorce; but the subject in question (to wit, the woman) is incapable of division, and hence divorce is established upon her in toto, and is not restricted to the portion mentioned.

Divorce when applied to any specific part or member of the body, such as does not (in common use) imply the whole person, is of no effect.—If the husband say to his wife, "your hand," or "your foot, is divorced," divorce does not take place.—Ziffer and Shafei maintain that it does, and the same difference of opinion subsists where the divorce is applied to any other specific member, or organ, such as does not imply the whole person, as the ear or the nose, &c.

—The argument of Ziffer and Shafei is, that those members contribute to the matrimonial enjoyments, such as kissing, touching, and so forth, and whatever is of this description, as being a subject of the laws of marriage, is a proper subject of divorce, and as such, when divorce is applied to it, it takes place upon it, and consequently extends to the whole person, in the same manner as where it is applied to any general portion, such as an half, and so forth: contrary to the application of marriage, to any specific member, such as the hand or the foot, in which case the marriage is not valid, because it is not conceivable that legality should be established in that particular member, and extend, in consequence, to the whole person, as the illegality existing in the other members exceeds the legality in that particular member,—whereas the reverse holds in divorce.—To this our doctors reply, that a specific member, such as the hand or foot, not being in itself a proper subject of divorce, the application of that to it is null, the same as to a woman's spittle, or to her nails, the ground of which is that the subject of divorce must be something upon which a bond or connexion may exist (as divorce implies the dissolution of a bond or connexion), and there is no bond upon the hand; for which reason it is that the application of marriage to that part is invalid: contrary to a general portion of the body, which being (with our doctors) a proper subject of marriage, the application of that to it is valid, and it is consequently a proper subject of divorce also. There is a similar difference of opinion where the divorce is applied to the belly or the back: but it is evident that here divorce does not take place, as these parts are never used to imply the whole person.

A partial divorce is complete in its effect.—If a man pronounce upon his wife an half divorce, one divorce takes place, because divorce is not capable of division, and the mention of any portion of a thing of an indivisible nature stands as a mention of the whole: and the fourth, or fifth, or any other proportion of divorce, is analogous to the half, in what is now said, for the same reason.

Equivocal.—If a husband say to his wife, "you are under three moieties of two divorces," three divorces take place, because the half of two is one, and consequently three moieties of two divorces amount to three.—And if he were to say, "you are under three moieties of one divorce," some are of opinion that two divorces take place, this amounting to one and a half; but others allege that it produces three divorces, because every moiety, amounts to one complete divorce, on the principle already stated: various doctors agree in approving the former opinion.

And indefinite form.—If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce, from one to two," or "between one and two," in this case one divorce takes place; and if he were to say,—"from one to three," or "between

* These and the succeeding forms of divorce, literally rendered, are most of them apparently unintelligible, or absurd: they are each, however, to be considered as having some peculiar force or effect, which it is impossible to express, or to convey an idea of, in translation.

one and three," two divorces take place.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa.—The two disciples assert that by the first form two divorces take place, and by the last three.—Ziffer, on the other hand, maintains that by the first form no divorce takes place, and by the second one divorce only, this being conformable to analogy, because the boundaries of a thing are not included in the contents; as for example, where a man says, "I have sold such a piece of ground, from this wall to that wall," in which case neither wall is included in the sale.—The ground of opinion of the two disciples is that, in such a mode of speaking, the whole is by custom understood, as for example, where one man says to another, "take, of my property, from one Dirhm to a hundred," which implies the whole hundred." The argument of Haneefa is that, in this indefinite mode of expression, no particular number is implied, any more than where a man, in discourse, says, "my age is from sixty to seventy years," or "between sixty and seventy," by which he means some indefinite term between these two: and in reply to the argument of the two disciples, it is sufficient to observe that the whole is to be understood only where the expression relates to a thing of an indifferent nature, as in the instance cited by them; but divorce is in itself a dangerous and disapproved procedure: and to what is advanced by Ziffer it may be answered, that it is necessary that the first boundary be in existence, so as that the second may bear a relation to it; but in the present case the first boundary (to wit, divorce), is not in being, nor can be so, unless by divorce taking place, which it accordingly does of this necessity: contrary to the case of sale, cited by Ziffer as apposite to this, because there both boundaries (understood by the two walls) do actually exist previous to the sale. It is to be observed on this occasion, that if the husband, speaking in the second form, intend only a single divorce, it is admitted with God, as he may be allowed to intend whatever construction the words will bear, but it is not admitted with the magistrate as being contrary to apparent circumstances.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced once by twice," intending the multiple or multiplied product thereof, or not having any particular intention, a single divorce reversible takes place. Ziffer says that two divorces take place, such being the number understood from this mode of speaking in arithmetic; and this opinion is adopted by Hasn-Bin-Zeead. But if, in speaking as above, he intend to say, "you are divorced once and twice," three divorces take place accordingly, because this way of speaking is capable of that construction, as the word fee [by] has also [in the Arabic] the sense of and: if, however, the woman be unenjoyed, no more than one divorce takes place, as in the case where a man says to his unenjoyed wife, "you are divorced once and twice," but if he intend to say, "you are divorced once with twice," three divorces take place, although she should be unenjoyed;—and if he mean to express himself in a sense which implies that the one is contained in the other, as if he were to say, "you are divorced once in twice," one divorce takes place, the superadded words in twice being held to be redundant, because divorce is incapable of being a container.*

If a husband say to his wife, "you are divorced twice by twice," intending the multiple, yet no more than two divorces take place. With Ziffer three divorces take place, because from this multiplying mode of expression is to be understood four divorces, and three consequently take place, as being the greatest lawful number.

—If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced from this place to Syria," a single divorce reversible takes place. Ziffer says that it occasions a complete or irreversible divorce, because, where he thus gives the divorce a description of length, it is the same as if he were to say, "you are under a long divorce," and if he were to say so, a complete divorce would take place, and consequently the same in the present instance. Our doctors, on the other hand, allege that the sentence does not affix any description of length to the divorce, but rather the reverse, because when divorce takes effect in any one place it does so in all.

If a man were to say, "you are under divorce in Mecca," divorce takes place upon her immediately in every country; and so also if he were to say "you are divorced in this house," because divorce is not restricted to any particular place;—and if he were to intend, by thus speaking, that "she shall become divorced if ever she should enter Mecca, or that house," his declaration to this effect is admitted with God, but not with the Cawzee, as the tenor of his words apparently contradict this construction.

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce when you enter Mecca," in this case no divorce takes place until she enter Mecca, he having suspended the divorce upon that circumstance.—And if he say, "you are divorced in entering the house," this means "if you enter the house," because the containing particle frequently stands expressive of a condition, and not being applicable here in its containing sense, it necessarily assumes the meaning of a condition.

Section.

Of Divorce with a Reference to Time.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced this day to-morrow," or "you are

* The words in the original are. "Ante Taliktoon wahdetoon fee Sinnatinee," which is an indefinite or equivocal mode of expression, as the word fee (among various other senses) bears those of by, with, or and, as well as in, which accounts for the distinctions here made, and the latitude permitted.

divorced to-morrow this day," in the first instance divorce takes place on the instant, and, in the second, on the beginning of the morrow: and the second word is in both cases redundant; because, where he first says "this day," divorce takes place immediately on the present day, and consequently is not procrastinated to the morrow,—and, on the other hand, where the first says "to-morrow," the divorce is procrastinated to the morrow, and does not take place immediately on the present day; the second word is therefore redundant in both cases.

WHERE a man says to his wife, "you are divorced to-morrow," the divorce takes place on the dawn of the next morning; and if he should intend by the word "to-morrow" the end of the morrow, it is so admitted with Gon, but not with the Kazee, because this contradicts appearances: but if he were to say, "you are divorced in to-morrow," declaring his intention therein to be "at the end of the morrow," it is admitted with the Kazee, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that it is not admitted with the Kazee, although it be so with Gon, because the words to-morrow and in to-morrow are one and the same thing, as the word to-morrow is mentioned in an inclusive sense* in both cases, whence it is that, from the expression "in to-morrow," divorce takes place on the first instant of the ensuing day, where the husband has no particular intention.—The argument of Haneefa on this subject is that the husband may be allowed to have intended some such meaning from his expression, because the word in is introduced as a Zif, or particle of containment, which does not require that the whole of the container should be understood from it; and the reason why divorce takes place, in the present instance, from the beginning of the ensuing day, where the husband had no particular intention, is, that as nothing appears to the contrary, its commencement is necessarily determined to that period; and regard being thus had to necessity in the determination of it, it follows that if the speaker fix it at the end of the day, this determination must be regarded, à fortiori: contrary to his saying, "you are under divorce to-morrow," (omitting the word in), in which case, if he should have intended the end of to-morrow, his declaration to that effect is not admitted with the Kazee, because the word to-morrow, without in, occasions the woman to fall under the description of being divorced for the whole of to-morrow, which cannot be effected but by the divorce taking place upon her in the beginning of the day; and consequently the end of the day, in this case, contradicts appearances.

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce yesterday," and it should so be that he was married as this day, divorce does not take place at all, because he has here referred divorce to a period in which he was not competent to pronounce it, and therefore his divorce is nugatory, the same as if he were to say, "you are under divorce before my existence."—But, in the present case, if he had married her before the time of which he speaks, divorce takes place at the time of his speaking; because, if a man signify a divorce in the preterite form, it is an indication in the present, and hence the divorce takes place accordingly, this expression being an indication of what is now, and not a relation of what is past, as it does not appear that he pronounced any divorce yesterday, so as that he should now give intelligence thereof.†

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce previous to your marriage with me,"—divorce does not take place, because he applies the divorce to a period which forbids it, the same as if he were to say, "you are under divorce in my infancy," or "in my sleep."

If a man say to his wife, "you are under divorce upon my not divorcing you," or "when I do not divorce you," and then remain silent, divorce takes place, because he has here applied it to a time which appears the moment he ceases to speak.—But, if he were to say, "you are under divorce if I do not divorce you," divorce does not take place until near the period of his decease, because here the condition does not become established until life be despaired of.

If a man say to his wife "you are divorced, whilst I do not divorce you, you are divorced,"† she becomes divorced on account of the last repudiation, to wit, "you are divorced."—This is where the last words of the sentence are uninterruptedly connected with the first part of it, and proceeds upon a favourable construction, for analogy would suggest that the first divorce takes place also (to wit, "you are divorced whilst I do not divorce you"), and thus both divorces would take place, provided the woman be enjoyed; and such is the opinion of Ziffer; but the reason for the more favourable construction here, is that it is the intention of the vower to fulfil his vow, in such a manner that he may not be forsworn, which is impossible in the present case, unless that portion of time which may enable him to pronounce the divorce be excepted from his speech, "you are divorced whilst I do not divorce you;" and being thus excepted, divorce takes place, on account of the words which follow. Cases

* This is an Arabic mode of expression, implying no more than that here the particle in is understood

† The reasoning here turns solely upon certain idiomatical peculiarities in the construction of the Arabic language, in which the preterite is frequently adopted, by the law, in a creative sense. (See Book II., Chap. I.)

correspondent to this occur in the Book of Eiman.

If a man say to a strange woman, "you are under divorce the day upon which I marry you," and he afterwards marry her in the night, she is divorced; because by day is sometimes meant the daytime, and this sense alone it bears where it relates to a matter of continuance (such as fasting, for instance), and sometimes it is meant to express time in general, which sense it bears where it relates to a transient or momentary transaction, and of this nature is the act of divorce; and consequently by the word day, in the present case, is to be understood time generally, applying equally to day and night both.—But if the husband were to say that by day he meant the daytime, and not time generally, his declaration is admitted with the Kaze, as he may be allowed to have intended that construction which is applicable to the word day, since, according to custom, day applies to the daylight, and night to darkness.

Section.

If a husband say to his wife, "I am divorced from you," by this nothing is established, although divorce be the intention: but if he were to say, "I am separated from you," or "I am prohibited to you," intending divorce, she becomes divorced.—Shafci holds that divorce takes place in the former instance also, where such is the intention, because the matrimonial right of possession is equally participated by the husband and the wife, inasmuch that the latter is entitled to demand coition of the former, and the former to demand admission to coition from the latter, and the legality of the carnal enjoyment also appertains equally to both; and divorce being used for the purpose of dissolving the right, and the legality, the application of it to the husband holds good, as well as to the wife, and consequently divorce takes place under the first of the above forms, as well as under the second or third.—The argument of our doctors is that divorce is used for the removal of restraint, and this is found in the woman, but not in the man (whence it is that a married woman cannot go out of the house): and admitting that divorce were used for the purpose of dissolving the matrimonial right of possession (as advanced by Shafci), it may be replied that the husband is the possessor of the wife and the wife possessed of the husband (whence the woman is called the married, and the man the marrier), and consequently possession applies to the woman: contrary to separation or prohibition, the first of these being a total dissolution of connexion, and the second of legality, both of which equally appertain to each of the parties; and hence the application of them to either is equally forcible, whereas that of divorce is of no force except when applied to the wife.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced once or not," divorce does not take place. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that the same is said in the Jama-Sagheer; nor is any difference of opinion recorded there. This is what is said by Haneefa, and in one place by Abou Yoosaf. According to Mohammed (with whom Abou Yoosaf in another place coincides) a single divorce reversible takes place; and in the book of divorce in the Mabsoot it is recorded that, where the husband says to his wife, "you are divorced once or nothing," a single divorce reversible takes place, according to Mohammed: now between this and the preceding form there is no sort of difference, and consequently, if the case cited in the Jama-Sagheer be the opinion of all the doctors, it follows that there are two opinions recorded from Mohammed upon this point.—The argument of the latter is that the number is rendered dubious on account of the particle of doubt "or" intervening between the word "once" and the negative "not," wherefore regard to the former drops, and his words remain, "you are divorced:" contrary to a case where he says, "you are divorced or not," in which instance divorce does not take place, since in this last case the doubt exists with respect to divorce itself.—The arguments of Haneefa are drawn from the Arabic idiom.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced after my death," or "after your death;" no consequence whatever ensues from this expression, because, in the first instance, he has applied the divorce to a time which forbids it, since a husband is not competent to the execution of divorce after death; and, in the second, the woman no longer remains a fit subject of it; and both these circumstances are essential to a legal divorce.

Separation takes place upon either party becoming possessed of the other as a slave.—

If a husband become the proprietor of his wife [as a slave] either wholly or in part, or a wife the proprietor of her husband, separation takes place between them, possession by bondage and possession by matrimony being irreconcilable;—in the latter instance, because, if separation were not to take place, it would follow that the wife is at once the possessor and the possessed (she falling under the latter description by virtue of marriage);—and, in the former instance, because possession by matrimony is established of necessity, and when the husband becomes actual possessor of his wife's person, this necessity ceases, and consequently possession by matrimony also.

Or upon a husband purchasing his wife.

—If a man purchase his own wife [as a slave], and afterwards divorce her, divorce does not take place, because without the continuance of marriage it cannot exist, and in the present case the marriage has ceased in every shape whatever, since it does not continue even with respect to Edit; and in the same manner, when a wife becomes possessor of her husband, either wholly or in part, if the latter were to divorce her, his divorce does not take effect, because in this case also the marriage has ceased, for the reasons before assigned.—Mohammed says that in the latter case divorce holds good, because the woman is enjoined an Edit, and hence the marriage continues in one shape: contrary to a case where the husband purchases his wife, for then the marriage totally ceases, because she is not under any obligation of Edit with respect to her husband, who is now her proprietor, and has a right to continue carnal cohabitation with her in that capacity.

manumission.—If a man marry the female slave another, and say to her, “you are divorced twice upon the manumission of your owner,” and her owner afterwards emancipate her, the divorce takes place; but it is still in the husband’s power to reverse it, because he has suspended the divorce upon the manumission of the master, and that is the condition of it (as a condition is a thing not existing at present, but the occurrence of which is probable, and in this case actually takes place on manumission, wherefore that is the condition, and divorce is suspended upon it); and divorce taking place after the occurrence of the condition, it follows that it takes place upon her as a free woman, and hence she is not, by two divorces, rendered prohibited* by a rigorous prohibition.

If the person in question were to say to the female slave, his wife, “when to-morrow arrives you are under two divorces,” and her owner were to say, “when to-morrow arrives you are free,” in this case it is not lawful for the husband to marry her again, until such time as she has been married to another man, and repudiated by him, and her Edit (which is three terms of her courses) has elapsed.—This is the doctrine of the two Elders.—Mohammed says that the husband is at liberty to reverse the divorce, since the execution of the divorce is connected with the master’s manumission, because the husband has suspended his repudiation upon the same circumstance on which the master has suspended his manumission; hence the repudiation is (as it were) associated with the emancipation; and freedom being also associated with the emancipation, it follows that the execution of divorce is, of course, associated with freedom, and the divorce takes place upon the slave after freedom (whence it is that the Edit of the woman here treated of is fixed at three terms of her courses, whereas if she were a slave, her Edit would be two terms only), and such being the case, reversal is approved, in this, as well as in the preceding, example. The argument of the two Elders is that the husband has suspended divorce on the same circumstance upon which the master has suspended freedom; and as that takes place upon the woman whilst she is yet a slave, so does divorce likewise; now the slave becomes forbidden [in marriage to her husband], in consequence of two divorces, by the rigorous prohibition, wherefore reversal is not approved; nor does it become lawful to him to marry her till such time as she shall have been possessed by another husband; but this reason does not apply to the Edit, since that is a matter of caution, which is evident from fixing its duration to three terms of the courses, so that the complete fulfilment of it may be indubitable: and with respect to what Mohammed says, that, “as repudiation is connected with freedom, divorce takes place after freedom,” it is of no weight, because, if freedom be connected with manumission, on account of the one being the cause of the other, and if the repudiation and manumission be associated together in such a manner that repudiation and freedom must take place at the same time, we reply that divorce is also associated with repudiation, on account of the latter being the cause of the former; whence it follows, that freedom is associated with divorce, and not that divorce takes place subsequent to freedom.

Comparison, and the descriptions of it.

with the fingers.—If a man say to his wife, “you are under divorce thus,” holding up his thumb and fore and middle finger, three divorces take place, because from the holding up of the fingers number is customarily understood, where the sign is associated with a relative to number; and the word “thus” is of this kind; and the fingers held up are three in number; whence three divorces are to be understood:—and if the sign be given with one finger, a single divorce takes place; if with two fingers, two divorces.—It is to be observed that the sign is to be understood from the fingers which are extended, and not from those which are clenched. Some of our modern doctors, however, say that, if it be made with the back of the fingers, it is understood from those which are clenched.—And if the divorcer were to say, “I have given the signal with the two clenched fingers,” whilst at the same time he had actually given it with the extended fingers, his declaration is credited with God, but not with the Kazee; and so also where he says, “I have intended the signal by the palm of my hand, and not by the fingers;” inasmuch that two divorces take place in the first instance, and one in the last, in a religious view; because signs are made with the slit fingers, or the palm of the hand, as well as with the extended fingers, and hence he may be allowed to have intended to express the number of divorce by signs capable of that construction : but it contradicts appearances.

But not unless it be expressed with a relation to number.—AND in the case now under consideration, if the word “thus” be omitted, and the sign be made with the thumb and fore and middle finger, yet one divorce only takes place, because the sign is not associated with the relative, and hence the words only remain, to wit, “you are divorced” from which one divorce only results.

Divorce pronounced with an expression of vehemence is irreversible in its effect.—If a man give to the divorce which he is pronouncing a description of particular vehemence or amplification, as if he were to say, “you are divorced irreversibly,” or “you are divorced to a certainty,” an irreversible divorce takes place, whether the wife whom he so addresses may have been enjoyed or not. —Shafei says that the divorce is reversible where she has been enjoyed, because reversal during Edit, after divorce from a wife already enjoyed, is sanctioned by the precepts of the law, and bringing it under the description of irreversibility is contrary to them ; thus a husband is not at liberty to pronounce, upon an unenjoyed wife, a divorce irreversible ; the word “irreversibly,” therefore, is nugatory on this occasion, as much as if he were to say, “you are divorced, with his condition, that no right of reversal remains to me.” The argument of our doctors on this point is, that the man has pronounced the divorce under a description which it is capable of bearing, because divorce takes place irreversibly upon a wife unenjoyed (and also upon any other, at the expiration of the Edit) ; and such being the case, the divorce takes place in this case irreversibly upon an enjoyed wife, the same as upon one unenjoyed, the husband having, by his description, specified a circumstance which is really applicable to divorce. And with respect to the case of reversal being mentioned as an additional condition (as cited by Shafei in support of his doctrine), it is not admitted ; because there also a divorce irreversible takes place, where it is pronounced either without intention, or with the intention of two divorces ; but where three divorces are intended, that number must take place, as irreversibility bears the construction of three divorces.

If a man say to his wife, “you are divorced irreversibly,” or “you are divorced to a certainty,” and intend by his words “you are divorced,” to express one divorce, and by the additional words “irreversibly,” or “to a certainty,” another divorce, two divorces irreversible take place, as these expressions are of themselves capable of effecting divorce.

If a husband say to his wife, “you are under a most enormous divorce,” a divorce irreversible takes place, because divorce is thus described only with a view to its effect in the immediate dissolution of the marriage, and hence the description of it by enormity is the same as by irreversibility. And it is the same if he were to say, “a most base divorce,” or “the worst kind of divorce ;” and so also if he were to say, “a diabolical divorce, or “an irregular divorce ;” because reversible divorce is restricted to those of the regular description [or Talak-al-Sonna], and consequently all others are of an irreversible nature.—It is recorded as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that, where the husband says, “an irregular divorce,” a divorce irreversible does not follow, unless such be the intention, because irregularity [Biddat] in divorce is of two kinds,—one originating in the circumstance under which divorce is executed (as where it is pronounced upon the wife during her courses),—the other, in the nature of the sentence (as where the husband pronounces the divorce irreversible in direct terms), and hence it is indispensably requisite that the intention be regarded. It is also recorded as an opinion of Mohammed, that from the use of the descriptions irregular or diabolical, a divorce reversible takes place, as divorce may be thus described, not with any view to irreversibility, but merely to the irregularity of the circumstances under which it is pronounced (as where it is pronounced upon the woman during her courses), and hence the divorce is not irreversible, unless such be the intention.

If a man say to his wife, “you are under a divorce like a mountain,” a divorce irreversible takes place, according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf holds that the divorce is reversible, because a mountain is a single thing, and hence the comparison of divorce with a mountain gives the former a description of unity. The argument of the other two sages is, that simile, in divorce, is always used in an amplifying sense ; and amplification implies irreversibility ; whence a divorce irreversible is the effect.

If a man say to his wife, “you are under a most vehement divorce,” or “you are divorced like a thousand,” or “a houseful,” one divorce irreversible takes place, unless his intention be three divorces, in which case three take place accordingly. The divorce is irreversible from the first of these forms, because it is there mentioned under a description of vehemence, which occasions irreversibility, as applying something in its nature decisive, and incapable of recall,—whereas, divorce reversible is capable of recall, and therefore the description of vehement does not apply to it ; and it is irreversible from the second form, because this simile sometimes expresses force, and sometimes number (as it is said, for instance, that such a man is like a thousand, by which it is to be understood that he is possessed of uncommon strength), and hence the intention applies with equal propriety to either sense ; and where no intention exists, the least extensive meaning of the two is adopted, to wit, one, divorce irreversible ; and from the third form, because a house may be filled either by the magnitude of its contents, or by the number, and hence the intention applies with equal propriety to either circumstance; and where no intention exists the least extensive sense is adopted, as above.

Divorce, when pronounced with a simile, is always irreversible.—It is a rule, with Haneefa, that whenever divorce is thus pronounced with a simile, it produces a divorce irreversible, whatever the thing may be with which it is compared, and whether the magnitude of that thing be mentioned or not; it having been before remarked that simile in divorce is always used in an amplifying sense; and amplification implies irreversibility.—Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, holds, that if the magnitude of the subject of simile be mentioned, the divorce is irreversible, but not otherwise, whatever that may be, because a simile may sometimes be introduced merely to express unity; wherefore indefinite comparison is not to be taken in an amplifying sense; but where the magnitude is mentioned, that undoubtedly is to be construed amplification; and hence irreversibility is established.—Again, Ziffer maintains that if the subject of simile be of such a nature as conveys an idea of magnitude, the divorce is irreversible, but otherwise not. Some commentators allege that Mohammed coincides with Haneefa on this point; others, that he agrees with Aboo Yoosaf. The nature of these diversities of opinion is exemplified in a case where a man says to his wife, “you are under a divorce like a needle’s eye,” or “like the size of a needle’s eye,” or “like a mountain,” or “like the size of a mountain;” for under the first of these forms the divorce is held to be irreversible by Haneefa alone; under the second it is so with Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf, and not with Ziffer; and under the third it is so with Haneefa and Ziffer, and not with Aboo Yoosaf; but under the fourth form it is irreversible with them all.

If a man says to his wife, “you are repudiated by a heavy divorce,” or “by a broad,” or “by a long divorce,” one divorce irreversible takes place: because a thing of which the repudiation is impracticable is called heavy, and an irreversible divorce is of this kind, inasmuch as the repudiation of it is difficult; and with respect to those things of which the repudiation is difficult, it is common to say, “they are long and broad”—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the divorce thus occasioned is reversible, because the descriptions of difficulty, length, or breadth, do not apply to divorce, and are therefore nugatory. And if the man should, by any of these sentences, intend three divorces, it is approved, because separation is divided into two kinds, the light and heavy, so that when the heavy (which is three divorces) is particularly specified, it is held to be efficient.

Section.

*Of Divorce before Cohabitation.

Three divorces take place upon an unen-

* Divorce pronounced upon a woman before cohabitation is in all cases complete and joyed wife when they are pronounced, but only the first when they are pronounced separately.—WHEN a man divorces before cohabitation, by saying to her, “you are divorced thrice,” three divorces take place upon her, because he has here given three collectively; but if he pronounce the three separately, saying, “you are divorced,—divorced,—divorced,” one divorce irreversible takes place from the first, but nothing from the second or third, because each repetition of the word “divorced” is a separate execution of divorce; and the first of them having already rendered the woman decisively and irreversibly divorced, it follows that the second and third cannot take effect upon her. And it is the same where he says, “you are divorced once and again” (where a single divorce takes place), because the woman becomes completely divorced by the first part of the sentence.

If a man say to his unenjoyed wife, “you are divorced once,” and the woman should happen to die before the word “once” be pronounced, in this case divorce does not take place, because he has here associated the number with the divorce, which consequently ought to take place accordingly; but the woman dying before the number is mentioned, no subject of divorce remains at the time when it should take place, and hence the execution of it is null; and so also, where he says, “you are divorced twice” or “thrice.”

If a man say to his unenjoyed wife, “you are divorced once before once,” or “once, and, after that, again,” a single divorce takes place; but if he were to say, “you are divorced once, and previous thereto once,” two divorces take place; and so also if he were to say, “you are divorced once after once.” The proofs are all drawn, in this case, from the Arabic idiom. And if the man say, “you are divorced once with once,” or “once along with once,” two divorces take place, because of the associating particle with, which makes the sentence appear as of two divorces collectively. Aboo Yoosaf says that, under the second form, one divorce only takes place: his proof is drawn from the Arabic idiom. In all these instances it is to be remarked, that two divorces would take place upon an enjoyed wife.

If a man say to his unenjoyed wife, “if you enter the house you are divorced once and again,” and she afterwards enter the house, a single divorce only takes place upon her, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that two divorces take place. But if he were to say, “you are divorced once and again, if you enter the house,” and she afterwards enter it, two divorces take place upon her, according to all. And if he declare the same sentence, with a variation in the construction of it, thus, “you are di-irreversible. An attention to this rule is necessary to the understanding of several cases in this section.

voiced once,—and again if you enter the house," Koorokhee has said that here also there is a difference of opinion, one divorce only taking place with Haneefa, and two with the two disciples. Abou Lays, however, observes that here one divorce only takes place, according to all the doctors, as under this construction the last member of the sentence is utterly distinct and separate from the first, and this is approved.

In implied divorce.—THE second kind of divorce, namely Talak-Kinayat, or divorce by implication, is where a man repudiates his wife (not in express terms), but by the mention of something from which divorce is understood; and divorce does not take place from this but by intention or circumstantial proof, because the implication is not used to express divorce alone, since it may mean divorce, and also something else, and hence intention or circumstantial proof are requisite to determine the construction in which it is to be taken.

In implied divorce are three forms which effect a reversible divorce.—THE compiler of the Hedaya observes that implication is of two kinds. THE FIRST is that from which a single divorce reversible takes place; and this consists of three forms of words, to wit,—“Count!”—“Seek the purification of your womb!”—“You are single!”—of the FIRST, because to count means enumeration, and hence the word “count!” bears two constructions, one, “count! (the courses that are incumbent upon you);” and the other, “count! (the blessings of Almighty God);” and if the speaker intend the former meaning, divorce is the ascertained construction of the word, in virtue of such his intention; and here the divorce takes place, of necessity, from his having desired her to count her courses, which order is of no force except where he has divorced her, because previous to the divorce, the counting of her courses was not incumbent upon her, and hence it is the same as if he had said, “you are divorced, and count!” And as this necessity is sufficiently answered by a reversible divorce, a reversible divorce accordingly takes place. And of the SECOND, because “seek the purification of your womb!” may either mean, “see that your womb be free from progeny, in order to your getting another husband” (since this expressly applies to the same thing as is designed by the preceding word “count,” and therefore may, in the present case, stand instead of it), or it may mean, “see that your womb be free from progeny, in order that I may divorce you;” and where the husband intends the former meaning, a divorce reversible takes place, the same as in the preceding case. And of the THIRD, because “you are single!” may either mean, “you are repudiated by a single divorce” (and where such is the intention, a single divorce reversible takes place, as by this form such a divorce is effected), or it may mean, “you are single (having no other along with you);” or “you are single (among women, in beauty, and so forth”). Thus, these words bearing a variety of constructions, intention is essentially requisite to their effect; and it is to be observed that those forms occasion no more than a single divorce, because such forms amount to “you are divorced;” and as where the words “you are divorced” are expressly mentioned, no more than a single divorce takes place, so also, in this case, a single divorce only takes place à fortiori, because mere implication is weaker in its effect than the express mention of anything.*

Seventeen which effect an irreversible divorce.—AND from all other implications of divorce besides those three, where divorce is the husband's intention, a single complete (or irreversible) divorce takes place; or, if he intend three divorces, three divorces take place; or, if two, two divorces; and these expressions of implication of divorce are as follow:—“You are separated!”—“you are cut off!”—“you are prohibited!”—“the reins are thrown upon your own neck!”—“be united unto your people!”—“you are devoid!”—“I give you to your family!”—“I set you loose!”—“your business is in your own hands!”—“you are free!”—“veil yourself!”—“be clean!”—“go forth!”—“go to!”—“go!”—“arise!”—“seek for a mate!”—all which expressions are implicative of divorce, as each of them bears a construction either of divorce or otherwise; since “you are separated!” may either mean “you are separated (from me in marriage),” or “you are separated (from your family).” In the same manner, “you are cut off!” may either mean “you are cut off (from marriage),” or “you are cut off (from your family and friends);” and so also “you are prohibited!” may either mean “you are prohibited (in marriage),” or “you are prohibited (to me as a companion because of your evil disposition”). In the same manner, “the reins are thrown upon your own neck!” may either mean “you are at liberty to go where you please (as I have divorced you),” or “you may go (to visit your parents, and so forth); and so also, “be united unto your people!” may either mean “return to your family (as I have divorced you),” or (“as you are unfit for society on account of the badness of your disposition”). “You are devoid,” may, in the same manner, either mean “you are devoid (of marriage),” or “you are devoid (of virtue and religion); and so also, I give you to your family!” may either mean, “I return you to your family (as I have divorced you),” or, “I return you to your family (on account of your evil disposition, in order that you may remain there);” agreeably to the same mode of reasoning, “I set you loose!” may either mean “I set you loose (from the restraint of marriage, as having divorced you)," or, "I set you loose (to go where you please);" so also, "your business is in your own hands," may either have respect to divorce, or to any other circumstance; and "you are free!" may either imply "you are free (from the bond of marriage)," or, "you are free (as not being a slave);" and so also, "veil yourself!" may either mean "veil yourself (from me as I have divorced you)," or, "veil yourself (that you may not be seen by a stranger);" in the same manner, "be clean!" may either mean, "ascertain whether your womb be free from seed, that you may be enabled to marry with another man," or, "that the descent of a child begotten upon you may be known;" and so also, "go forth!" may either mean, "go forth (as I have divorced you)," or, "go forth (to visit your parents);" and, "go to!"—"go!"—"arise!" may either signify, "go to (and so forth) as I have divorced you," or, "go to (and so forth) and do not provoke me to divorce you;" so also, "seek for a mate!" may either mean, "seek for a husband, as I have divorced you," or, "seek for a proper companion to sit with you:" since, therefore, all those expressions admit the construction either of divorce or otherwise, the intention is essential to their effect, except where the husband uses them in reply to a requisition of divorce made by his wife, in which case the Kazee is to decree a divorce, but yet it does not exist as a divorce between the husband and God, unless such was his intention.*

The compiler of the Hedaya observes that Kadooree has not made any distinction whatever between these expressions in divorce: on the contrary, he has said, "from all those expressions, when used in reply to a requisition of divorce, a divorce takes place, independent of the intention, in a legal view, but not in a religious view," whereas it is not so, this rule being confined to such expressions as are incapable of being construed into a denial of the requisition of divorce.

It is to be observed as a rule, that there are three possible situations in which the person making use of these expressions may stand; FIRST, a general situation, that is, where he is neither swayed by anger, nor by any requisition of divorce, but acts from an unbiassed volition; SECONDLY, where divorce is the subject of discourse at the time of speaking (as, for instance, where it is demanded of him by his wife); THIRDLY, where he is under the impulse of anger. The expressions of implication are also of three kinds:—FIRST, those which equally bear a construction either of denial or assent,—SECONDLY, those which can be construed into assent only;—and, THIRDLY, those which may be construed either into assent, or into exclamations of contumely and reproach; and, in the first of these situations, divorce does not take place from any of those expressions, but by intention; and if the husband declare that he had no such intention, his declaration is to be credited, because they all bear a double construction, and hence the intention is necessary to establish the effect; and, in the second situation, divorce takes place independent of the intention in a legal view, and the declaration of the husband is not to be credited, where he has used expressions bearing a construction of assent only; which are as follow:—

"You are disengaged!"

"You are separated!"

"You are cut off!"

"You are prohibited!"

"Count!"

"Your business is in your own hands!"

"Choose."

The reason of which is, that the evident meaning of the husband, in using them in reply to a requisition of divorce, is divorce, as they do not bear a construction of denial; but if, in this situation, the husband use any of these expressions which may be construed equally into denial or assent, divorce does not take place, but by intention; and the declaration of the husband, with respect to his intention is to be credited. The expressions alluded to are as follow:—

"Go!"

"Get up!"

"Veil yourself!"

"Get out!" and so forth;

because these words may all be construed into denial of the request: and as the denial of a request is a circumstance less forcible than the act of divorce, they are rather to be taken in the former sense; but yet, as they also bear a construction of assent, they occasion divorce, where such is the intention. Those expressions may be construed into a denial of the request, on account that, "Go!" may mean, "quit thus speaking;" and, in like manner, "Get up!" may mean, "Be gone! and do not talk thus;" and the same of "Veil yourself!" as a direction to put on the veil sometimes implies an order to go away; wherefore it may imply on this occasion, "go away, and leave off speaking in this manner," and the same also of, "get out!"—but, in the third situation, divorce does not take place without the intention of the speaker, from the use of any expression of implication, except such as may be equally construed into assent, and into exclamations of contumely and reproach; and those are the three following:—

"Count!"

"Choose!"

"Your business is in your own hands!"* from all of which, when used in anger, divorce takes place in point of law, independent of intention; and the declaration of the

* That is to say, although divorce take place in point of law from the judicial decree, yet in foro conscientie the man must continue to hold himself married, inasmuch that he cannot, without sin, marry another woman, in lieu of her who is thus divorced. This is the distinction between law and religion in divorce throughout.

husband, denying such intention, is not to be credited, because the circumstance of anger proves the intention to be divorce.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoozaf that if the husband were, in anger, to say, “I have no property in you!” or, “I have no control over you!” or, “I give you your own way!” or, “I have separated from you!” or “join yourself to your people!” His declaration is credited, even where he denies having intended divorce, because these expressions may all be construed into exclamations of contumely or reproach, as well as of divorce; as his words, “I have no property in you!” may mean, “because you are so base that you are incapable of being considered as a property;” and, in the same manner, his words, “I have no control over you!” may mean, “because of the wickedness and stubbornness of your disposition;” and so also, “I give you your own way!” may mean, “because I cannot direct you;” and, in like manner, “I have separated from you!” may mean, “because of your vicious disposition.”

WHAT has just been stated, viz., that “where the husband says, you are separated! or, you are cut off! divorce irreversible takes place,” is the opinion of our doctors.—Shafei has said that the divorce occasioned by these words is reversible, because the reason why those expressions occasion divorce is, that they are implications of divorce; whence it is that the intention is a condition of their effect, and also, that the divorce occasioned by them is complete in part of number, the same as in an express divorce, where the husband is authorized to pronounce three divorces, and having given one, his authority remains with respect to two other;—and also, that if he intend three divorces, three take place accordingly; and such being the case, reversal is lawful here in the same manner as in an express divorce, the thing which is implied. The argument of our doctors on this point is, that the act of irreversible divorce has proceeded in this case from a competent person, and is exercised upon a fit subject of it, according to the power by law established over the wife, which enables her husband to put her away in such a manner as that she shall be decisively and irreversibly separated from him; and here the husband is competent to the act of irreversible divorce, as being of sound mind and mature age; and the wife is a fit subject of it, as being lawfully liable to irreversible divorce before cohabitation (and also after it where her husband pronounces it for a compensation); and this power, like many others, is instituted by the law with a view to the convenience of the individual, which sometimes requires a decisive separation to be effected slowly and deliberately (as in divorce reversible), whereas, at other times, it requires that such a separation should take place on the instant, without any continuance of connexion with the subject of it (as in the triple form of divorce), and at other times it also requires separation to be completely effected on the instant, admitting a continuance of connexion with the subject; and it is indispensably necessary that this last species of irreversible separation be also countenanced by the law, in order that the door of reparation may not be closed against the husband if he should repent (that is to say, that it may remain in his power again to marry his wife, without her being previously married to another); and also, in order that the woman's delicacy may be preserved from the effect of a divorce, by the man taking her back without the intervention of marriage with another; and such being the case, divorce irreversible ensues from those expressions. In reply to the assertion of Shafei, we observe that those expressions are not positively implications, since each of them may be used in its own literal sense;—and as to what he further alleges, that “the intention is a condition of their effect” (thence inferring that they are undoubtedly implications of divorce), the inference is not admitted, because the intention is made a condition for the purpose of ascertaining one of two species of separation, and it is thus made a condition for the purpose of ascertaining one of two sorts of a separation, which is a separation from marriage, and not for the purpose of divorce taking place: with respect to what Shafei further advances, that “the divorce occasioned by any of those expressions is incomplete in point of number” (thence inferring that they are implications of divorce), we reply that the paucity of the number of divorces is not on account of those expressions being implications of divorce, but because divorce is established on account of the connexion of marriage becoming dissolved; that is to say, on account of those expressions the tie is dissolved, and divorce signifies the dissolution of a tie, wherefore divorce is necessarily established; the inference, therefore, is that the taking place of divorce, is involved; but not that the aforesaid expressions are implications of divorce:—and with respect to what he further says, that “if the husband intend three divorces from the use of any of those expressions, three take place accordingly” (inferring that they are implications of divorce), we reply that the intention of three divorces from those expressions is approved only as three divorces is one species of separation (for separation is of two species,—the mild and the rigorous*), and, where there is no intention, the least forcible is established. It is to be observed that an intention of two divorces is not approved with our doctors: contrary to the opinion of Ziffer: but this has already been treated of.

* By the mild separation is meant that species of complete divorce which admits of the husband re-marrying his repudiated wife without the necessity of her intermediate marriage with another. By the rigorous separation is meant that sort of complete divorce which does not admit of the man re-marrying his repudiated wife until she shall have been married to, enjoyed, and repudiated by another man. They have been already fully explained.

If a man say to his wife, "count!—count!—count!" and afterwards declare that by the first of these words he meant divorce, and by the others the repetition of the woman's courses [requisite to its completion] his declaration is credited in point of law, as he appears to have intended these last words in their true sense, it being customary for a husband, where he divorces his wife, to desire her to count the courses necessary to the completion of her Edit; and hence apparent circumstances bear evidence to his intention: but if he were to confess that in these last words he had no particular intention, three divorces take place, because, from his intending divorce by the first word, it follows that he repeated it a second and third time, in a situation where divorce is the subject of discourse, and this situation proves his intention in these repetitions to be divorce also; wherefore, if he were to deny this intention, yet he is not credited, circumstances bearing evidence against him: contrary to where he declares that he had no intention of divorce in any of the three words, for there divorce does not take place at all, because circumstances do not tend to disprove his declaration: and contrary, also, to where he declares divorce to be his intention in the third word, but not in either of the two preceding, in which case no more than one divorce takes place, because, as he does not put the construction of divorce upon the two preceding words, it does not appear that divorce was the subject of discourse at the period of his speaking the last. It is to be observed that the declaration of the speaker in denial of his intention is not to be credited, unless it be given upon oath, because he relates what, having passed solely in his own mind, cannot be known to any other person,—and hence he is the Ameen, or inquisitor, with respect to the intelligence he gives; and the declaration of an inquisitor is credited upon oath.

CHAPTER III.

OF DELEGATION OF DIVORCE.

Definition of the phrase.—TAFWEZ AL TALAK, or delegation of divorce, is where the husband delegates or commits the pronouncing of divorce to his wife, desiring her to give the effective sentence, and it is comprehended under three different heads, termed Option, Liberty, and Will.

Section I.

Of Ikhtiyar, or Option.

Delegation by Option confers on the wife a power of divorcing herself; but this right of option is restricted to the precise place or situation in which she receives it.—If a man say to his wife, "choose!" (thereby meaning divorce), or "divorce yourself!" the woman has a power to divorce herself so long as she remains in the precise situation* in which she received it; but if she remove, or turn her attention to anything else, the power thus vested in her is done away, and her option no longer remains, because the exercise of the optional power thus committed to the woman is held, by all the companions, to be restricted to the precise situation in which it is received: and also, because this species of delegation is a transfer of power, not a commission of agency, and to give effect to the former, the reply is required on the spot of declaration, the same as in sale, since all the moments of one situation are accounted as a single moment; but a situation may be altered, sometimes by change of place, at other times by chance of employment, because a situation of eating and drinking (for instance) is not that of disputation; and a situation of business, on the other hand, is neither a situation of eating or drinking, nor of disputation.

And is annulled by her removal.—THE right of option of the woman is annulled upon the instant of her rising from her seat, as that circumstance proves her rejection of it: contrary to the case of a Sillim or a Sirf sale, which does not become null upon the instant of rising or removing, the cause of invalidity there being removal without seisin.

Intention, on the part of the husband, is requisite to constitute a delegation.—AND where the husband thus addresses his wife, an intention of divorce is a condition requisite to the effect (as mentioned in the preceding chapter) because the word "choose!" is one of the implications of divorce, as it is capable of two constructions, by one it desires the woman to choose herself, and by another to choose her clothes, and so forth: and if she choose herself,† a divorce irreversible takes place. Analogy would suggest, in this case, that from choosing herself nothing whatever should ensue, although divorce be the intention of the husband, because he cannot himself effect divorce by the use of such words; that is to say, if he were to say to his wife, "I have chosen myself from you," nothing whatever would follow, and consequently how can he give a delegation of this nature?—But here divorce takes place upon a more favourable construction, for two reasons;—FIRST, all the companions agree that divorce takes place from the use of this expression;—SECONDLY, the husband has it at his option either to continue the marriage with his wife, or to put her away, and hence it follows that he may constitute her his substitute with respect to that rule; and where the woman is thus left to her option, and says "I choose myself," a divorce irreversible takes place, because the woman's choosing of herself cannot be established but by her becoming sole and independent, which can only be the case in irreversible divorce, as, where it is reversible, the husband is at liberty to take her back without her consent at any time during the continuance of her Edit, and thus she would not become sole and independent on the instant, which the nature of the case requires.

* Arab. Majlis.—This term is treated of at large elsewhere.

† This is an idiomatical phrase in the Arabic, signifying that she chooses her liberty from the matrimonial tie.

Under this form a single divorce only takes place, whatever may be the intention.—It is to be observed that, in the case at present under consideration, one divorce only can take place, and not three, although the husband should actually have intended the latter option not being of different descriptions:—contrary to complete separation, for if the husband were to say, "you are completely separated," intending three divorces, the three take place accordingly, where such is his intention, because this complete separation is of two descriptions, the mild and the rigorous, and it follows that intention with respect to one of these holds good.

And, to effect divorce, it is requisite that the personal pronoun be mentioned by one or other of the parties.—It is also to be observed that, where the husband uses the expression "choose!" it is requisite that the personal pronoun self be mentioned either by the husband or the wife, inasmuch that if the husband were to say, "choose!" and the wife answer, "I have chosen," divorce does not take place, because the effect of divorce is established by all the doctors upon the condition of the mention of the personal pronoun by one of the parties; and also, because the pronoun cannot be understood under any circumstances of ambiguity, and these words of the woman bear two constructions: one, that she chooses her husband (which would not occasion divorce); and another, that she chooses her self (which would occasion irreversible divorce); divorce, therefore, does not take place in defect of the pronoun, on account of its ambiguity.

That is, either by the husband, in his declaration.—If a man say to wife, "choose yourself," and she answer, "I have chosen," a divorce irreversible takes place, because the word self here occurs in the words of the husband, and the words of the woman are in reply to him; and hence her words virtually comprehend herself. And, in the same manner, if the husband were to say, "choose an option," and she reply, "I have chosen," a divorce irreversible takes place: the proofs here are drawn from the Arabic.

Or by the wife in her reply.—If a man say to his wife, "choose!" and she reply, "I have chosen myself," divorce takes place, where such was the husband's intention, because the word self here occurs, in the reply given by the woman, and the expression of the husband bears the construction of that which he intended.

And divorce takes place, although her option of it be expressed in the Mozaree or common tense.—If a husband say to his wife, "choose!" and she reply to him in the Mozaree tense [which, in the Arabic, is common to the present and future], saying "I do (or will) choose myself," divorce takes place, on a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest in this case that no divorce takes place, because, if the woman's reply be taken only in the future, it stands as a promise, and bears that construction also, if taken in the present; and hence divorce does not take place, from her answer amounting only to a promise in the former sense, and from its ambiguity in the latter; as if a man were to say to his wife, "divorce yourself," and she were to reply, Atliko Nafsee ["I do (or will) divorce myself"], in which case divorce does not take place, and so in this case likewise: but the reasons for the more favourable construction are twofold:—FIRST, it is recorded that, upon the descent of the passage of the Koran relating to option, viz. "O, MY SON! SAY TO YOUR WIVES, If you desire the life of this world" (to the end),—the prophet said to Aysha, "I have something to mention to you, but do not reply to it until such time as you consult your parents," after which he read to her the above passage, and then gave her an option; and Aysha said, "in such a matter as this I shall not consult my father or mother, but will (or do) choose God and his prophet," which words the prophet considered as a reply, importing, "I do choose;"—SECONDLY, the word Akhtarto ["I do (or will) choose myself"], expresses the present literally, and the future figuratively, the same as the word Ashado [I do (or will) testify], in giving evidence before a magistrate: contrary to where a woman answers Atliko Nafsee [I do (or will) divorce myself], for here it is impossible to receive her words in a present sense, as they do not relate to a thing now existing; whereas the expression Akhtarto [I do (or will) choose myself], on the contrary, relates to a thing now present, to wit, the woman choosing herself.

Where the husband gives a power of option thrice repeated, and the wife make only a single reply, yet three divorces take place from it, independent of the husband's intention.—If a man say to his wife, "choose!—choose!—choose!" and she reply, "I have chosen the first," or "the second," or "the third," three divorces take place, according to the doctrine of Hanecfa, and the intention of the husband is not requisite, although the word here used be an implied expression, because his repetition of the word "choose!" proves his intention to be divorce, as the option given to the woman is repeated only with that view.*—The two disciples say that, only one divorce takes place in either case; but they agree with Haneefa, that the intention is not essential, for the reason above assigned.—And, in the same manner, if the woman were only to reply, “I have chosen,” it is effective of three divorces. And so also, if she were to reply, “I have chosen a choice.”—This is admitted by all the doctors; because, where she only says, “I have chosen,” it is productive of three divorces; and, consequently, when she speaks in a way to give this additional force, it produces the same a fortiori.—And if she were to reply, “I have divorced myself,” or “I have chosen myself with respect to one divorce,” one divorce reversible takes place.

Where the word divorce is mentioned by the husband, the divorce which follows is reversible.—If a man say to his wife, “one divorce is at your option,” or “choose with respect to a single divorce,” and she reply, “I have chosen myself,” one divorce reversible takes place, because the man has given the woman an option so far as one divorce, and expressing it in direct terms (as above)* the divorce proceeding from it is reversible.

Section II.

Of Amir-ba-Yed, or Liberty.†

In a delegation of liberty, divorce takes place according to the number mentioned by the wife, independent of the husband's intention: and the divorce which follows is irreversible.—If a man say to his wife, “your business is in your own hands,” intending three divorces, and the woman answer, “I have chosen myself with one choice,” three divorces take place. The proof of this is drawn from the nature of these expressions in their original idiom.

BUT if the woman were to reply, “I have divorced myself with one divorce,” or “I have chosen myself by one divorce,” one divorce only takes place; and this divorce is irreversible, although the reply be delivered in express and not in ambiguous terms, because it bears relation to the words of the husband, which being an implication, amount to a delegation of irreversible divorce, and not of reversible.—The reason why an intention of three divorces is admitted in the present instance, is that the words, “your business is in your own hands,” are capable of both a restrictive and an extensive construction, and hence may imply three divorces, as well as one; an intention to that effect therefore holds good, since that is one of the senses in which the words may be taken: contrary to the expression considered in the preceding section, to wit, “choose!” that being incapable of bearing an extensive construction, as was there demonstrated.

Delegation of liberty may be restricted to a particular time, or to several different specified periods of time.—If a man say to his wife, “your business is in your own hands this day, and after to-morrow,” the night is not included:—and if the woman reject the liberty thus given to her for this day, it is, with respect to this day, annulled; but it still remains to her for the day after the morrow, because the husband has expressly specified two particular periods, with the intervention of a similar period, to which the liberty does not extend (to wit, to-morrow); and hence it appears that those are two distinct liberties, and the rejection of one does not amount to a rejection of the other. Ziffer says that both amount only to a single liberty, this being analogous to a case where a man says to his wife, “you are divorced this day and the day after to-morrow,” which implies one divorce only, and not two (on the idea of one taking place this day, and the other the day after the morrow); and hence, in like manner, one liberty only is implied.—But to this it may be replied, that divorce is not of a nature to admit restriction to any particular time, whereas liberty is capable of such restriction; and hence that which regards the first period mentioned is restricted to that period, and that which regards the second period commences de novo.

If a man say to his wife, “your business is in your own hands to-day and to-morrow,” the night is comprehended in it: and, if the woman should reject the liberty on the instant, it is totally annulled, and does not return on the morrow (according to the Zahir Rawayet), as this amounts only to one liberty, because that between the two periods specified no similar period intervenes to which the liberty does not extend.

•OBJECTION.—Although a period similar to the two specified does not intervene, yet night intervenes, from which it would follow that the liberty given for to-day and to-morrow is not a single liberty.

REPLY.—Two distinct liberties are not occasioned by this circumstance, because the intervention of night, although it may interrupt or suspend a matter, does not divide or terminate it, as in a public court, for instance, which may, on account of the night coming on, be adjourned, without any actual breach in the series of its proceedings; thus it is the same as if the man were to say, “your business is in your own hands for two days,” in which case a single liberty only is understood.

And it is not annulled by the wife's rejection of it until the time or times mentioned be fully expired.—It is recorded, from Abou Haneefa, that although the woman should reject the liberty on the instant, yet it still remains with her for the following day, as she is not empowered to reject it (that is to say, she cannot refuse her assent to receiving it), it becoming established in her upon the husband saying, "your business is in your own hands," independent of her consent (as in the direct execution of divorce, for instance, where, if the husband were to say, "you are divorced," divorce takes place independent of the consent of the wife); and such being the case, liberty remains still with her for the morrow, when she may lawfully make use of it by choosing divorce. The ground upon which Zahir Rawayct proceeds, is that as, if she were to choose divorce as this day, no liberty remains with her for to-morrow, so if she reject the liberty this day, no right of choice remains with her for to-morrow, because a person who has a choice of two things is not authorized to choose more than one of them.

* Because an express divorce is uniformly reversible, unless otherwise specified.

† This is a contraction of Amir-ke-ba-Yed-ke, literally, “your business is in your own hands, i.e., “you are at liberty to do as you please.”—The word liberty is adopted singly, for the sake of brevity.

It is recorded, from Aboo Yoosaf, that if a husband say to his wife, "your business is in your own hands for this day, and the same for to-morrow," this amounts to two liberties, because here the delegation applies to two portions of time, distinctly and separately expressed: contrary to the preceding case, where the times are not thus discriminated, but are both mentioned under one head.

The time of it may be fixed for the occurrence of any specified event.—If a man say to his wife, "your business is in your own hands on the day on which such an one arrives," and the person mentioned arrive, but his arrival be not known to the wife until night, her right of choice no longer remains, because liberty is a thing of continuance, and hence the whole day, with which it is associated, is restricted to the day time, and that having passed away, it discontinues.

It is not annulled by delay (where there is no specification of time), nor until the wife rises from her seat, &c.—If a man say to his wife, "your business is in your own hands," or "choose!" and she delay answering the whole day, and do not rise from her seat, her right of option remains to her so long as she does not employ herself in any other matter, because a delegation of divorce by the forms of liberty or option is a transfer of power to execute divorce (that is, the husband by that delegation empowers his wife to give divorce, as persons are termed empowered who act for themselves, and the act of the woman here is pronouncing divorce upon herself, wherefore this property is supposed to reside in her),—and in transfer of power a privilege of reply continues to the end of the situation of declaration, as has been demonstrated in the beginning of this chapter. And if the woman hear the declaration, respect is had to the situation in which she hears it; but if she should not hear it, respect is, in that case, had to the situation, in which she is informed of it, because, although Amir-ba-Yed, or liberty, be a transfer of power to execute divorce, yet the property of suspension is also allowed to exist in it, as it is a suspension of the event of divorce upon the act of the wife in pronouncing it, and hence it comprehends two things, a transfer of power, and a suspension;—in the sense of a suspension, it continues in force beyond the Majlis, or continuance of the situation of declaration, to the Majlis or situation in which the woman understands or is informed of it, where she is absent, or in the sense of a transfer of power, it is annulled, on her rising from her seat, where she is present; but the situation of the husband is not regarded, because the suspension is absolute with respect to him: contrary to a case of sale, as in that the declaration of sale does not remain in force beyond the Majlis of declaration, since in a sale the Majlis or situation of the seller is regarded as well as that of the purchaser: and the retraction of the seller, at any time previous to the consent of the purchaser, is admitted, as sale is merely a transfer of property, in which suspension is not at all understood; now since it appears that the situation of the wife alone is regarded, and not that of her husband, we must recollect that her situation may be altered in various ways, sometimes by removal from one place to another, and sometimes by her employing herself in any other matter, as was previously stated.

annulled on the instant of her rising from her seat.—THE option of a woman who is left at liberty to choose is annulled on the instant of her rising from her seat, as this act proves rejection, because by getting up the attention is deranged and withdrawn from the present subject: contrary to a case where she delays answering for a whole day, for instance, and does not rise from her seat, nor employ herself in anything else; for here her option remains to her, as a Majlis or situation is sometimes of a short and sometimes of a long duration, wherefore her right of option continues until such time as something appears sufficient to terminate the Majlis, or to prove rejection. And here it is to be observed, that by employing herself in anything else is to be understood such a thing as is, in its nature, terminative of her situation, and not any general thing.

It is not annulled by a change of posture from a mere active to a mere quiescent position.—If the woman be standing, at the period of receiving the liberty of option from her husband, and afterwards sit down, her option remains, and is not annulled, as her sitting does not imply rejection, but rather the contrary, since her attention is thereby more collected.—And the rule is the same where the woman, being seated, leans upon a pillow, or having leaned upon her pillow (at the time the husband speaks), sits up without a pillow, because these are no more than changes from one mode of sitting to another, and do not import rejection any more than where a person sitting upon one part changes and sits upon another.—Our author remarks that this is the doctrine of the Jama Sagheer, and is most approved.—It is elsewhere said, that where the woman is sitting up without a pillow, and then leans upon a pillow, option no longer remains, as this shows an indifference respecting it amounting to a rejection.

her friends, without prejudice to her right of option.—If the woman, on receiving a liberty of option, say that she wishes to see her father, in order to consult him, or to get witnesses, in order to have their evidence, her option remains, because counsel is expedient in every business, and witnesses are requisite to controvert the husband's denial of the fact; and hence neither of these wishes expressed on her part is a proof of rejection.

If the woman be riding upon a quadruped, or in a camel-litter, and stop the animal on her husband's offer of liberty, still the right of option is not annulled: but if she proceed upon her journey, it is annulled, because the going on or stopping of the animal is the same with those acts in the woman, since its motions depend upon the rider.

A BOAT or ship is the same as a house, as by the going on of the vessel the woman's option is not annulled, because its motion does not always depend upon the person whom it carries.

Section III.

Where a man empowers his wife to divorce herself in express terms, the divorce which follows is reversible.—If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself," not having any particular intention, or intending one divorce, and the woman reply, "I have divorced myself," a single divorce reversible takes place: and if she were to say, "I have given three divorces," three accordingly take place, where such is the intention of the husband: the reason of this is that divorce, being a general expression, takes place in the lowest species; but as, like other generic nouns, it also applies to the whole, an intention of three divorces is admitted: and, where there is no particular intention, a single divorce reversible takes place, because the power of divorce is delegated to the wife in express terms, and express divorce occasions a divorce reversible.—If the husband should in this case intend two divorces it is not admitted, because a generic noun does not bear that construction, where the woman is free; but, if she be a slave, an intention of two divorces is admitted, that being considered as the whole, with respect to her.

Although her reply be expressed in the form of an irreversible divorce.—If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself,"—and she reply, "I have separated myself," a divorce reversible takes place, because separation is of the same nature with divorce, since, if a husband were to say to his wife, "I have irreversibly separated you [from me], intending divorce, a divorce irreversible takes place:—and, in the same manner, if the woman were (as here) to say, "I have separated myself," and her husband reply, "I have consented thereto," she becomes irreversibly divorced; and hence the expression of the woman, "I have irreversibly separated myself," stands the same as the husband's delegation, which is of simple divorce: but here the description of irreversibility which the woman has added to the simple divorce is held to be nugatory; and the simple divorce only takes place; as if she had replied, "I have repudiated myself by one irreversible divorce," in which case a divorce reversible only would take place: contrary to a reply of option, for if she were to answer, "I have chosen myself," no divorce whatever would take place, as these words are not of the same nature with divorce, for which reason it is that if a man were to say to his wife, "I have chosen you," or "choose!" intending divorce, no divorce whatever takes place; and in like manner, if the woman were to speak first, saying, "I have chosen myself," and her husband reply, "I have consented," no divorce whatever takes place: yet it is an universally received doctrine, that if the woman say, "I have chosen myself," in reply to a delegation of option, divorce takes place; but the words of the husband in the present case, namely, "divorce yourself," is not a delegation of option, and hence the reply of the woman, as above stated, "I have chosen myself," is nugatory.

It is recorded, as an opinion of Haneefa, that in the present case divorce does not take place from the reply of the wife, "I have separated myself," because the woman acts contrary to the power vested in her, by taking upon her to pronounce a thing different from that delegated to her by her husband, as the expression "separated" is different from divorce, the one being implicative and the other express; and the husband delegated express divorce only.

or, when thus granted, cannot be

If a husband say to his wife, "divorce yourself," he is not at liberty to retract, as his expression involves a vow,* because he has, in this instance, suspended divorce upon the execution of it by his wife, and a vow is an obligatory act, for which reason a man is not allowed to recede from it. If, however, the woman rise from her seat, or remove from the place, the words of the husband, as above, transferring the power of divorce to her, are annulled, their force being confined to the situation where the offer is made:—contrary to where he says to her, "divorce your Zirra [fellow-wife]," as this is a commission of agency, which is not restricted to place, and may be therefore retracted by the constituent whenever he pleases.

* Literally, "his words express (or amount to) a Yameen," that is to say, suspend the matter spoken of upon the occurrence of some condition on the event of which that matter takes place, independent of any further volition on the part of the speaker; and it is therefore, with respect to him, absolute and un retractable. Yameen is here translated vow, as the above is one definition of vow.

...be granted generally.—If a husband say to his wife, “divorce yourself when you please,” she is at liberty to divorce herself either upon the spot or at any future period, because the word when extends to all times; and hence it is the same as if he were to say, “divorce yourself at whatever time you like.”

If a man say to another, “divorce my wife,” the person thus addressed may divorce her either upon the spot or at any other time, and the husband may also retract, because this is a commission of agency, and therefore is not absolute, nor restricted in point of place: contrary to where he says to his wife, “divorce yourself,” this being a transfer of power, not a commission of agency,* as the woman thus addressed acts from herself and not from another. But if a man say to another, “divorce such an one my wife,” (adding) “if you please,” the man is empowered to divorce the wife upon the spot only; and here the husband cannot retract. —Ziffer says that this and the preceding case are alike, the addition of “if you please” in the one instance, or the omission of it in the other, making no difference, because the person so commissioned afterwards acts from his own will, like an agent in sale, to whom it may have been said, “sell this thing, if you please.”—The argument of our doctors is that the words of the husband are a transfer of power, as he suspends the divorce upon the will of the person whom he addresses, and he is the principal who acts from his own will; divorce, moreover, admits of suspension, whereas sale does not.

A wife empowered to give herself three divorces may give herself one divorce.—If a man say to his wife, “give yourself three divorces,” and she give herself one divorce only, it takes place accordingly, because, having been empowered so far as three divorces, it necessarily follows that she is enabled to give a single one.

But, when empowered to give herself one divorce only, she cannot give herself three.—If a man say to his wife, “divorce yourself once,” and she give herself three divorces, nothing whatever takes place, according to Haneefa. —The two disciples say that a single divorce takes place, because the woman has done that to which she was empowered, together with that to which she was not empowered; and hence it is analogous to a case in which a husband says to his wife, “I repudiate you by a thousand divorces” where three divorces take place, because he has pronounced that to which he is empowered along with that to which he is not empowered; consequently the former takes effect, but the latter is nugatory; and so likewise in the present case.—The argument of Haneefa is that the wife has, in this case, attempted to do an act, the power of doing which has not been delegated to her by her husband, and hence she appears to divorce herself, first, and not in reply to the desire expressed by him, as he has empowered her so far as one divorce only, and between three divorces and one there is a contradiction, the word three expressing a compound number, and one a single unit: contrary to where a man pronounces a thousand divorces upon his wife, as here three take place, because he acts in consequence of the desire of another:—and contrary also to the preceding case (viz. where the husband desires his wife to repudiate herself by three divorces, and she declares one only), for here one divorce takes place on account of her being empowered so far as three; whereas, in the present case, she is not empowered so far as three, and having acted contrary to the power vested in her, what she does is nugatory.

Where the wife's reply disagrees with the husband's declaration in respect to the nature of the divorce, it takes place according to his declaration, not according to her reply.—If a man desire his wife to repudiate herself by a reversible divorce, and she divorce herself irreversibly, or the contrary, that mode of divorce takes place which was desired by the husband: thus, if a man say to his wife, “give yourself one divorce reversible,” and she reply, “I have given myself a divorce irreversible,” a divorce reversible takes place, because the woman has declared a divorce in express terms, but with an additional description, and the latter is nugatory, as being contrary to the desire expressed by the husband; but the former (which is in its nature reversible) takes place, as being in conformity to the husband's desire:—and, on the other hand, if the husband say to his wife, “give yourself one divorce irreversible,” and she reply, “I have given myself a divorce reversible,” a divorce irreversible takes place, because the description of reversibility attached to the divorce by the wife is nugatory, since the husband, having himself affixed a description to it, does not require more of his wife than simply divorce, without any description; hence it is the same as if she had pronounced the divorce itself in a defective way: thus the divorce takes place under whatever description may have been affixed to it by the husband, whether reversible or irreversible.

Where the power is conditional upon the pleasure of the wife, it is annulled by her reply disaccordant with the husband's declaration.—If a man say to his wife, “divorce yourself thrice, if you please,” and she give herself one divorce, no effect whatever follows, because the meaning of his words is

* That is to say, after being thus empowered, she stands as a principal in the execution of divorce, and not as an agent; and a commission of agency may be annulled at pleasure, whereas the power devolved to another to act as a principal cannot be so.

"if you desire three divorces, repudiate yourself," and the woman giving one only, it appears that she does not desire three, and hence, the condition not being fulfilled, the divorce does not take place.

If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself once, if you please," and she give herself three, no divorce whatever ensues, according to Haneefa, because a desire of one divorce only is essentially different from a desire of three, this being analogous to a case of execution as before mentioned, that is to say, as the execution of three divorces in that instance was demonstrated to be a sensible contradiction to that of one; so, in the present instance, a wish for three is contradictory to a wish for one; and, from the woman pronouncing upon herself three divorces, it appears that she was not desirous of one; and hence the condition is not fulfilled.—The two disciples say that one divorce takes place on this occasion, because a desire for one divorce is comprehended in a desire for three, on the same principle as the execution of three divorces comprehends that of one (agreeably to their doctrine before mentioned); and hence the condition is virtually fulfilled.

And also, by her suspending her will upon that of her husband.—If a man make a delegation of divorce to his wife, by saying to her, "you are divorced if you be desirous of it," and she reply, "I am desirous, if you desire it," and he reply, in return, "I am desirous" (intending divorce), the delegation is void, because the husband has suspended the divorce upon the will of the woman where that is unrestricted, that is to say, independent of anything else; but, from the conversation, it appears that she suspends her will upon that of her husband, and hence the condition of divorce, namely, the independent will of the woman, is not fulfilled; for he does not act from option; and the delegation is void of course.—The words of the husband, in the last reply, namely, "I am desirous," are not effective of divorce, although such be his intention, because there is no mention whatever of divorce in the words of the woman, from which the husband's wish to that effect might be inferred in his answer, and the intention alone does not suffice, as it has no operation with respect to a thing not mentioned; whereas, if he were to say, "I am desirous of your divorce," it takes place if he so intend it, because he in this case appears to give divorce de novo, as a desire expressed with respect to any thing implies the existence of that thing, and hence his expression, "I am desirous of your divorce," is as if he were to say, "I cause your divorce," which accordingly takes place: contrary to what would follow, if he were to say, "I intend your divorce," in which case divorce would not take place, because an intention expressed does not imply the existence of the thing intended.—If, moreover, in the case now recited, the woman were to reply, "I am desirous if my father be so," or, "if such a circumstance happen" (meaning a circumstance which does not yet exist), and the father afterwards signify his desire, or the circumstance upon which she has suspended the divorce come to pass, yet divorce does not take place, and the delegation is void:—but if she, in saying, "if such a thing happen," mean a thing which has already passed, divorce takes place, because suspension upon a condition already fulfilled amounts to immediate or unsuspended divorce.

When the power is expressed with an unrestricted particle (in respect to time), it is perpetual, extending to all times and places.—If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced when you please," or, "whenever you please," and she reject his offer, saying, "I am not desirous of it," her rejection is not final, for here the power vested in her is not confined to the place or situation where it is delegated, on which account she is at liberty to use it either there or elsewhere, because the terms when and whenever are used with reference to all times, and extend to every time indiscriminately, and hence the sense of the expressions, "when you please," and "whenever you please," is "at whatever time you please," and they are, therefore, not confined to place. And if the woman reject at present, still it is not a final rejection, because her husband has empowered her to divorce herself at whatever time she pleases, wherefore the power does not apply to the time when she does not please.—But it is to be observed that the woman is not in this case authorized to pronounce upon herself more than one divorce, because the words when and whenever apply to all times, but not to more than a single divorce; thus she is authorized to divorce herself at whatever time she pleases, but not to pronounce divorce as often as she pleases.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced as often as you please," she is at liberty to divorce herself time after time, until three divorces, because the expression "as often" admits a repetition of the act:—but it is to be observed that this suspension of divorce upon the woman's will is restricted solely to the marriage at present existing, and does not extend to that which may afterwards occur; and hence, if the woman give herself three divorces, and be again married to the same man, after being rendered lawful to him, and then pronounce divorce upon herself, it does not take place, because a marriage has then occurred de novo:—and it is also to be remarked that the woman is not at liberty to pronounce the three divorces upon herself in one sentence, because the expression "as often as," implies unity, and does not admit of the circumstances to which it relates being taken collectively, and hence it is lawful for the woman to pronounce three divorces upon herself at three separate times, but not at once.

But not when it is expressed with an unrestricted particle in respect to place.—If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced wherever you please," yet the woman cannot divorce herself but in that place; and if she rise from her place before she pronounce it, her will is not regarded afterwards, because the words wherever, or wheresoever, are adverbs of place, and divorce has no connexion with place; the word wherever is therefore nugatory, and the will only remains, which is confined to the precise place: contrary to the case of time (that is, where the husband says, "when you please"), to which divorce has a relation, as it may take place at one time and not at another, and hence the mention of time in divorce is regarded, whether it be particular, as "you are divorced to-morrow;" or general, as "you are divorced when you please."

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced how you please," and she remain silent, a divorce reversible takes place, whether she be desirous or not: or, if she break silence, and say, "I am desirous of one divorce reversible," and the husband reply, "such also is my desire," divorce takes place accordingly, because a conformity is established between the will of the wife and the intention of the husband; but where the wife desires three divorces, and the husband only one divorce irreversible, or the contrary, a divorce reversible takes place, because her act is rendered nugatory by the non-conformity of her will with that of her husband, and his words (viz. "you are divorced"), remain, which are effective of a divorce reversible: but if the husband have no particular intention, the will of the wife alone is regarded, inasmuch that, whether she desire three divorces, or only one irreversible divorce, it takes place accordingly, in the opinion of our modern doctors, as this is what a right of option requires.—The compiler of the Hedaya observes that Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, says that the taking place of one divorce independent of the will of the wife, as above, is the doctrine of Haneefa; but that, with the two disciples, divorce does not take place so long as the woman does not divorce herself; thus she has her option of either one divorce reversible or irreversible, or of three divorces: and the same difference of opinion subsists with respect to manumission; that is to say, if a master say to his slave, "you are emancipated how you please," the slave is free upon the instant, according to Haneefa; whereas, according to the two disciples, he is not free, so long as he is not desirous of being so.—The argument of the latter is that the husband has delegated to his wife a power to effect divorce upon herself under whatever description she pleases, whether a single divorce reversible or irreversible, or three divorces; and hence it is indispensably requisite that the divorce itself be also suspended upon her will, so that a will shall be confirmed to her in all circumstances, that is, both before carnal connexion and after it; for, if the divorce itself were not suspended upon the will of the wife, it would follow that the wife could have no will with respect to the description of the divorce before carnal connexion, as before consummation she cannot give herself three divorces, since in such case the wife becomes irreversibly repudiated by a single divorce before the passing of her Edit, and no longer remains a subject of divorce.—The argument of Haneefa is that the word "how" implies a requisition of description; now delegation of the description of a thing requires the existence of the subject of it, and divorce cannot have existence but by taking place.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced by as many as you please," or "by what you please," she is empowered to divorce herself by whatever number she pleases, as the expression as many as and what are used with relation to number; and hence the husband appears to have delegated a power to the woman with respect to whatever number she may approve. If, however, she rise from her place before pronouncing any divorce the delegation is void; or if she reject, her rejection is final, because this sort of singular delegation does not argue or admit a repetition of the act; and the address implying a thing required to be immediately determined upon, consequently demands an immediate answer.

If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself what you please, out of three," she is empowered to give herself one or two divorces, but not three, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that she may give herself three divorces, if so inclined.—The arguments on both sides are drawn from the Arabic.

CHAPTER IV.

OF DIVORCE BY YAMEEN, OR CONDITIONAL VOW.

Definition of the term Yameen with respect to divorce.—By Yameen is here understood the suspension of divorce upon a circumstance which bears the property of a condition, and this suspension is termed Yameen, because Yameen, in its primitive sense, signifies strength or power; and the suspension is a motive to the suspender to be strong in the avoidance of the condition, in such a manner that he may not be subjected to the consequence or penalty, which is divorce or manumission.

Divorce, pronounced with a reference to a future marriage, takes place upon the occurrence of such marriage.—WHERE a man refers or annexes divorce to marriage (that is, suspends it upon marriage), by saying to any strange woman, "if I marry you, you are divorced," or by declaring "any woman whom I may marry is divorced," in this case divorce takes place on the event of such marriage.—Shafei maintains that divorce does not take place, the prophet having said that there is no divorce antecedent to marriage.—The argument of our doctors is that the annexing of divorce to marriage is a Yameen, or suspension, as appears from its containing a condition and a consequence, and present authority is not requisite to its propriety, because the divorce does not take place until the occurrence of the condition, at which time the authority necessarily takes place; and the end which it answers, before the occurrence of the condition, is, that it restrains the vower from marrying that woman, as his meaning in the expression is, "I will not marry you, or, if I do, you are divorced." With respect to the saying of the prophet cited by Shafei, it goes to the prohibition of immediate divorce only, and not of that which is suspended upon the occurrence of a future possible event.

Or upon the occurrence of any other circumstance on which it may be conditionally suspended.—If a man annex divorce to a condition specified, by saying to his wife, "if you enter this house you are under divorce," the divorce takes place upon the occurrence of the condition. This is universally admitted by the learned, because of the existence of the matrimonial authority, at the time of the husband's declaration; and it is evident that this declaration remains in force until the condition be accomplished.

Provided it be pronounced during an actual, or with reference to an eventual, possession of authority.—But the annexing of divorce to marriage is not lawful, unless the vower be either authorized at the time, or annex divorce to a future possession of authority; as it is indispensably requisite that the penalty be a thing of probable occurrence, in order that the apprehension of it may operate upon the fears of the vower, and that thus the property of Yameen (viz. restraint from the apprehension of penalty), do really exist at the time of declaring the condition, in virtue either of present authority, or of a reference to a future authority.

OBJECTION.—What is now said appears to contradict the doctrine advanced in the preceding case, of a man annexing divorce to marriage, by saying to a strange woman, "if I marry you, you are divorced," for in that case he is neither in present authority, nor does he annex divorce to the future possession of it.

—Although he does not annex the divorce to an existing right, yet he annexes it to the cause of a right which may exist, (namely, marriage), and annexation to the cause is the same as to the right itself, because in the former the latter is involved.—But if a man say to a strange woman, "if you enter such an house you are divorced," and he afterwards marry her, and she then enter the said house, divorce does not take place, because in this case he is neither invested with any present right, nor does he annex the divorce either to a future right or to the cause thereof.

Five conditional particles of various effect.

—THE conditional particles are as follows, viz.: "if," "when," "whenever," "whensoever," and "as often as."—Of these the particle "if" is solely conditional; in the use of the others condition is implied.—And under the four first of these expressions, upon the condition being fulfilled, the Yameen, or vow, is completed, and no longer exists; that is to say, if the condition should again occur, the penalty is not incurred a second time, because the words above mentioned do not involve all future acts of the kind expressed in the condition, nor do they demand a repetition of the penalty; and hence, where the act which constitutes the condition is once found to occur, the condition is fulfilled, and no longer remains; and the vow does not continue in force without the condition; but from this rule must be excepted the expression "as often as," which applies universally, and such being the case, it is requisite that the penalty be repeatedly incurred;—in every case, therefore, where divorce is the penalty derived from the use of "as often as," it repeatedly takes place upon the recurrence of the condition.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced as often as you enter the house," and she enter it three times, and then marry another man, and afterwards again marry her first husband, and the condition should then occur, divorce does not take place, as no penalty remains on account of its having been completely incurred in the three divorces which followed the repetition of this act in the first marriage; and as the continuance of a Yameen, or conditional vow, depends upon the continuance of the condition and the penalty, when these no longer remain the vow discontinues also.

If the words "as often as" be introduced in reference to marriage, by a man saying, "as often as I marry any woman she is divorced," divorce takes place upon every instance of his marrying afterwards, though he should marry the woman a second time, after her having been in the interim married to another, because here the penalty is referred to the power he possesses of divorce, which is a consequence of marriage; and as this power is not restricted to any particular instance, but invariably accompanies every marriage, it follows that the penalty must take place upon every occurrence of the condition.

A conditional vow of divorce is not annulled by the extinction of property.—A

CONDITIONAL VOW of divorce is not annulled by the extinction of the right; that is, if a man say to his wife, "you are divorced, when you enter this house," and he afterwards give her one or two divorces, and her Edith be completed, the force of the vow still continues under the extinction of right occasioned by such divorce; because the condition specified, namely, her entrance into the house, has not yet been accomplished, and therefore still continues to exist; and the penalty remains, because of the continuance of its subject; wherefore the vow also continues: thus, if the condition take place during the existence of right, the vow is accomplished, and divorce takes place, because of the occurrence of the condition, and because the subject is liable to the penalty; and if it occur under the extinction of right, as above, the vow is done away, on account of the condition having occurred: but no divorce takes place, because in this case the woman is not a subject of divorce; for a subject of divorce is a woman who is a property according to the right of marriage.

Case of a dispute between the parties concerning the occurrence of the condition.—If a husband and wife differ concerning the condition, the former asserting that it had not yet occurred, and the latter that it had, the declaration of the husband is to be credited, unless the woman produce proof in support of her allegation, because the husband is as the defendant, denying the existence of divorce, and the consequent extinction of his right; whereas the wife is as the plaintiff, affirming it. This relates to a case where the condition is of such a nature that its occurrence may be ascertained by other means than by the testimony of the wife herself; but if it be of such nature that no evidence but her own is competent to the ascertaining of the condition, her declaration is to be credited in preference to that of her husband. This, however, holds with respect to herself only, and not with respect to any other woman; for if a man say to his wife, "upon the coming on of your courses you are divorced, and also such an one my other wife," and the woman afterwards declare her menstruation to have commenced, divorce takes place upon her only, and not upon the other wife. This proceeds upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that divorce does not take place upon her either, because she is in this case in the character of plaintiff, affirming the occurrence of the condition, and the consequent divorce, and the husband is as the defendant, denying; and the declaration of a plaintiff is not to be credited but upon proof; but the reason for the more favourable construction of the law in this instance, is that the woman is inquisitor with respect to herself, as the occurrence of her courses cannot be known but through her; and hence her declaration is credited on this occasion as well as in cases of Edit, or of carnal conjunction; that is to say, if a woman, having been divorced, should declare that "her Edit having passed, she had then been married to a man, who having duly consummated, had then divorced her, and that her Edit from that husband had also elapsed," this her declaration is credited, so as to render her lawful in marriage to her first husband; and in the same manner the declaration of the wife is credited with respect to herself in the present instance;

but it is not so with respect to the other wife, because this one is only in the character of a witness with respect to the other, and the declaration of a single witness is not to be credited, especially where she is liable to suspicion, which must be the case in the present instance, on account of the enmity subsisting between her and the other, from the latter being her Zirra, or fellow-wife; whence her declaration respecting such an one is not credited.

In the same manner, if a man say to his wife, "if you be desirous that God should torment you with hell fire, you are divorced, and this my slave is free," and she reply, "I am desirous of such torment," or if he should say, "if you love me you are under divorce, and this my other wife along with you," and she reply, "I love you," in both cases divorce takes place upon the woman who is addressed in these terms; but the slave is not emancipated in the former instance, nor is the fellow-wife repudiated in the latter, for the reasons mentioned in the preceding case.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that divorce ought not to take place in the former of these instances, as the falsehood of the woman's reply is evident, since no one can be supposed desirous of hell fire.

REPLY. The falsehood is not certain, as it is possible that her hatred of her husband may be sufficiently violent to induce her to wish for a release from him at the expense even of infernal torments. But notwithstanding that the penalty (to wit, divorce) be annexed to her reply, with respect to this woman, although she speak falsely; yet with respect to the other person who is named, divorce or manumission are not so annexed, and consequently that person is unaffected by it.

Rule in case of divorce suspended upon the courses.—If a husband suspend divorce upon the coming of his wife's courses, saying, "upon the coming of your courses you are divorced," and she afterwards perceive the signs of the menstrual discharge, the divorce does not take place until the discharge shall have continued for three days, as that which terminates within a less time is not a regular discharge; but where the discharge has continued for three days, divorce is decreed from the period of its commencement.

But if a man say to his wife, "you are divorced upon one term of your courses," she is not repudiated until she become clean from her next succeeding courses, and her Tohr, or term of purity, arrive; because by one term of the courses is to be understood a complete menstruation, and menstruation is not completed until the return of the term of purity.

And if he say to her, "you are divorced when you fast a day," she becomes divorced on the sunset of the first day on which she fasts: but if he only say, "you are divorced when you fast," her divorce takes place from the first time that she begins a fast. The proofs are drawn on this occasion from the term of those expressions in the original idiom.

If a man say to his pregnant wife, "if you bring forth a male child you are divorced once, and if a female, twice," and she should happen to produce twins, a son and a daughter, and it be unknown which of them was first born, the Kazei is here to decree a single divorce; but caution dictates that it be regarded as two divorces.—In this case the woman's Edit, or term of probation, is accomplished by her delivery; for if she brought forth the son first, a single divorce would take place, and her Edit would be accomplished by the birth of the daughter, after which no other divorce could take place on account of the birth of the latter, as the accomplishment of the mother's Edit includes a complete dissolution of her marriage, under which divorce cannot take place; and, on the other hand, if she brought forth the daughter first, two divorces take place, and her Edit is accomplished by the birth of the son, after which no other divorce could take place, for the same reason; hence, in the first instance, one divorce only would take place, and in the second two divorces; but in the present case the second divorce is not decreed, on account of the doubt in which the matter is involved; yet (as was already observed) caution dictates that this be considered as amounting to two divorces.

Cases of divorce suspended upon acts which admit of frequent repetition.—* If a man say to his wife, "if you converse with Zeyd and Amroo, you are under three divorces," and he afterwards give her a single divorce, and she become separated by the accomplishment of her Edit, and she then converse with Zeyd, and afterwards again marry her former husband, and then converse again with Amroo, she falls under two divorces to ~~add~~ with the first.—In all three divorces, Ziffer maintains that on this occasion no divorce whatever takes place.—This case may be considered in four different views:—FIRST, where both the conditions appear, to wit, converse with both Zeyd and Amroo within marriage, in which case divorce would follow evidently;—SECONDLY, where both conditions appear without marriage, in which case divorce does not take place, the reason of which is also evident;—THIRDLY, where the first condition exists within marriage and the second without,* in which case likewise divorce does not take place, as that penalty cannot follow without the existence of the marriage;—and, FOURTHLY, where the first condition exists without the marriage, and the second within it †;—and this is the case concerning which Ziffer differs from our doctors.—The argument of Ziffer is, that as the existence of marriage is conditional to the divorce taking place at the time of the occurrence of the last condition, so it is in the same manner conditional at the time of the occurrence of the first condition, because they are both (with respect to the rule of divorce) as one thing, since that divorce cannot possibly take place without the concurrence of both of them. To this our doctors reply that the case now under consideration is a vow, which, being an act affecting the maker of it, rests upon his competency; now the existence of marriage, at the period of suspension (that is, of making the vow), is made conditional, in order that the penalty may to a certainty ensue at the period of the conditions specified taking place: and, in the present case, marriage actually existing at the period of suspension, the vow holds good: and the existence of marriage is also rendered conditional at the time of the condition being completely fulfilled, in order that the penalty may take place within marriage; because this penalty is divorce, which cannot take place but within marriage: but, in the present case, the time of the occurrence of the first condition is neither a period within which the vow has any force, nor in which the penalty can take place; wherefore that interval is considered merely as the time of the continuance of the vow, to which the existence of marriage is not absolutely necessary, as it depends upon the vower, a vow being an act peculiarly affecting the maker of it, as was already remarked.

Case of a man first procuring a conditional divorce, and then repudiating his wife by two express divorces.—† If a man say to his wife, "if you enter this house you are under three divorces," and he afterwards repudiate her by two express divorces, and her Edit be fulfilled, and she be afterwards married to another man, and he have carnal connexion with her, and divorce her, and she be then

* In this and the succeeding passages a matter must be adverted to which it is necessary to understand, in order that their sense may be fully comprehended. When a man pronounces two or three conditional divorces, these remain so far in force that they recur upon the recurrence of the condition, even after an intervening marriage; but any divorce by which that marriage may have been dissolved is then counted in with that which thus recurs upon the recurrence of the condition.

* That is to say, where the first occurs within the first marriage and the second intermediately between the dissolution of that and the commencement of the second marriage.

† That is to say, where the first occurs intermediately between the dissolution of the first marriage, and the commencement of the second, and the second within the second marriage.

‡ This and the following are termed cases of obliteration. They are more fully treated of under the article Aila.

married to her first husband, and after that enter the said house, three divorces take place upon her, according to the two Elders.—"Mohammed says that no more can take effect upon her than the one divorce remaining after the two which she had already received, as above; and such also is the opinion of Ziffer. The foundation of this difference, in point of doctrine, is that the two divorces are held, by the Elders, to have been entirely annihilated by the circumstances of the intervening marriage, and hence the first husband still continues empowered with respect to the three divorces [conditionally declared as above] upon the woman returning to him; contrary to Mohammed and Ziffer, who hold that they are not annihilated, and therefore that in such event he continues empowered only with respect to the remainder of the three (as shall be hereafter explained). The effect of this difference of opinion appears in a case where a husband, having suspended one divorce upon the circumstance of his wife's entering a certain house, afterwards repudiates her by two divorces, and the woman, after having married another man, returns to her first husband, and then enters the house, in which case she falls under the rigorous prohibition, according to Mohammed, the two former divorces not having been annihilated by the intermediate marriage; but, in the opinion of the two Elders, she does not fall under the rigorous prohibition, as they conceive the two former divorces to have been annihilated.

Or by three express divorces.—If a man say to his wife, "you are under three divorces if you enter this house," and he afterwards repudiates her by three express divorces, and she marry another man upon the expiration of her Edit, and, after being divorced by him, be again married to her former husband, and then enter the said house, no effect whatever ensues.—Ziffer says that three divorces take place, because three divorces are suspended generally upon the condition, whether in virtue of the right from the present existing marriage, or of that which recurs after the intervening marriage with another; and the expression is general, and not restrictive; hence, therefore, the occurrence of the three suspended divorces may still be conceived possible after the three divorces before given; for which reason the vow also continues in force, as the permanence of that is implied in the possibility of such occurrence. The argument of our doctors is that the penalty does not consist of three divorces generally, but of the three suspended divorces, with respect to which the husband is authorized, in virtue of the present existence of marriage, because he has imposed the vow upon himself for the purpose of deterrent, and it is only the three divorces therein mentioned which can operate in that way, not those with respect to which he may be authorized by a subsequent marriage, an event the occurrence of which is not probable, the chances being so much against it; and the penalty consisting of those three particular divorces being done away by the three divorces (in consequence of which the subject of divorce no longer remains), the vow is also done away; but it would be otherwise if, after a vow expressed as above, the husband were to repudiate his wife by a single irreversible divorce, for there the vow remains in force, because of the permanence of its subject.*

Case of divorce suspended upon carnal connexion with the wife.—If a man say to his wife, "when I have carnal connexion with you, you are under three divorces," and he afterwards have carnal knowledge of her, divorce takes place upon the instant of such carnal connexion taking place; and here, although he should not immediately cease such connexion, yet he does not become liable for either a fine or a proper dower; but the fine or dower becomes obligatory upon him if, after the shortest cessation, he should again have carnal connexion with her. This is analogous to a vow made with respect to a female slave; for if a master say to his female slave, "when I have carnal connexion with you, you are free," and he afterwards have carnal knowledge of her, she is emancipated on the instant of such connexion; yet she has no claim to a fine, although he should not immediately cease; but if, after a cessation, he again renew the connexion, she has then a claim to a fine. This is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that a fine is due where he delays, although he should not entirely retreat and again renew the connexion, because this amounts to carnal conjunction after divorce or emancipation, on account of his continuing the act; but punishment is not due, since the whole is only one act, in which, as the commencement affords no cause for punishment, so neither is punishment incurred by the accomplishment of it; but yet the fine is incumbent, as the commission of the carnal act upon a prohibited subject cannot be free from both punishment and fine. The grounds on which the Zahir Rawayet determines in this case, is that by Jama [the carnal act] is understood the commencement of the act; and continuation is not commencement; wherefore carnal connexion de novo is not implied; contrary to a case of cessation and renewal, because in that case the connexion takes place after divorce; but yet, even in this instance, punishment is not incurred, on account of the doubt occasioned by the unity of place and of passion; but such

* The subject still remains, because, after a single divorce, a wife continues a legal subject of two other divorces, until the expiration of her Edit.

† Meaning the Akir, or fine of trespass.

being the case, the fine is incumbent, as the commission of the carnal act upon a prohibited subject cannot be free both from punishment and fine.

If, moreover, in the case now recited, the husband had suspended a reversible decree upon his commission of the carnal act, the divorce is virtually reversed by his delay, agreeably to Abou Yoosaf; but if he cease and again renew, it is then reversed, according to all the doctors.

Section.

Of Istisna: that is, Reservation or Exception.

Divorce, with a reservation of the will of God, does not take place.—If a man say to his wife, “you are divorced (adding) if it please God,” without any stop between, divorce does not take place, because the prophet has said, “where a man makes a vow of divorce or manumission, saying, IF IT PLEASE GOD, he cannot be forsworn;” and also, because the husband has here introduced the words, “if it please God,” in the form of a condition, and hence the divorce is suspended upon the will of God, and does not take place until the occurrence of the condition: but the will of God not being known, nothing can be decreed which is suspended upon it.—And here, as the suspension destroys the effect of the preceding words, it is a condition that the same follow them connectedly, and without pause, as in other similar cases: and the words, “if it please God,” are here said to be introduced in the form of a condition, because they are not actually conditional, as by a condition is understood a thing not at present existing, but the future occurrence of which is conceivable; wherefore a thing now existing cannot be termed a condition; nor a thing the existence of which is impossible; and the will of God is of one or other of these descriptions.

Unless it be pronounced with a pause between the divorce and the reservation.—

WHAT is here said proceeds upon a supposition that the words, “if it please God,” follow the preceding words immediately, and without separation, by a pause; but if the man should first say, “you are divorced,” and remain a moment or two silent, and then say, “if it please God,” the virtue of the former words is established, because in that case the additional words come in as a retraction from the first words which is not held legal.

If a man say to his wife, “you are divorced, if it please God,” and she die before the utterance of the latter words, divorce does not take place, because on account of the reservation, “if it please God,” the words preceding do not stand or operate as a desire expressed.

OBJECTION.—As death prevents divorce, that is to say, as it is on account of death that divorce cannot take place, it follows that the same circumstance in the present case precludes the words, “if it please God,” and thereby prevents them from operating to annul the first words in their effect, and thus it would appear that on account of the woman's dying as above, the divorce should take place upon her, she not having expired until after the words, “you are divorced,” and before the utterance of the reservation, “if it please God.”

REPLY.—Death operates to the prevention of divorce on account of its cutting off the subject of it; but it does not prevent the effect of the reservation in the present case, as the validity of reservation depends upon that of the declaration, which rests upon the husband, who is still living: but it would be otherwise if he should die before having uttered the reservation, as in that case it is not added to the preceding words.

Divorce pronounced with an exception in point of number, takes place accordingly.—

If a man say to his wife, “you are under three divorces all but one,” two divorces take place; and if he say, “all but two,” one divorce takes place; for it is a rule that this figure of speech termed Istisna, is expressive of a remainder from the whole of a given number from which an exception is made; and this is approved, because there is no difference whatever between a man's saying (for example), “I owe such an one nine Dirms,” or, “I owe such an one ten Dirms all but one;” wherefore this mode of speaking by the exception of a part from the whole is approved, because it amounts to a mention, simply, of what remains after the exception is made, as in the present instance.

BUT the exception of the whole from the whole is disapproved, since, after exception of the whole, nothing whatever remains, the mention of which might be established; and hence, if a man say to his wife, “you are under three divorces all but three, the three divorces take place upon her, because the exception of a whole from a whole is nugatory, and therefore not admitted to have any effect.

AND here, as in the preceding cases, the exception is of no effect, unless it be immediately connected with what goes before, namely, the sentence of divorce.

CHAPTER V.

OF THE DIVORCE OF THE SICK.*

A wife divorced by a dying husband inherits if he die before the expiration of her Edit.—If a man, lying on his death-bed, re-

* By the Mussulman law, a woman, on the death of her husband, is entitled to an inheritance from his estate; but it is possible that the husband may sometimes be induced, from personal dislike, or other motive, where he finds himself dying, to repudiate his wife, in order to exclude her from her right of inheritance, in the event of his death; an injustice which the rules and cautions laid pudiate his wife either by one irreversible divorce, or by three divorces, and die before the expiration of her Edit, she is still entitled to her inheritance from his estate: but if he should not die until after the accomplishment of her Edit, she has no claim. Shafei maintains that she is not an inheritress in either case, as the matrimonial connexion, which was the cause of her inheritance, is dissolved by the divorce; whence it is that if this man were to repudiate his wife by an irreversible divorce, and she were to die within her Edit, before the decease of her husband, the husband does not inherit of her, the matrimonial connexion which was the cause of that relationship which entitled to inheritance no longer remaining. To this our doctors reply that the matrimonial connexion at a time of a mortal illness is a cause of inheritance with respect to the wife: but where the husband is desirous of defeating this right by giving an irreversible divorce, his intention is resisted, by postponing the effect of his sentence of divorce to the expiration of his wife's Edit, in order to shield her from injury; and such procrastination is possible, as a marriage is accounted still to subsist during the Edit, with respect to various of its effects, such as the obligations of alimony, residence, and so forth: and hence it may lawfully be accounted to continue in force with respect to the woman's inheritance: but, as soon as the Edit is accomplished, a further procrastination is impossible, because the marriage does not then continue in any shape whatever. The case, however, is very different where the wife happens to die before her husband (as mentioned by Shafei), for in this instance the connubial connexion is not a cause of inheritance in the husband (in virtue of his right as connected with her property), because she was not sick but in health at the time of his pronouncing divorce and the connexion is dissolved with respect to his right, especially where he himself manifests his desire that it should be so, by pronouncing upon her an irreversible divorce; since as the connexion would be dissolved though he were not desirous of the annulment of his right, it follows that it is so where he is desirous, a fortiori. The mode in which the connexion may be dissolved without the consent of the husband is by the wife, upon her death-bed, admitting the son of her husband to carnal connexion and dying within her Edit, in which case the husband would not inherit of her, the matrimonial connexion with respect to him becoming null, notwithstanding he does not consent to such annulment.

Unless she be divorced at her own request, or by her own option, or for a compensation.—If a woman require her husband, who is sick, to repudiate her by an irreversible divorce, and he accordingly pronounce the same upon her,—or, if he desire her to choose, and she choose herself,—or, if she procure divorce of him in the manner of Khoola, that is, for a compensation, and he afterwards die before the expiration of her Edit,—she does not inherit of him, because the only reason for postponing the effect of the divorce is a regard for her right, to the destruction of which she in this case consents. But if she require him to repudiate her by a reversible divorce, and he pronounce three divorces upon her, she inherits, because a reversible divorce does not dissolve the marriage; and hence her requisition of such a divorce does not imply her consent to the destruction of her right.

In case of any possible collusion between the parties, by the husband, after a declared divorce, acknowledging himself indebted to her, or bequeathing her a legacy, she receives whatever may be of least value, inheritance, debt, or legacy.—If a man, upon his death-bed, declare that he had repudiated his wife by three divorces, at such a time, during health, that her Edit had passed, and she confirm this, and he afterwards make an acknowledgment of his being indebted to her in a certain sum, or bequeath her a legacy, she will, in the event of his decease, be entitled to that sum of the three which is the least, the legacy, the debt, or her proper inheritance: that is to say, if her inheritance be of smaller amount than the debt or the legacy, it goes to her, and so of the others. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples say that the acknowledgment or bequest are either of them legal, and therefore that the woman is entitled either to the whole of the acknowledged debt, or to the entire legacy (provided that does not exceed the third, or devisable portion of his property), as the case may be. And if the husband, in conformity with the requisition of his wife, pronounce three divorces upon her on his death-bed, and afterwards acknowledge himself indebted to her in a certain sum, or bequeath her a legacy, she is in this case entitled to whatever is of least value, the debt, the legacy, or the inheritance, according to all, except Ziffer, who says that she is entitled to the whole bequest (not exceeding the third of his property), or to the whole of the debt acknowledged, because her right to inheritance being annulled by her requisition of divorce, the obstruction to the legality of the acknowledgment or bequest (namely, the matrimonial connexion), is removed. The argument of the disciples, with respect to the former case, is that when the husband and wife agree respecting his having divorced her, and her down in this chapter are intended to counteract and guard against; some of them are also designed to counteract any fraudulent collusion between the wife and her dying husband, to the prejudice of his heirs.

* This, which is termed Sils Mal, is fully explained in the Book of Wills, Vol. IV.

Edit having passed, she from that period becomes a stranger to him, and he no longer remains liable to suspicion (that is to say, in the present case, suspicion of his preferring her before his other heirs, and giving her more than her right, which is inheritance), whence it is that his evidence to her advantage is credited; and it is also lawful for him to pay her his Zakat, or to marry her sister, or for her to marry another man: contrary to the second case, as there the Edit still remains unaccomplished, and the continuance of that affords ground for such suspicion: now the subject of suspicion is a circumstance as yet concealed and unknown. wherefore the ground for suspicion is regarded, and not the actual fact suspected or apprehended; and as the continuance of the Edit affords ground of suspicion, the effect of suspicion is established, namely, the invalidity of acknowledgment, or bequest; and hence also is established the incredibility of the evidence of husband or wife respecting each other: as well as the incredibility of evidence, in respect to relations either by blood or by marriage: since marriage and affinity are grounds of suspicion. The argument of Hancefa is that suspicion exists in either instance; in the second, because a woman may choose divorce, in order to open to her the door of acknowledgment, or bequest, so that she may receive more than her proper inheritance; and in the first, because it may happen that the husband and wife may form a collusion, and agree to hold forth their separation and the completion of her Edit, in order that he may be enabled to favour her, by giving her more than her just inheritance; and the suspicion is confirmed where the subsequent acknowledgment or bequest appears to be of more value than the inheritance, on which account it is that such process is rejected, and the rule dictates that she shall receive the smallest of the three, the debt, the bequest, or the inheritance.—It is here to be observed that no suspicion exists respecting the proper amount of the woman's inheritance, that being adjusted in proportion to the whole property inherited, according to established rules.—Neither are Zakat or evidence subjects of suspicion, as a husband and wife are never known to form a collusion for the purpose of enabling him to give her the Zakat upon his property, to be bear evidence in any matter affecting her.

Divorce pronounced in a situation of danger cuts off the wife from her inheritance, unless the danger be imminent or certain.—If a husband being in a besieged town, or in an army, repudiate his wife by three divorces, she does not inherit of him in the event of his death, although that should happen within her Edit:—but if a man engaged in fight, or a criminal carrying to execution, were in such situation to pronounce three divorces upon his wife, she inherits where he dies in that way, or is slain; for it is a rule that the wife of a Faar

(or Evader*), inherits of him, upon a favourable construction of the law; and his evasion cannot be established but where her right is inseparably connected with his property, which is not the case, unless he be [at the time of pronouncing divorce] sick of a dangerous illness (appearing from his being confined to his bed, and other symptoms), or in such other situation as affords room to apprehend his death: but it is not established where he pronounces divorce in a situation in which his safety is more probable than his destruction:—thus, a man who is in a fort or town besieged, or one who resides in an army, cannot be said to be in any imminent danger, the former of these situations being designed for security against the enemy, and the latter to repel his attacks;—whereas one engaged in fight, or carrying to execution, is in circumstances of imminent danger; and consequently the evasion is established in the latter circumstance, but not in the former.—There are various cases recorded corresponding with these at present recited, and which proceed upon the same rules.—It is to be observed, however, that what is here said, viz. “where he dies that way, or is “slain,” shows that there is no essential difference between the two cases, where he dies in the way mentioned, or in any other way, the same as a husband confined to a sick bed, who happens to be slain.

A conditional divorce pronounced in sickness, does not cut off the wife from her inheritance, unless the condition be her own act.—If a man, being in health, say to his wife, “when the first of such a month arrives”—(or)—“when you enter this house”—(or)—“when such an one repeats evening prayers”—(or)—“when such an one enters this house,”—“you are under divorce,” and the thing mentioned take place at a time when he is sick, she does not inherit of him:—but if he were to make such a condition upon his death-bed, she inherits in all these cases except one, namely, “when you enter this house.”—It is to be observed that the suspensions now treated of are of four different kinds;—FIRST, where divorce is suspended upon the arrival of a specified time;—SECONDLY, where it is suspended upon the act of a stranger;—THIRDLY, where it is suspended upon the act of the husband himself;—and FOURTHLY, where it is suspended upon the act of the woman; and each of these again are of two descriptions; one, where the suspension is declared in health, and the condition occurs in sickness; the other, where both take place in sickness. In the two first instances, namely where the husband suspends the divorce upon the arrival of a specified time, by saying, "when the first of such a month arrives you are under divorce," or where he suspends it upon the act of a stranger, by saying, "when such an one enters the house," (or) "when such an one repeats evening prayers," if the suspension and the condition both occur in sickness, the woman is entitled to inherit of her husband, because his intention here appears to be evasion, from the circumstance of his suspending divorce at a time when the wife's right is inseparably connected with his property: but if the suspension take place in health, and the condition in sickness, the woman does not inherit of him.—Ziffer says that in this last case also she inherits, because whatever is suspended upon a condition takes place on the occurrence of that condition, and is then like the fulfilment of a promise; and also, because in this case divorce occurs during sickness.—The argument of our doctors is that the antecedent suspension induces divorce at the time of the occurrence of the condition consequentially, but not designedly, and injury is not established but from design; the act of the husband, therefore, is not to be set aside by the annulment of its effect, namely, non-inheritance. And, in the third instance (that is where the husband suspends the divorce upon his own act), he is considered as an evader, and the woman inherits of him, whether the suspension take place in health, and the condition in sickness, or both occur in sickness; and also, whether the act be of an avoidable or an unavoidable nature; the reason of which is, that the husband on this occasion evidently designs to defeat his wife's right, whether by the suspension, or by producing the condition during a mortal illness.

OBJECTION.—It would seem that the husband is not an evader where the condition is an act of an unavoidable nature.

REPLY.—In the case now under consideration, although the act of condition be unavoidable by him, yet it is in his power to avoid the suspension of divorce upon that act, and hence his act is set aside, in order that the woman may not be injured.

Provided that act be of an avoidable nature.

—AND in the fourth instance (that is, where the husband suspends divorce upon an act of the wife), if the suspension and condition both occur in sickness, and the act be of such a nature as may be avoided by the woman (such as speaking to Zeyd, for instance), she does not inherit, as she in this case consents to a divorce; but if the act be of a nature unavoidable by her (such as eating and drinking, or prayer, or conversing with her parents), she is entitled to inherit of her husband, as she is compelled to the performance of such acts, since, if she were not to perform them, there is fear of her perishing either in this world or the next; and consent cannot exist where she acts from unavoidable necessity; but if the suspension take place in health, and the condition in sickness, and the act be of a nature avoidable by the woman, she does not inherit, for evident reasons. And where the act is of an unavoidable nature, the rule is the same, with Mohammed and Ziffer (that is, she does not inherit), because, on this occasion, no act appears on the part of the husband, after the connexion of the wife's right with his property.—With the two Elders, on the contrary, she does inherit, because the husband in this case obliges her to the commission of that act, and for that reason the act becomes his own, she being only as his instrument; as in a case of compulsion, a compellee being one who is straitened between two things, in which predicament the wife here stands, since, if she perform the act of condition, she sustains the injury of divorce, and if she refrain she is in danger of perishing either here or hereafter.

Where recovery intervenes between a sickbed divorce and the death of the husband, the wife is cut off from inheritance.—If a man pronounce upon his wife three divorces in sickness, and afterwards recover his health, but happen to die before the expiration of her Edit, she does not inherit.—Ziffer says that she inherits, because the husband in this case appears to have intended evasion; but to this our doctors reply that the sickness in which divorce was pronounced having been removed by the intermediate recovery of health, the last sickness which follows, is the same as health, whence it appears that her right is not connected with his property, and therefore the husband is not an evader in divorcing her.

And so also where her apostacy intervenes.

—If a sick person pronounce three divorces upon his wife, and she afterwards apostatize from the faith, and again return to it, and the husband then die before the expiration of her Edit, she does not inherit of him.

But not where her incest intervenes.—If, however, she were not to apostatize, but should admit the son of her husband to carnal connexion, she inherits.—The difference between those two cases is, that by apostacy her capacity of inheritance is destroyed; whereas, by admitting the son of her husband to the commission of the carnal act it is not so, for although this renders her prohibited to her husband, yet it does not forbid her competency of inheritance, since prohibition and inheritance may be united in the same person (as, for instance, in a mother or a sister), wherefore she inherits in this case: but it would be different if she were to admit the son of her husband to carnal connexion during the existence of marriage, because separation is the consequence, whence it appears that she consents to the destruction of the matrimonial connexion, which is the occasion of her inheritance, whereas, if she admit the son of her husband to carnal connexion after the latter having pronounced three divorces upon her, prohibition is not established by that act as it had been already established by divorce.

Divorce occasioned by the slander of a dying husband does not cut off his wife from her inheritance.—If a man, being in health, slander his wife, that is, accuse her of adultery, and afterwards make assavocation respecting the same on his death-bed, she inherits of him.—Mohammed says that she does not inherit: but if the slander be also declared upon his death-bed, she inherits, according to all our doctors.—The reason of this is that the slander amounts to the suspension of divorce upon a thing unavoidable by the woman, as it constrains her to opposition,* that she may remove from herself the scandal of the imputation.

And so also of a death-bed divorce occasioned by an Aila.—If a man make an Aila,† or vow of abstinence, from his wife, during health, and she become divorced, in consequence of it when he is upon his death-bed, she does not inherit of him; because Aila is a vow of abstinence from carnal connexion with her for the space of four months, which at the end of that period occasions divorce, and hence it amounts to a suspension of divorce upon the arrival of a specified time, being the same as if he had said to her, “upon the lapse of four months, if I have not carnal connexion with you within that period, you are divorced;” which was already explained.

Where a death-bed divorce is reversible, the wife inherits in every case.—If a man upon his death-bed repudiate his wife by a reversible divorce, she inherits of him in all the cases here recited, because the marriage is not finally dissolved, since it continues lawful for him to have carnal connexion with her; and such being the case, the principle upon which she inherits stands still unimpeached.

NOTE.—In all these cases where it is said that the wife inherits, it means, “in case of the decease of the husband, before the expiration of her Edit,”—the reason of which has been already mentioned.

CHAPTER VI.

OF RIJAAT, OR RETURNING TO A DIVORCED WIFE.

Definition of Rijaat.—RIJAAT in its primitive sense means restitution, in law it signifies a husband returning to, or receiving back, his wife after divorce, and restoring her to her former situation, in which she was not liable to separation from the passing of her courses, or of the space of time corresponding with their periods, and which she recovers by Rijaat; this is the definition of it in the Jama Ramooz; from what occurs respecting it in the present work, it appears simply to mean the continuance of marriage.

A man may return to a wife repudiated by one or two reversible divorces.—If a man give his wife one or two divorces reversible, he may take her back any time before the expiration of her Edit, whether she be desirous or not, God having said in the Koran, “YE MAY RETAIN THEM WITH HUMANITY,” where no distinction is made with respect to the wife’s pleasure, or otherwise; and by the word retain is here understood Rijaat, or returning to, according to all the commentators.

Provided he do so before the expiration of her Edit.—THE existence of the Edit is a condition of Rijaat, because by Rijaat is understood a continuance of the marriage (whence the term retain is applied to it), and the this cannot be established but during the Edit since after that is past the marriage no longer remains.

Rijaat is of two kinds, express and implied.—RIJAAT is of two species; the FIRST is termed express, where the husband says, for example, “I have returned to (or taken back) my wife, or addresses the same to her personally; and the SECOND implied, where he has carnal connexion, or takes conjugal liberties with her, such as viewing those parts of her which are usually concealed, and so forth. This second description of Rijaat is according to our doctors. Shatei says that the Rijaat is not approved, or regular, but where it is expressly pronounced by the husband (provided he be able to speak), because Rijaat stands as a marriage de novo, and (according to him) carnal connexion with the wife is in this case prohibited, on account of its legality having been annulled by the divorce, which is a dissolver of marriage, for it would appear that the marriage is itself dissolved by a divorce, although it be of the reversible kind, were it not that the law there leaves to the husband an option of Rijaat, which is the sole reason why he confines its effect to the prohibition of carnal connexion, and does not extend it to a dissolution of the marriage itself. The argument of our doctors is that that by Rijaat is understood a continuance of the marriage, as was before explained; and this may be shown by an act, as well as by words, for acts sometimes evince continuance, as in the case of abolishing the option of a seller; that is to say, in the same manner as the abolition of the option of a seller (which is the continuance of property) is proved by an act, so also in the present case; now acts peculiar to marriage are signs of the continuance of it; and the carnal connexion, or other acts, as before stated, are

* That is to say, forces her to require her husband to verify his accusation by a Laan, or solemn assavocation, before the magistrate, which, if he does so, occasions divorce.—For a full explanation of this, see Chap. X. treating of Laan.

peculiar to marriage, especially in the case of free women, since, with respect to them, they cannot be lawful but through marriage, and, with respect to female slaves, they are sometimes lawful by right of marriage, and sometimes by right of possession: contrary to touching, or looking at the pudenda of a woman, without lust, because that is sometimes lawful without marriage, as in the case of a physician or midwife; and the sight of other parts than the pudenda sometimes happens to people who reside together; and if a wife resides with her husband during her Edit, if such an accident were to imply Rijaat, he might then give her another divorce to her injury, as it would protract her Edit.

The evidence of witnesses to Rijaat laudable, but not incumbent.—It is laudable that the husband have two witnesses to bear evidence to his Rijaat; yet if he have no witnesses the Rijaat is nevertheless legal, according to one opinion of Shafci.—Malik holds that it is not lawful without witnesses, God having so commanded, saying, in the Koran, “RETAIN THEM WITH HUMANITY, OR DISMISS THEM WITH KINDNESS, AND TAKE THE EVIDENCE OF TWO WITNESSES OF YOUR OWN PEOPLE, AND SUCH AS ARE OF JUST REPUTE;” where, the imperative being of injunctive import, the taking of evidence appears to be incumbent. To this our doctors reply, that in all the texts which occur concerning Rijaat, it is mentioned generally, and not under any restriction of being witnessed; moreover, by Rijaat is to be understood (as was before stated) the continuance of marriage, to which evidence is not a necessary condition; as in a case of Aila, for instance, where it (the Aila or vow of abstinence) is done away by the carnal act, to which there are no witnesses: but yet the taking evidence to Rijaat is laudable, for the greater caution, so as to put it out of the power of any person to contradict it. With respect to the sacred text quoted by Malik, the imperative is to be taken, not in an injunctive, but in a recommendatory sense; for in this instance retaining them, and separating from them, are connected by the intermediate particle “or,” the text saying, “RETAIN THEM, OR DISMISS THEM, AND TAKE TWO WITNESSES,” &c., from which it appears that the calling witnesses is laudable only, and not injunctive, in the present case, because, in separation, it is held to be laudable only by all the doctors.

The wife should have due notice of it.—It is also laudable that the husband give his wife previous information of his intention of Rijaat, lest she fall into sin; for, if she be not aware of his intention, it is possible that she may marry another husband after the accomplishment of her Edit, and that he may have carnal connexion with her by an invalid marriage, which is prohibited.

A declaration of previous Rijaat, made after the expiration of the Edit, is to be credited where both parties agree in it.—If, after the accomplishment of the woman's Edit, her husband were to declare that he had taken her back before the expiration of it, and she confirm this, Rijaat is established; but if she deny the fact, her declaration is credited, because the husband in this case pretends to have performed an act which is not at present in his power, and his declaration is therefore liable to suspicion, and is not to be credited unless that be removed by the woman's confirmation. It is to be observed that the oath of the woman (according to Haneefa) is not necessary. This is one of the six cases of Isthillaf,* which are discussed at large in the Book of Marriage.

But not when they disagree.—If a man, having repudiated his wife by a revocable divorce, afterwards say to her, “I take you back,” and she reply, “my Edit is past,” the Rijaat is not valid, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that it is valid, because it occurs within the Edit, that being accounted to continue until the woman gives notice of its completion; and in this case the Rijaat takes place before such notice; hence also it is that if the husband say to her, “I have divorced you,” and she reply, “my Edit is passed,” still divorce takes place. The argument of Haneefa is that that the Rijaat appears to occur after the completion of the Edit, because the wife is trustee with respect to her declaration of her Edit being completed: and as to the case of divorce cited by the two disciples, it is not admitted by Haneefa, for divorce in such a circumstance, according to his opinion, would not take place: admitting, however, that it did take place, it may be replied that divorce takes place from the declaration of the husband, after the completion of the Edit (by his saying “that he had divorced her during her Edit”), because this is a severity† upon himself, and may therefore be allowed credit; contrary to returning to a wife, as that cannot be established by a declaration made after the expiration of the Edit, since such declaration affects another person.

The declaration of a wife who is a slave must be credited respecting the termination of her Edit.—If the husband of a female slave, after her Edit is past, declare that he had taken her back during her Edit, and her owner confirm his declaration, but she herself deny it, she is to be credited, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that the confirmation of her owner is to be credited, because her person is his property, and hence he makes a declaration in favour of the husband, respecting a thing which is his particular right; this, therefore, is analogous to a case where a master makes a declaration concerning his slave's marriage; that is to say, if a man assert that he had married the female slave of such an one after the expiration of her Edit, she denying and her master confirming his assertion, the declaration of the master is to be credited in preference to that of the slave; and so likewise in the case in question. To this our doctors reply that the efficiency of Rijaat is founded upon the Edit, because, if that still exist, the former is good and valid, but not otherwise; and as the declaration of the female slave is to be regarded concerning her Edit, it must in the same manner be regarded with respect to what is founded upon it. But if the above case be reversed,—that is, if the slave confirm and the owner deny the husband's assertion,—the denial of the owner is to be credited, according to the two disciples (and also according to Haneefa, in the Kawayet Saheeh), because her Edit no longer remains, and the right to the Matat, or present,* rests with her owner; wherefore her assertion is not to be credited to the prejudice of her master's right, as she is in this case liable to suspicion: contrary to the former case, in which the owner, by confirming the assertion of the husband, acknowledges the continuance of Edit at the period of Rijaat; and supposing this to be the case, his [the owner's] authority disappears; his right, therefore, is not injured by her denial, and hence that is to be credited. If, however, in this case the female slave assert that her Edit is past, and the husband and owner unite in saying that it is not past, her assertion is to be credited, she being trustee with respect to what she says, as having sole information upon the point in dispute.

* Cases treating of the necessity of a wife's confirming any question respecting her marriage by oath.

† Because (if she had been before under two sentences of divorce) this is a third sentence, which repudiates her from him by the rigorous prohibition.

At what time the power of Rijaat terminates.—WHEN the menstrual discharge, in the third courses after divorce, continues for ten days, onwards, the power of Rijaat terminates upon the stoppage, although the woman should not yet have performed her customary ablutions: but if it stop within less than ten days, the power of Rijaat does not terminate till such time as the ablutions are performed, or the hour of prayer is past. The reason of this is that a menstruation is not accounted to exceed the space of ten days, and hence the woman's purification is understood on the instant of the stoppage, at any time beyond that period; and the power of Rijaat consequently terminates; whereas, when it stops within that period, it is possible that it may still return, and hence her purification cannot be finally determined until the customary ceremonies of ablution, &c., are performed. What is now advanced applies to the case of Mussulman women only; but with Kitabees the power of Rijaat terminates on the instant of stoppage of the menstrual discharge in the third courses after divorce, although it should happen within ten days, because with such women no other sign is requisite to establish purification than the simple cessation, as they are not held, by our doctors, to be subject to the injunction of the law in this particular.

THE power of Rijaat terminates where the woman performs the teyummim,* and repeats the usual prayers, according to Haneefa and Abou Yoosaf. This proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law. Moham-med says that it terminates immediately upon the performance of teyummim; and this opinion is conformable to analogy, because the teyummim, where water is not to be had, stands as a purification, having the same virtue with ablution, as being a substitute for it.—The argument of Haneefa and Abou Yoosaf is that sand or dust is rather a defiler than a purifier, as it soils the body, and the latter even adheres to it; and rubbing the body therewith is admitted to be a purification from necessity only; but this necessity does not absolutely exist until the proper hour of prayer arrives; and that which is established through necessity is restricted in its virtue to the particular point which occasions the necessity; and hence the teyummim is regarded with respect to prayer only, and not with respect to the termination of the Edit. Some doctors have delivered it as the opinion of the two Elders, that the power of Rijaat terminates upon the commencement of prayer: others say that it does not terminate until the conclusion, in order that the rule respecting the repetition of prayer may be fulfilled.

WHERE the woman, in performing ablution, omits any part of her person, if it be a complete limb (such as the hand or foot, for instance), or more, the power of Rijaat does not terminate:† but if the part omitted be less than a limb (a finger, for instance) it terminates. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this rule proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law; for analogy* would dictate, in this case, that if a complete limb be through forgetfulness omitted, the power of Rijaat discontinues, because the woman has performed the ablation upon the greatest number of her limbs, and the rule of the whole applies to the greatest number; whereas, on the other hand, in the omission of any part short of a complete limb, it would suggest that the power of Rijaat still remains, because the laws respecting Janayat and the courses do not admit of division, and hence, where the power of Rijaat remains with respect to a part, it continues with respect to the whole, as in the liberty of prayer, for instance; in short, analogy requires that the rule be the same in both cases: but the reason for a more favourable construction is that there is an essential difference in the two cases, because any part short of a complete limb soon becomes dry, especially in hot weather, and hence it is not certain but that part may have undergone ablation together with the rest, for which reason it is here said that the Rijaat terminates; whereas a complete limb does not quickly become dry; neither can the omission of so large a portion of the person, in ablation, be ascribed to forgetfulness. It is recorded from Abou Yoosaf that the omission of ablation with respect to the mouth or nostrils is the same, as with respect to a complete limb; but it is elsewhere recorded from him that these stand the same as any part short of a complete limb (and of this opinion is Mohammed), because there is a difference of opinion concerning the divine injunction directing the ablation of those parts.

* According to the Mussulman law, no religious act can be performed without a previous purification, by ablution, where water is to be had, or, in defect of water, by teyummim, that is, rubbing the hands, face, and other parts of the body, with sand or dust. A woman, while in a state of impurity, is incapable of any religious act; and hence this formal purification is requisite upon the stoppage of the menstrual discharge. The point upon which the case here considered turns is whether, as the teyummim is only a substitute for ablution, the power of Rijaat continues until her repetition of prayer, or whether it terminates immediately upon the performance of that act.

† That is, as the ablution is in this case incomplete, the power of Rijaat does not terminate until prayer; but when that is repeated, it terminates of course,—the woman's purification being then fully ascertained.

*A husband may take back an unenjoyed divorced wife, provided she be delivered of a child within such a time as establishes its parentage in him.—If a man divorce a wife who is pregnant, or who has brought forth a child, and declare that he has never had carnal connexion with her, he is nevertheless at liberty to take her back, because where the pregnancy appears within such time as renders it possible to be derived from him, to him it is to be ascribed; and this circumstance proves his connexion with her, whence a right of Rijaat is established in him, as the divorce thus appears to be reversible; and in the same manner, where the parentage of the child born of her is established in him, his connexion with her is also established; and it thus appearing that she has been enjoyed by him, the divorce is consequently reversible; and his declaration is in either case null, as the law denies it, because, by ascribing the woman's pregnancy, or the birth of the child, to the carnal act of the husband, it establishes her marriage, and consequently his right of Rijaat, a fortiori. It is to be observed that by the husband divorcing a wife who has brought forth a child is here meant divorce after delivery; for if the child were born after the divorce, the Edit would be thereby accomplished, and the power of Rijaat would terminate of course.

A man acknowledging that he had never consummated with his divorced wife has no power of Rijaat, although he have been in retirement with her.—If a man retire with his wife in such a way as amounts to a Khalwat Saheeh, and afterwards divorce her, declaring that he has not had carnal connexion, he has no power of Rijaat, because that would have been confirmed to him by his commission of the carnal act; but he acknowledges that this has not taken place, and hence his declaration is credited, as it operates to the prejudice of his right; and the law does not on this occasion deny his declaration, because a woman's right to her stipulated dower is founded upon her making delivery of her person, and not upon her husband's seisin of it: contrary to the former case, as there the law is repugnant to the husband's declaration.

If a man divorce his wife after a retirement, and again take her back, and afterwards assert that he has not had carnal connexion with her, and she should be delivered of a child within a day short of two years after divorce, the Rijaat is valid notwithstanding his assertion, because the parentage of the child is established in him, as the woman had not declared the completion of her Edit, and a child may be supposed to continue so long in the womb, whence the husband is considered as having had carnal connexion with her before divorce, because if her pregnancy were ascribed to such connexion after divorce, the marriage stands dissolved on the instant of divorce, on account of its not having been then consummated; and of course the subsequent carnal connexion is unlawful; and Mussulmans are not supposed to commit any unlawful acts.

Rijaat may be established by the birth of a child.—If a man suspend the divorce of his wife upon the circumstance of her producing a child, and she be delivered of a child, and again of another within not less than six months after, although it were more than two years, Rijaat is established,* provided the woman have not declared the completion of her Edit, because divorce taking place upon the woman in consequence of her first delivery, Edit was incumbent upon her; and her second child must be supposed to pro-

* To understand the scope of this case, it is requisite to advert to one of the fundamental laws of divorce,—that a divorce pronounced upon a woman with whom the husband has not had carnal connexion is, in all cases, irreversible. The case here considered supposes the husband to have repudiated his wife by a sentence of divorce undefined, that is, without specifying whether it is reversible or irreversible; for if he were to declare it under the latter description, it holds so at all events.

* That is to say, the man is considered as having taken back his wife. (See the beginning of this chapter.)

ced from an embrace of the husband during the Edit, which act on his part amounts to a formal reversal of the divorce.

If a man say to his wife, "every time that you produce a child you are under divorce," and she be delivered of three children at three separate births, that is, within not less than six months of each other, Rijaat is established by the birth of the second child, and in the same manner by that of the third, because, upon the birth of the first, divorce takes place, and Edit is incumbent, and upon that of the second Rijaat is established, for the reason before observed, that it must be supposed to proceed from an embrace of the husband during the Edit; and a second divorce takes place, because the husband has suspended divorce upon childbirth with the expression, "every time that," and Edit is incumbent in consequence of this divorce; and by the birth of the third, Rijaat is again established, for the same reason as above, and a third divorce takes place in the same manner as the second: and in this case the Edit is to be counted by the courses, because the woman is not pregnant, but subject to courses, at the period of each divorce taking place upon her.

A woman under reversible divorce may adorn herself.—It is allowed to a woman under reversible divorce to adorn herself, as she is lawful to her husband on account of their marriage still holding; and as Rijaat is laudable, and her adorning of her person may excite him to it, the action is therefore permitted by the law.

A man must not approach a reversibly divorced wife without giving her intimation.—It is not proper for a man, having a wife under reversible divorce, to approach her without previous intimation, or letting her hear his footsteps:—this is where he has no intention of Rijaat; because a woman is sometimes undressed, and it might happen that if he were to come upon her unawares he would see parts of her, the sight of which occasions Rijaat; and this not being his intention, he would give her another divorce, which would protract her Edit.

A divorced wife cannot be carried upon a journey until Rijaat be established.—A MAN cannot carry with him, upon a journey, a wife whom he has repudiated by a reversible divorce, until he have called witnesses to bear evidence to his Rijaat. —Ziffer says that the husband has such a power, because their marriage still hold; which is the reason why he may lawfully have carnal connexion with her, according to Haneefa.—The arguments of our doctors are twofold:—FIRST, the word of GOD, who has said, "TAKE THEM NOT FORTH FROM THEIR DWELLINGS," where the text applies to the women under reversible divorce, the carrying of whom upon a journey is the removal of them from their dwellings, and is therefore illegal.—SECONDLY, the only reason why the effect of a sentence of reversible divorce is postponed to the accomplishment of the Edit is, the possible intention or wish of the husband to take back his wife; but where he does not do so before the Edit is accomplished, it appears that he had no such wish or intention, in which case it would be evident that the sentence took effect upon the instant of his pronouncing it, and that the wife was consequently separated from that period; for if the effect of the sentence were in reality restricted to the completion of the Edit, another Edit would then always be requisite after the first; and hence, as it appears that the wife is, in effect, as a stranger to her husband, from the time of the sentence of divorce, it follows that he has no authority to carry her forth; whence it is here said that he cannot carry her upon a journey until he has called witnesses to bear evidence to his Rijaat;—in which case the Edit is annulled, and his authority re-established.

Cohabitation is not made illegal by a reversible divorce.—CARNAL connexion with a wife is not rendered illegal by a reversible divorce, according to our doctors. Shafci maintains that it is rendered illegal thereby, since the connubial connexion is dissolved, because of the appearance of that which terminates marriage, namely, his sentence of divorce. The argument of our doctors is that the connubial tie still continues, inasmuch that the husband is at liberty to take back his wife, even against her will, because a right of Rijaat is reserved to him out of tenderness, in order that he may be enabled to recover his wife when he becomes ashamed of having divorced her; and this necessarily implying that he is empowered to recover her, his being so proves that Rijaat is a continuance of the marriage, and not a marriage de novo, as a man cannot marry a woman against her will. With respect to what Shafci advances, that "the connubial connexion is dissolved on account of the appearance of that which terminates marriage, namely, his sentence of divorce," it may be replied that the effect of the terminator is postponed to the completion of the Edit, according to all the doctors, out of tenderness to the husband, as above.

Section.

Of Circumstances which render a divorced Wife lawful to her Husband.

A man may marry a wife repudiated from him by one or two irreversible divorces.—In a case of irreversible divorce, short of three divorces, the husband is at liberty to marry his wife again, either during her Edit, or after its completion, as the legality of the subject still continues, since the utter extinction of such legality depends upon a third divorce; and accordingly until a third divorce take place, the legality of the subject continues.

OBJECTION.—If the legality of the subject continue, it follows that it is lawful for any other person besides the husband to marry the wife during her Edit.

REPLY.—Her marriage with any other during her Edit is forbidden, on account of its inducing a doubtful parentage; but if the husband marry her, this objection can not exist.

But if by three divorces he cannot marry her until she be previously married to another man.—If a man pronounce three divorces upon a wife who is free, or two upon one who is a slave, she is not lawful to him until she shall first have been regularly espoused by another man; who, having duly consummated, afterwards divorces her, or dies, and her Edit from him be accomplished, because God has said, “IF HE DIVORCE HER, SHE IS NOT, AFTER THAT, LAWFUL TO HIM” (that is after a third divorce) “UNTIL SHE MARRY ANOTHER HUSBAND.” And here two divorces to a slave are the same as three to a free woman, because the legality of the subject has only half its force in a slave, on account of her state of bondage; and hence it would follow that, to such an one, a divorce and a half stands the same as three divorces to a free woman, but as divorce is incapable of subdivision, two divorces are allowed. As to what is said, that the second husband duly consummating is a condition, it is founded on the text here quoted, in which the word Nikkah [marriage] implies carnal connexion, as it bears two meanings, by one of which it signifies carnal conjunction, and by the other the legal union of the sexes, and it is on this occasion taken in the former sense; but even admitting that the word Nikkah, in the text, meant simply the marriage contract, yet the condition is established upon a well-known tradition of the prophet, who being questioned concerning a person's power of marrying again a wife who, after he had repudiated her by three divorces, had been married to another man, and whom, after retiring with her, and lifting her veil, that man had divorced, replied, “the woman is not lawful to her first husband until she has tasted the embrace of the other;” but the condition requires only the entrance of the penis into the vagina, and not the emission of seed, as the above tradition implies the entrance generally, whence that only is understood.

Nature of the consummation in the second marriage which renders a divorced wife again lawful to her first husband.—A YOUTH under puberty is the same as a full grown man with respect to legalizing; that is to say, if a man give his wife three divorces, and she, after her Edit, marry with a youth under maturity, and he perform the carnal act with her, she then [in case of his decease or divorce] becomes lawful to her first husband, because the condition, namely, entrance, in virtue of a regular marriage, is necessarily supposed to be fulfilled. Malik says that the carnal act of a full-grown man is the condition, because unless he be arrived at maturity the woman's tasting (that is, enjoying pleasure from) his embrace, which is the condition, is not fulfilled: but the cases before recited in the book of marriage disprove this distinction of Malik. It is to be observed, that it is recorded in the Jama Sagheer, that a boy under puberty, but who is such as to be able to perform the carnal embrace, is termed a Moorahiek; and where such an one has carnal knowledge of his wife, ablution is incumbent upon her, and she is thereby rendered lawful to a former husband. if he should have repudiated her by three divorces; and the carnal embrace of such an one is implied from the circumstance of his having a priapism and desire. It is also to be observed that ablution is made incumbent upon the woman, in the present case, only on account of the entrance of the boy's penis into her vagina exciting an emissio seminis on her part, the necessity thereof with respect to her being solely in consequence of her full puberty; but it is not incumbent upon the boy, he not being subject to the necessity of such observance; but yet it is required of him, that he may be habituated to a laudable custom.

A FEMALE slave, whom her husband has repudiated by two divorces, is not rendered lawful to him by the carnal embrace of her master, because that which is essential to her legality (namely, marriage) does not exist here.

The second marriage, when contracted under a legalizing condition, is disapproved; but yet the woman is rendered legal by it to her first husband.—If a man marry a woman whose husband had repudiated her by three divorces, under a condition of rendering her lawful to her former husband, as if he were to declare to her—“I marry you under a condition of rendering you lawful to your former husband,” or, as if she were to say to him—“I marry with you under the condition of my becoming lawful to my former husband,”—this is an abominable marriage, because the second husband is here termed a Mohullil, or legalizer, and the prophet has said, “let the curse of God fall upon the Mohullil and the Mohallal-le-hoo:” but nevertheless, if the parties contract a marriage under this condition, and the man divorce the woman after carnal connexion, she, upon the completion of her Edit, becomes lawful to her former husband, as there undoubtedly exists a consummation in a regular marriage, which is the cause of legality, and the marriage is not invalidated by the condition. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that such a marriage is null, as it falls under the description of a Nikkah Mowokket, or temporary marriage, because the words of the husband, “I marry you under a condition of rendering you lawful to your former husband,” imply, “I marry you until the time of our having carnal connexion, and not for an indefinite time, and is therefore the same as where a man says to a woman, “I marry you for a month,” and so forth; and the marriage being invalid, the woman cannot by that means be rendered lawful to her former husband: but in reply to this our doctors urge that the restriction of the marriage to any specified time is not expressly mentioned by the parties, nor does the man here marry the woman under any other condition than that of doing by her as marriage requires; and hence it does not come under the description of a temporary marriage. It is recorded from Mohammed that the marriage is legal and valid, for the reasons before mentioned; but yet the woman is not thereby made lawful to her first husband, because the second husband here endeavours to precipitate a thing which the law postpones (for the law postpones her legality to her former husband to the death of her present), and therefore meets a due return in the defeat of his design (to wit, legalizing the woman to her former husband); in the same manner as in the murder of an inheritee; that is to say, if any person slay his inheritee, he is thereby cut off from inheritance, as having attempted to precipitate that which the law has postponed, and thus meets his punishment in the defeat of his design (to wit, immediate inheritance); and so also in the present case.

The first husband, recovering his wife by an intervenient marriage, recovers his full power of divorce over her.—If a man repudiate his wife by one or by two divorces, and, her Edit being completed, she be married to another man, and afterwards return to her former husband, he becomes again authorized so far as three divorces, the one or the two divorces formerly pronounced upon her by him having been cancelled and obliterated by her marriage with the second husband, in the same manner as three divorces would have been.* This is the doctrine of the two Elders. Mohammed says that marriage with a second husband does not obliterate any thing short of three divorces. The proofs on either side are drawn from the Arabic.

The wife's declaration of her having been legalized is to be credited.—If a man pronounce three divorces upon his wife, and she afterwards declare that "her Edit having been duly accomplished, she has been married to another man, and enjoyed and divorced by him, and that her Edit from him is elapsed,"—her former husband may lawfully admit her asseveration, and marry her, provided that from the period of his divorcing her such a space of time have elapsed as affords a possibility of this having been the case, and that he actually believe her assertion to be true; because the substance of the woman's assertion is either a matter of mere temporal concern (as not comprehending any merit or demerit before God), or it is a matter of religion (on account of legality being suspended upon it), and the declaration of a single person, either in matters of a temporal or spiritual nature, is worthy of credit; and the confirmation of her assertion is not forbidden or reprobated, where the space of time which has intervened admits the possibility of its truth.—The learned differ concerning the shortest period which admits of this possibility, as shall be fully explained in treating of Edit.

CHAPTER VII.

OF AILA.

Definition of the term.—AILA, in its primitive sense, signifies a vow.—In law, it implies a husband swearing to abstain from carnal knowledge of his wife for any time above four months, if she be a free woman, or two months, if she be a slave.

The mode in which Aila is established.—If a man swear that he will not have carnal connexion with his wife,—or, that he will not have such connexion with her within four months,—an Aila is established; because God has said, "WHERE A MAN MAKES A VOW [Aila] WITH RESPECT TO HIS WIFE, HE MUST STAY FOUR MONTHS,"—to the end of the verse.

In breach of Aila expiation is incumbent.—If a man, in a case of Aila, have carnal knowledge of his wife within four months after, he is forsworn in his vow, and expiation is incumbent upon him, this being incurred by the breach of his vow; and the Aila drops, as his vow is cancelled by the breach of it.

But if it be observed, a divorce irreversible ensues at its termination.—But if he have not carnal knowledge of her for the space of four months, a divorce irreversible takes place, independent of any decree of separation from the magistrate.—Shafei says that a decree of the magistrate is requisite, because the husband here withholds her right (namely carnal connexion) from his wife, and hence the magistrate acts as his substitute, in effecting a separation; as in the case of eunuchs and impotent persons, in short, according to Shafei, a right to demand separation rests with the woman, in the same manner as in the case of her marriage to one who is impotent or an eunuch; and in consequence of a decree of the magistrate she becomes repudiated by a divorce irrever-

* That is to say, one or two divorces are obliterated, the same as three would be, had that been the number formerly pronounced by him. It is necessary to observe that this case involves a principle in divorce which is nowhere expressly mentioned; namely, that the same woman is not a legal subject of more than three divorces to any one man, and consequently, that a man who repudiates his wife by two divorces (for instance), if he marry her again, unless the intervention of another husband obliterate these two, has no power beyond one divorce in the second marriage.

sible.—The arguments of our doctors are two-fold:—FIRST, the husband, in abstaining from carnal connexion for the space of four months, acts unjustly towards his wife, by withholding from her that which is her right, for which the law makes him a due return, in depriving him of the benefit of marriage upon the expiration of that term; and this is an opinion recorded from Othman, and Alee, and Abdoola-Ibn-Mussaoood, and Abdoola-Ibn-Abbaas, and Abdoola-Ibn-Aumroo, and Zeyd-Ibn-Sabit:—SECONDLY, in times of ignorance* and Aila stood as a divorce, and the law afterwards constituted it a divorce postponed to the period of four months:—Now, if a man swear to abstain for four months, his vow drops at the expiration of that term; that is, if the same man should afterwards marry and cohabit with the same woman, he is not forsworn, because the vow was temporary; but if he should have sworn to abstain for ever, his vow continues in force, because it is general (that is to say, is not restricted to four months), and no violation appears by which it might be cancelled: yet divorce does not take place upon it repeatedly, unless where marriage is repeated, because, after separation, the withholding of the woman's right cannot be supposed to exist; but if, after separation, the vower were to marry her again, the Aila returns; and consequently, upon carnal cohabitation in this marriage, he would be forsworn; or, if he abstain, an irreversible divorce again takes place upon her, at the expiration of four months, as before, because the obligation of the vow continues, on account of its being general, and in consequence of the man marrying her again her right to carnal connexion is established, and of course his injustice in withholding it from her.—And here it is to be observed that the recommencement of the Aila is to be counted from the date of the second marriage; and if this man were again a third time to marry her, the Aila returns, and occasions an irreversible divorce at the expiration of four months, in case of the husband refraining from carnal connexion for that term, for the reasons already stated.—What is now advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the vower marrying the woman again without the intervention of her marriage with another man; but if, in the interim, she had been married to another man, divorce would not take place in consequence of the vower abstaining from carnal connexion for the space of four months, in the second marriage, because the vow is confined, in its effect, to divorce in the first or original propriety,* the Aila in the present case, being the same as if the husband were to suspend divorce upon his abstaining from carnal cohabitation for the space of four months, where the effect is restricted to the propriety then existing, and so in this case likewise.—This case is grafted on the case of obliteration, concerning which there is a difference of opinion between Ziffer and our doctors; and that case is where a man, having said to his wife, “if you enter this house you are under three divorces,” afterwards repudiates her by an express sentence of three divorces, and she is again married to him, and then enters the said house, from which no divorce takes place, according to our doctors, whereas Ziffer holds that divorce takes place; as was recited at large in a former chapter.—But observe that, in the case now under consideration, although divorce do not take place, yet the obligation of the vow remains, as it was general, and continues uncancelled by any breach of it; and hence, if the man should ever have carnal connexion with the wife at any subsequent period, expiation is incumbent upon him, on account of this breach of his vow.

A vow of abstinence for a term short of four months does not constitute Aila.—If a man make a vow to abstain from carnal knowledge of his wife for less than four months (as if he were to restrict it to two or to three months), it is not an Aila, because Ibn Abbas has said that Aila is not occasioned by a vow of abstinence from carnal connexion with a wife for a period short of four months; and also, because a husband who abstains from the embrace of his wife for the space of four months or upwards, has no obstruction to plead, that being the longest space during which any obstruction is supposed to exist;* but an obstruction gated by her marriage with another. In short, the propriety, or peculiar right, of a husband is a principle which is alive in the actual existence of marriage, and is not annihilated, but remains dormant, or quiescent, under a termination of it by divorce; and hence it is that, where a man marries a woman, after having repudiated her, he is said to attain a revival of propriety, not a propriety de novo. Many of the most important and (apparently) unaccountable laws of divorce are to be traced to this source. In the present case the Aila is said to have been restricted in its effect to the vower's original propriety, and consequently, in its effect, recurs upon every revival of that propriety by marriage; but it being abrogated by the woman's intervening marriage with another, the vower's subsequent marriage with her is an attainment of propriety de novo, in which the vow cannot operate.

* By the obstruction here mentioned is to be understood pregnancy for the last four months, during which it is not deemed lawful for a husband to have carnal connexion with his wife.

* That is, before the establishment of the Mussulman faith.

† When a man marries a woman, his milk (which is here and elsewhere rendered propriety, or right; that is, peculiarity of possession) continues with respect to her, notwithstanding divorce, until it be abromay continue for a time short of four months, and consequently divorce will not take place from a vow of abstinence for that time.

If a man make a vow, saying to his wife, "by God I will not have carnal connexion with you for two months, nor for two months after that," Aila is established. The proofs of this are drawn from the Arabic. But if a man swear that "he will not have carnal connexion with his wife for two months," and then remain silent for a day, and the next day again swear that "he will not have carnal connexion with her for two months after the other two," Aila is not established, because the second vow is distinct and separate from the former, the husband, upon his making his first vow, being prohibited from carnal connexion for two months, and upon making the second, for four months, excepting the day on which he remained silent, whence the term of four months complete (being the space of time requisite to constitute Aila) is not included in this vow.

If a man vow that "he will not have carnal connexion with his wife for a year, excepting a day," Aila is not established. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, who places the excepted day at the end of the year, conceiving this to be analogous to a case of hire; that is to say, if a man agree to let or hire a house to another for a year excepting a day, the day excepted is transferred to the end of the year, and so in this case likewise; and the exception being transferred to the end of the four months, the complete term of an Aila is involved in the vow. The argument of our doctors is that the term Mawalee [maker of an Aila] is applied only to one who cannot have carnal connexion with his wife for the space of four months without incurring a penalty, such as expiation for instance; but in the present case the husband may have carnal connexion with his wife without incurring any penalty, because the day excepted is not particularly specified, contrary to a case of hire, where the excepted day is transferred to the end of the year, from necessity, as the contract, or engagement of hire, would without that be void, on account of ignorance; whereas this is not the case in a vow. But if, after this vow, the man were on any particular day to have carnal connexion with his wife, and four months or upwards of the year still remain, Aila is established, as the exception then drops.

If a man, being in Basra, and his wife in Koofa, swear that he will not go to Koofa, Aila is not established, because he can still have carnal connexion with his wife, without incurring any penalty,* by bringing her from Koofa to the place of his residence, and there enjoying her.

A vow of abstinence, under a penalty an-

* That is, without subjecting himself to any obligation of performing expiation for the breach of his vow.

nezed, constitutes an Aila.—If a man make a vow, annexing to his breach of it pilgrimage, fast, alms-gift, manumission, or divorce, by saying to his wife, "if I have carnal connexion with you, I am under an obligation to fast,"—or "to give alms,"—or "to perform a pilgrimage,"—or "such an one, my slave, is free,"—or "you are divorced,"—or "such an one, my wife, is divorced,"—Aila is established, as in this case an obstacle is opposed to the commission of the carnal act from the terms of the vow, in the mention of the condition and the penalty, the several penalties above mentioned amounting to prohibition, as the incurring of any of them is attended with trouble or injury. Aboo Yousaf objects that suspending the manumission of a slave upon the commission of the carnal act does not amount to an Aila, as it is possible for the husband to evade the penalty, by first selling the slave, in which case he might commit the act without incurring any penalty. To this Haneefa and Mohammed reply that the sale of the slave is not a matter of certainty, as a purchaser is not always found, and hence this objection is of no weight.

Aila holds respecting a wife under reversible divorce.—If a man make an Aila with respect to a wife under reversible divorce, the Aila is established; but if, with respect to one under irreversible divorce, it is not established, because the connubial union still subsists in the former case, but not in the latter; and in the sacred writings she alone is declared to be a subject of a vow of abstinence who is the wife of the vower.

But drops on the accomplishment of her Edit.—If a man make an Aila with respect to a wife under reversible divorce, and her Edit be accomplished before the expiration of the term of Aila, the Aila then drops, as the woman (becoming totally separated by the completion of her Edit) no longer remains a subject of it.

An Aila made respecting a woman before marriage is nugatory.—If a man say to a strange woman, "By God I will never have carnal connexion with you,"—or "you are to me like the back of my mother,"* and he afterwards marry her, neither Aila nor Zihar are established, as these expressions are ipso facto null, the woman, at the time of his addressing her in these terms, not being a subject of either one or the other, since none are so but wives; but yet if a man marry a woman after having vowed in this manner, and have carnal knowledge of her, he must perform expiation on account of breach of his vow, which is still binding upon him.

* A species of abuse, by which, in times of ignorance, the wife stood virtually divorced. Since the propagation of the faith, it only occasions the wife to be prohibited to her husband until such time as he shall perform an expiation. See article Zihar.

THE term of Aila, with respect to a slave, is two months, this being the space of time fixed for her final separation; thus the term of Aila of a slave is half that of a free woman, as well as her Edit.

An Aila made respecting a wife at a distance may be orally rescinded.—If, at the time of making an Aila vow, there should exist any natural or accidental impediment to generation on the part of either the man or the woman (such as the former being sick, or the latter being impervia coeunti, or an infant, incapable of the carnal act,—or their being at such a distance from each other as does not admit of their meeting during its term), it is, in this case, in the man's power to rescind his Aila, by saying "I have returned to that woman," upon which the Aila drops.—Shafai says that Aila cannot be rescinded but by the carnal act (and such is likewise the opinion of Tehavee), because, if the above declaration of the husband amounted to a rescindment, it would follow that a breach of the vow is therein established, and consequently that expiation is incumbent; whereas this is not the case.—The argument of our doctors is that, the Mawalee, having wronged his wife by a vow prohibiting his carnal connexion with her, it remains with him to make her such satisfaction as circumstances admit of, by a verbal acknowledgment; and the wrong being thereby removed, he is no longer subject to the penalty annexed to it, namely, divorce.—It is to be observed that if the obstruction to generation, in the case under consideration, be removed during Aila, and after the Mawalee's oral rescindment as above, such rescindment is null, and his commission of the carnal act is then requisite to rescind it, as he is here enabled to employ the actual means, whilst the end remains as yet unattained.

An equivocal expression of divorce, takes effect according to the husband's interpretation of his intention.—If a man say to his wife, "you are prohibited to me," let him be asked concerning the intention of these words; and if he say, "my design, in those words, was to express a falsehood," his declaration is to be credited, as his intention coincides with their actual tenor. (Some have said that his declaration is not to be credited before the Kazee,* as his speech is apparently a vow, since the rendering prohibited that which is lawful amounts to a vow.) And if he say, "I intended divorce," a single divorce irreversible takes place, except where he designed three divorces, in which case three divorces take place, as was stated in treating of Talak Kinayat, or divorced by implication: and if he say, "I intended Zihar," Zihar is accordingly established with the two Elders. Mohammed says that this is not Zihar, because it is essential to Zihar that the husband compare his wife to his own relation within the prohibited degrees, which is not the case in this instance.—The argument of the two Elders is that he has declared prohibition generally; and Zihar also involves a sort of prohibition (namely, the prohibition of carnal connexion, until after expiation), and a circumstance generally expressed is capable of bearing a restricted construction.—And if he say, "I intended prohibition,"—or "I had no particular intention," his speech amounts to a vow, and consequently an Aila is established from it, because a vow is the original thing (with our doctors) in rendering prohibited that which is lawful, as shall be demonstrated in treating of vows. Some doctors construe any expression of prohibition into a divorce, where there is no particular intention, as being agreeable to custom.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF KHOOLA.

Definition of the term.—KHOOLA, in its primitive sense, means to draw off or dig up. In law it signifies an agreement entered into for the purpose of dissolving a connubial connexion, in lieu of a compensation paid by the wife to her husband out of her property.—This is the definition of it in the Jama Ramooz.

Reasons which justify Khoola, or divorce for a compensation.—WHENEVER enmity takes place between husband and wife, and they both see reason to apprehend that the ends of marriage are not likely to be answered by a continuance of their union, the woman need not scruple to release herself from the power of her husband, by offering such a compensation as may induce him to liberate her, because the word of God says, "NO CRIME IS IMPUTED TO THE WIFE OR HER HUSBAND RESPECTING THE MATTER IN LIEU OF WHICH SHE HATH RELEASED HERSELF;" that is to say, there is no crime in the husband's accepting such compensator, nor in the wife's giving it.

Which occasions a single irreversible divorce.—AND where the compensation is thus offered and accepted, a single divorce irreversible takes place, in virtue of Khoola; and the woman is answerable for the amount of it, because the prophet has said that Khoola effects an irreversible divorce: and also, because the word Khoola bears the sense of divorce, whence it is that it is classed with the implied expressions of it, and from an implied divorce a divorce irreversible takes place;—but intention is not essential to Khoola, because by the mention of a compensation, the act is made independent of it;—and also, because it is not to be imagined that the woman would relinquish any part of her property but with a view to her own safety and ease, which is not to be obtained but by a total separation. What is now advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the aversion being on the part of the wife, and not on that of the husband; but if it be on the part of the husband, it would be abominable in him to take any thing from her, because the sacred text says, "IF YE BE DESIROUS OF CHANGING (that is, repudiating one wife and marrying another), TAKE NOT FROM HER ANY THING;"—and also, because a man, by divorcing his wife from such a desire of change, involves her in distress; and it behoves him not to increase that distress by taking her property. If, moreover, the aversion be on the part of the woman, it is abominable in the husband to take from her more than what he had given or settled upon her, namely, her dower. (According to the Jama Sagheer, if the husband take from her more than the dower, it is strictly legal, as the text of the Koran already quoted is expressed generally: but the former opinion is founded on a tradition of the prophet, to whom a woman having mentioned her hatred of her husband, he advised her to give up her dower, as a compensation, to induce the husband to divorce her, to which she replied, "I will give that and more!" but the prophet answered, "not more!"—and here the aversion was on the part of the woman).—But yet if the husband should take more than the dower, it is approved in point of law;—and so also, if he were to take any compensation, where the aversion is on his part, because the sacred text goes to establish two points; one, the lawfulness of Khoola in a judicial view; and the other, its admissibility between the parties and God Almighty; now, from the tradition which has been recited, it appears that where the aversion is on the part of the wife, a Khoola for more than the dower is disapproved; and, on the other hand, the text before quoted shows that if the aversion be on the part of the husband, he should not take any thing, and consequently not more than the dower a fortiori; wherefore the ground of admissibility is abandoned, on account of the contradiction between the tradition and the text; and practice is established upon the other remaining ground, namely, the lawfulness of Khoola in a judicial view.

The wife is responsible for the compensation.—If a husband offer to divorce his wife for a compensation, and she consent, divorce takes place, and she becomes answerable for the compensation; because the husband is empowered, of himself, to pronounce either an immediate or a suspended divorce, and he here suspends the divorce upon the assent of the woman, who is at liberty to agree to the compensation, as she has authority over her own person, and the matrimonial authority, like retaliation, is one of those things for which a compensation is lawful, although it do not consist of property; and the divorce is irreversible for the reasons already assigned, and also because Khoola is understood to be an exchange of property for the person; and upon the husband being vested with a right in the property, the woman, in return, is vested with a right in her own person, in order that an equality may be established.

Difference between a wife requiring Khoola in lieu of an unlawful article, and requiring divorce in lieu of the same in express terms.—

If the thing offered to the husband in return for Khoola be not lawful property (as if the woman were to desire him to grant her Khoola in lieu of wine or a hog, and he consent, saying, "I agree to a Khoola in lieu of such wine," or so forth), a divorce irreversible takes place, but nothing is due to the husband: but if a compensation for divorce consist of a thing not lawful property (as if the woman were to desire her husband to divorce her for a cask of wine, and he consent, saying, "I divorce you in consideration of such wine," and so forth), a reversible divorce takes place.—The reason for divorce taking place in both instances is that the husband has suspended it upon the consent of the woman, which is already testified; and the difference between the case of Khoola and that of divorce is that, in the former, the compensation being null, the word used by the husband [Khoola] remains, and that, as being a Kinayat, or implied sentence, is effective of irreversible divorce; whereas, in the latter, the word divorce is express, and consequently occasions reversible divorce only.—And the husband has here no claim upon his wife, because she has not named any appreciable article, which might be the means of deceiving him; and also, because if the thing named be particularly specified by her, it cannot be lawfully made incumbent upon her in favour of her husband, on account of his being a Mussulman; and in the same manner, it cannot be made incumbent if it be not particularly specified, as in that case she does not charge herself with it:—but it is otherwise where she specifies a thing under a false denomination (as if, for instance, she were to make a proposal of Khoola to her husband, by saying, "divorce me for this cask of vinegar," and he agree, and the cask afterwards appear to contain wine), for in this case he has a claim upon her for an equal quantity of vinegar of the medium standard, because her naming an appreciable article has been the means of deceiving him:—and it is also contrary to a case in which a master emancipates his slave, or constitutes him a Mokatib, in return for a cask of wine; for then the emancipated person is responsible to his emancipator for the amount of his estimated value as a slave, because the owner's property in his slave is a thing which bears a certain estimable value, and which he therefore cannot be supposed willing to relinquish gratuitously; whereas the property in the wife's person is not of any estimable value in the circumstance of the dissolution of the connubial right, as the only reason for its being so, in the attainment of such right, is its importance, and consequent title to respect; whence it is that the attainment of that right without a return is not countenanced by the law; but the relinquishment of that right being in itself a manifestation of such respect, there is then no occasion to impose upon any one an obligation of property for the purpose of manifesting it.

The compensation for Khoola may consist of anything which is lawful in dower.—WHATSOEVER is capable of being accepted as a dower, is also capable of being accepted as a compensation for Khoola, since whatever is capable of being a proper return for that which is appreciable (namely, the woman's person at the time of its coming into propriety), must, in a superior degree, be capable of being a compensation for a thing not appreciable (namely, the woman's person at the time of the destruction of propriety).

Case of Khoola required in lieu of property unspecified.—If a woman say to her husband, "Grant me Khoola for what is in my hand," and he agree, and it should afterwards appear that she had nothing in her hand, divorce takes place; but nothing remains incumbent upon the woman, as she has not deceived her husband by any specific mention of property: but if she were to say, "grant me Khoola for the property in my hand," and he agree accordingly, and it should appear that she had nothing in her hand, she must in this case return to him her dower, because she has deceived him by a specification of property which did not exist; and hence he does not appear to consent to a relinquishment of the connubial propriety without a return, and the woman cannot be legally bound to give the thing specified, or its value, as its kind or species is unknown; neither can she be laid under any legal obligation to render the estimated value of her person, that is, her proper dower, because, in the circumstance of the destruction of the connubial propriety, that is not appreciable; it is therefore fixed that there remain incumbent upon her whatever the husband may have given in lieu of his attainment of the propriety, in order that thus he may be shielded from injury.—If, moreover, a woman say to her husband, "grant me Khoola for the Dirms in my hand," and he agree, and it afterwards appear that she had nothing in her hand, he has a claim upon her for three Dirms.—The proofs are here taken from the Arabic.

Case of Khoola in lieu of an absconded slave.—If a man enter into an agreement of Khoola with his wife, in lieu of an absconded slave, on the condition that, if the slave be recovered, she shall make him over to the husband, but if not, she shall not be answerable; yet she is not released from responsibility, and it remains incumbent upon her either to make delivery of the slave or of his value, because an agreement of Khoola is of a reciprocal nature (whence it is requisite that the recompense be received on the part of the husband); and the condition of release from responsibility agreed to by the parties is disapproved, and consequently void; but yet the Khoola is not so, as it is not rendered void by involving an invalid condition. Analogous to this is a case of marriage;—for if a man marry a woman, agreeing to give, as her dower, an absconded slave, on the condition that if he be recovered he shall be made over to her—but if not, that the husband is not to be answerable; yet the husband is not released from responsibility, and it remains incumbent upon him either to deliver to his wife the slave specified, when able so to do, or to pay her his price.

Cases of Khoola granted for a specified sum.—If a woman say to her husband, "divorce me thrice for one thousand Dirms," and he pronounce a single divorce, there remains incumbent upon her one third of the thousand Dirms, because, in requiring three divorces for the whole sum, she has required each divorce, separately, for the third of that sum.—It is however to be observed that the single divorce pronounced in this case is irreversible, as being given in lieu of property.

If a woman say to her husband, "divorce me thrice, upon my paying you one thousand Dirms," and the husband give her one divorce, nothing is incumbent upon the woman, according to Haneefa, and the husband is at liberty to take her back. The two disciples say that a divorce irreversible takes place in return for one third of the thousand Dirms, because the expression "upon payment of" is the same as the word "for" in contracts of exchange. The argument of Haneefa is that the expression "upon payment" is a condition, and the thing conditioned cannot be divided according to the parts of the condition itself: contrary to the word "for," as that is used to express a return, and as the property is not due, divorce express (and consequently reversible) remains.

If a man say to his wife, "divorce yourself thrice, for (or upon payment of) one thousand Dirms," and she pronounce upon herself one divorce, no effect whatever takes place, because the husband is not desirous that she should become separated for any thing short of the whole sum specified: contrary to a case where the proposal comes from the wife (as in the preceding instance), because, as she there appears to be desirous of procuring separation from her husband at the whole expense specified, it follows that she is willing to procure it, at the third of that expense only, a fortiori.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced upon payment of one thousand Dirms," and she agree, divorce takes place upon her, and the husband has a claim upon her for the thousand Dirms, in the same manner as where a man says, "you are divorced for a thousand Dirms," and the wife consents, in which case divorce takes place, and one thousand Dirms are incumbent upon her:—but it is to be observed that in both cases the woman's assent is a condition, because the words of the husband, "you are divorced for one thousand Dirms," mean, "you are under divorce in return for one thousand Dirms due from you to me,"—and his words, "you are divorced upon payment of one thousand Dirms," mean, "you are under divorce on condition that one thousand Dirms be due from you to me," and the return cannot be made incumbent upon her without her assent; moreover, a circumstance suspended upon a condition cannot take place until the condition be previously fulfilled, wherefore the effect in this case depends upon her agreeing to what is proposed. And here the divorce is irreversible, for the reason already stated.

If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced, and there is against you a thousand Dirms," and she consent,—or, if a man say to his slave, "you are free, and there is against you a thousand Dirms," and the slave assent,—the slave is free, and divorce takes place upon the wife, but nothing remains incumbent upon either, according to Haneefa:—the rule is also the same if they were not to assent.—The two disciples say that the sum specified is incumbent upon them, where they assent; but that, if they do not assent, neither divorce nor emancipation take place; for they argue that the latter part of the husband's address is such as is used in bargains of exchange; and a contract of Khoola, or of Kitabat, being a contract of exchange, is therefore to be considered as such;—as in hire, for instance, where if a man say to another, "carry this burthen, and there is a Dirm for you," it is the same as if he were to say, "carry this burthen for a Dirm."—To this Haneefa replies that the latter part of the sentence has a separate and detached sense, and therefore is not to be connected with the preceding part, unless there be something to show that it is so;—but here nothing exists to evince such connexion, because divorce and manumission are frequently produced without any substantial return:—contrary to cases of sale, or of hire, as neither of these are to be conceived without a substantial compensation.

A proposal of Khoola made to the wife, with a reserve of option to the husband, is invalid.—If a man say to his wife, "you are divorced for a thousand Dirms, on a condition of option to me (or, to you) for three days," and she consent, the option is invalid, where it is reserved to him, but valid where it is reserved to her; and if she reject his proposal within the three days, the Khoola is null; but if she do not reject it within that time, the divorce takes place, and the sum specified by the husband becomes incumbent upon her.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples say that the option is null in either case, and that divorce takes place upon the woman, and the sum specified becomes incumbent upon her, because option is used for the purpose of dissolving a contract, or other agreement, after it has been concluded, and not for preventing the execution of it; and the act of the man, or of the woman, implying proposal on the part of the former, and acceptance on that of the latter, does not carry with it dissolution on either part; his proposal does not, as it is a Yameen, or suspending vow, on account of its involving a condition and a consequence (namely, the suspension of divorce upon the woman's consent); and a vow is in itself incapable of effecting dissolution; nor does her acceptance, as that is the condition of the vow, and as the vow is in itself incapable of effecting dissolution, so is the condition; and such being the case, the reserve of option on either part is null.—The argument of Haneefa is that Khoola on the part of the woman stands as a sale, since it is a transfer of property for a return, and accordingly, if it proceed first from the wife, by her saying to her husband, "divorce me in return for one thousand Dirms, on a condition of option to me (or, to you) for three days," and she afterwards retract before her husband signifies his consent, her retraction is approved, on which account it is restricted to that Majlis, or situation, and does not extend beyond it,—that is, if she rise from her seat before her husband signifies his assent, it becomes null; the condition of option in it therefore, when proceeding from the wife, is approved; but when it proceeds from the husband, the condition of option is not approved, because it is then a vow, wherefore his retraction of it is not approved, and it continues in force beyond the Majlis; and as it is a vow on the part of the husband, he can have no option, since a vow does not admit of option. Let it be also observed that the case of a slave, with respect to manumission, is the same as that of a wife, with respect to divorce;—that is to say, manumission for a consideration is an exchange, on the part of a slave, the same as divorce for a return, on the part of a wife.

The assertion of the husband respecting Khoola is to be credited.—If a man say to his wife, "I yesterday divorced you for a thousand Dirms, but you did not consent,"—and the woman reply that she did consent, the assertion of the husband is to be credited: but if a man say to another, "I yesterday sold you this slave for a thousand Dirms, but you did not consent," and the other reply that he did consent, the assertion of the purchaser is to be credited.—The reason of the difference between these two cases is that divorce for a compensation is a vow, when proceeding from the husband, and his acknowledgment of his having made the proposal does not necessarily imply an acknowledgment of the condition having taken place, as the vow holds good independent of that circumstance, whereas sale cannot be effected without the consent of the purchaser, and hence an acknowledgment of sale necessarily implies an acknowledgment of that circumstance without which sale cannot exist, namely, consent, and the seller's denial of that circumstance is a contradiction to his previous acknowledgment, and consequently not to be credited.

A mutual discharge leaves each party without any claim upon the other.—A MOBARAT, or mutual discharge (signified by a man saying to his wife, "I am discharged from the marriage between you and me," and her consenting to it), is the same as Khoola,—that is to say, in consequence of the declaration of both, every claim which each had upon the other drops, so far as those claims are connected with their marriage. This is the doctrine of Haneefa. Mohammed says that nothing is done away by either except what is particularly mentioned by both the husband and the wife. Abou Yoosaf unites with Mohammed, as to the Khoola, but with Haneefa as to the mutual discharge.—The argument of Mohammed is that mutual discharge and Khoola are contracts of exchange, in which the circumstances specifically stipulated are alone regarded, and not those which are not stipulated. The argument of Abou Yoosaf is that the word Mobarat, from its grammatical form bears a reciprocal sense; and therefore requires that the discharge be equally established on both sides; and this is general; yet the discharge is in this case restricted to those rights connected with marriage, as the design proves it to be so; but Khoola only requires that the woman be freed from the restraint of her husband; and as that is obtained by the dissolution of the marriage, it does not require that all its effects be terminated. The argument of Haneefa is that Khoola bears the sense of separation, and that is general, the same as a mutual discharge, and consequently marriage is thereby terminated, together with all its rights and effects, the same as by a mutual discharge.

Khoola entered into by a father on behalf of his infant daughter is invalid.—If a father transact a Khoola with the husband of his infant daughter, agreeing to pay the consideration out of her property, the Khoola is not valid with respect to her, because this exhibits no regard for her interest, as her person is not appreciable in the dissolution of a marriage, whereas the consideration is so: contrary to marriage (as where a man contracts his infant daughter to another) for that is valid, because the woman's person, on entering into a marriage, is appreciable:—and the woman's person not being appreciable in the dissolution of a marriage, the Khoola of a wife sick of a mortal illness is considered as proceeding from the third of her property; but being appreciable upon entrance into a marriage, if a man sick of a mortal illness were to marry a woman on a proper dower, it is considered as coming from the whole of his property.—The Khoola, therefore, being illegal, the dower of the infant does not drop, nor does the husband acquire any right to her property.—There are two traditions with respect to the act of the father occasioning divorce in this instance; according to one, divorce does take place; but according to the other it does not; the former, however, is the better opinion, because the Khoola is a suspension of divorce upon the consent of the father, which is the same as upon any other condition.

Unless he engage to hold himself responsible for the compensation.—If a father transact a Khoola on the part of his infant daughter for a certain sum, engaging to hold himself responsible for the payment, the Khoola is valid, and the sum specified becomes incumbent upon him, because the engagement even of a stranger for the consideration of Khoola is valid, and consequently that of a father in a superior degree: in this instance also the infant's dower does not drop, as the father has no authority with respect to the relinquishment of it.

Or refer it to his daughter's consent.—AND if the father were to stipulate that his daughter is to be responsible for the sum specified, this will depend upon her consent where she is competent (that is, capable of comprehending the nature of her situation, and that of the present transaction, and pronouncing upon them); and if she consent, divorce takes place, on account of the condition being fulfilled upon which it is suspended: but the sum specified (or consideration) is not incumbent upon her, as an infant is incapable of undertaking the discharge of any pecuniary obligation; and if the father consent on his daughter's behalf, there are two traditions concerning it;—according to one, divorce does not take place until she shall eventually express her consent; and according to another, divorce takes place independent of it; but here the compensation agreed for is not incumbent upon her at all events.—And in the same manner, if a father, transacting a Khoola on the part of his infant daughter, agree that the compensation shall consist of her dower, and he happen not to be surety for the same,* the validity of the Khoola depends upon the daughter's consent, which if she declare, divorce takes place; but yet her dower does not drop: and here also, if the father consent on his daughter's behalf, there are two traditions concerning it, as already stated: if, however, he be surety for the dower, amounting to one thousand Dirms (for instance), divorce takes place, because the condition (namely consent) is existing; and five hundred Dirms only are incumbent upon him, according to a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would suggest that he is liable for the whole thousand, upon this ground, that where an adult woman transacts Khoola on her own behalf, before consummation of marriage, for any specified sum (say one thousand Dirms), and her dower be also one thousand, the whole sum is incumbent upon her, and is discharged by five hundred dropping from her dower, and her paying the offer five hundred out of her own property :—but according to the more favourable construction of the law, nothing whatever is incumbent upon her, because the intent of the husband, in the transaction, is merely to free himself from the obligation of her dower; and this end being obtained, nothing beyond that remains incumbent upon her.

CHAPTER IX.

OF ZIHAR.

Definition of the term.—The word Zihar is derived from Zahr, the back.—In the language of the law it signifies a man comparing his wife to any of his female relations within such prohibited degree of kindred, whether by blood, by fosterage, or by marriage, as renders marriage with them invariably unlawful,—as if he were to say to her [by a peculiarity in the Arabic idiom], “you are to me like the back [Zihar] of my mother.” It is essential to Zihar that the person compared be the wife of the speaker, inasmuch that Zihar does not apply to a female slave; and competency to pronounce Zihar appertains only to one who is a Mussulman, of sound mind, and mature age, that pronounced by a Zimmee or an infant being nugatory; and its effect is to prohibit the person who pronounces it from carnal connexion with his wife, until he shall have performed an expiation.

Zihar prohibits carnal connexion until expiation.—If a man say to his wife, “you are to me like the back of my mother,” she [the wife] becomes prohibited to him, and his carnal connexion with her is unlawful, as well as every other conjugal familiarity, until he perform expiation for the same, as is enjoined in the sacred writings.

Nature and duration of Zihar.—In times of ignorance (that is, before the establishment of the Mussulman faith), Zihar stood as a divorce; and the law afterwards preserved its nature (which is prohibition), but altered its effect to a temporary prohibition, which holds until the performance of expiation, but without dissolving the marriage.—The reason for this is that Zihar is an offence, as being a declaration founded upon a falsehood, and which amounts to a disowning or denying of the wife; and therefore finds its proper punishment in her being rendered unlawful to him who pronounces it, by a prohibition which cannot be removed but by his performing expiation: and as carnal connexion becomes prohibited by Zihar, so do all its accompanying privileges, such as kissing, touching, and other familiarity, lest the husband be tempted to the commission of the carnal act; in the same manner as is the rule with respect to relations within the prohibited degrees, with whom not only the carnal act itself, but also every familiarity which leads to the commission of it, are prohibited: contrary to that respecting women fasting, or in their courses, with whom although the commission of the carnal act itself be prohibited, yet other liberties are not so, as those situations are perpetually recurring to them, and if such a rule were to hold, it would operate as an almost continual restraint upon them; whereas, with respect to women under Zihar, or within the prohibited degrees, this is not the case.

If the prohibition occasioned by Zihar be violated, yet no additional penalty is incurred.—If a man, having produced Zihar upon his wife, have carnal connexion with her before he makes expiation, it behoves him to repent and pray forgiveness from God; but nothing is incumbent upon him, except the expiation on account of his Zihar, as before, and that he refrain from any repetition of the carnal act with her until he perform such expiation, because it is related of the prophet that he thus commanded one who had committed the carnal act with his wife after Zihar, and before expiation; from which tradition it appears that nothing more is incumbent (in consequence of the commission of the carnal act before expiation), for if it were so, the prophet would somewhere have mentioned it.

Zihar cannot occasion divorce.—LET it be observed that from the words of the husband, “you are to me like the back of my mother,” nothing but Zihar is established, because the term employed expressly signifies Zihar; and if he should intend divorce by it, yet that does not take place, as the law of divorce is broken through in this particular,* and consequently Zihar does not admit of divorce being intended by it.

Zihar is established by a comparison with any part of the body which implies the whole person.—If a man say to his wife, “you are to me like the belly of my mother,” or “the thigh,” or “the pudendum,”—Zihar is thereby established, as Zihar signifies the likening of a woman to a kinswoman within the prohibited degrees, which interpretation is found in the comparison being applied to any of the parts or members improper to be seen.—And Zihar is in the same manner established, by the likening of the wife to any other kinswoman within such prohibited degree as that marriage with them is at all times unlawful, such as sisters, and aunts, and foster-mothers, who are invariably prohibited, as well as a natural mother. And so also if a man say to his wife, “your head is to me like the back of my mother,” or “your pudendum,” or “your waist,”—because by these the whole person is figuratively expressed; and so also if he were to say, “your half or your third,” because in this case the effect is established in a diffusive portion * and consequently extends to the whole person, because, as the diffusive portion of any thing is a proper subject of all other acts, such as purchase, sale, and so forth, so is it of divorce; but divorce being incapable of division, is necessarily established in the whole person; and as Zihar resembles divorce, it therefore, like divorce, extends to the whole also.

A general comparison takes effect according to the husband's explanation.—WHERE a man says to his wife, "you are to me like my mother," it is requisite that his intention be examined into, so as to discover the true predicament in which the wife stands; and if he declare that his meaning was only to show respect to his wife, it is to be received according to his explanation, because in speech respect may be expressed by a general comparison; or, if he declare his intention to have been Zihar, that is accordingly established, for here appears a comparison with the whole person of his mother, in which her back is included; but as that is not expressly mentioned, the speaker's intention is requisite to establish it; and if he declare his intention to be divorce, a divorce irreversible takes place, as his comparing his wife with his mother is likening her to one who is prohibited to him, and is therefore the same as if he were to say, "you are prohibited to me," thereby intending divorce;—but if he declare that he had no positive intention, neither Zihar nor divorce are established (according to Haneefa and Abou Yoosaf), because the address bearing the construction of respect, must here be taken in that sense, as being of less importance than any other. Mohammed says that Zihar is established independent of intention, because, a comparison of the wife with a limb or member of the mother occasioning Zihar, it follows that, where it is made with the whole, Zihar is established a fortiori.—With Abou Yoosaf, if the intention of the husband be merely prohibition, an Aila only is established, because the prohibition by Aila is less rigorous than by Zihar.—With Mohammed, on the contrary, Zihar is established: his argument is taken from the Arabic.

And the same of a comparison in point of prohibition.—If a man say to his wife, "you are to me prohibited, like my mother," intending either Zihar or divorce, it takes effect according to his intention, as this address may be taken in either sense,—in that of Zihar, as being a comparison,—and in that of divorce, as expressing prohibition, strengthened by the comparison. In this case, however, if he have no intention, according to Abou Yoosaf, Aila is established,—and, according to Mohammed, Zihar,—as in the preceding case.—And if he say, "you are to me prohibited like the back of my mother," and thereby intend divorce or Aila, yet nothing but Zihar is established, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples say, that whatever he may intend is established, as prohibition equally implies either Aila or divorce: according to Mohammed, however, where divorce is the intention, no Zihar is established; whereas, according to Abou Yoosaf, divorce and Zihar are both established together (that is, divorce is established on account of the intention, and Zihar on account of the term Zihar [back] being expressly mentioned, as was stated in its proper place).—The argument of Haneefa is that the words above recited expressly signify Zihar, and therefore do not bear any other sense; and the word prohibited, which is introduced there, relates solely to the prohibition by Zihar, as prohibition is of various kinds, of which that by Zihar is one, and is on this occasion preferred, on account of the accompanying comparison with the back of the mother; and all other kinds of prohibition being only constructive, and that by Zihar positive, the prohibition to which the word "prohibited" alludes, is to be taken as relating to the Zihar only.

Zihar has no effect upon any but a wife.—ZIHAR is not established with respect to any but the wife of the speaker, inasmuch that if a man pronounce a Zihar upon his female slave, it has no effect, for various reasons:—FIRST, God has said,—"MEN WHO PRONOUNCE ZIHAR UPON THEIR WOMEN,"—where, by women is understood wives; SECONDLY, the legality of a female slave is of a secondary or dependant nature, and that of a wife of a primary or original nature, and hence those two persons must not be confounded; THIRDLY, Zihar is an imitation of divorce, and divorce does not take place upon a slave.

If a man marry a woman without her consent, and pronounce a Zihar upon her before that be obtained, and she afterwards signify her consent, the Zihar is void, because the husband, in making the comparison, said no more than what was at that time strictly true, and hence what he says does not amount to a disowning or denying of her.

OBJECTION.—It would here appear that the validity of the Zihar remains suspended upon the woman's consent to the marriage, in the same manner as the manumission of the purchaser of a slave from an usurper rests upon the consent of the proprietor (that is to say, where a person purchases a slave of the usurper of him, and emancipates him, the validity of his emancipation depends upon the proprietor's assenting to the sale), because Zihar is a right of possession by marriage, in the same manner as manumission is a right of possession by right of property.

REPLY.—The validity of the Zihar is not suspended upon her consent to the marriage, because Zihar is not one of the rights of marriage, as it has no place in the ordinances of the law,* whereas matrimony has a place in them, and that which is not of the law is incapable of appertaining as a right to that which is one of its ordinances; contrary to the case of manumission proceeding from the purchaser of a slave out of the hands of his usurper, as manumission is a right of property.

* Joozoo Sha'e is here rendered a diffusive portion, in opposition to Joozoo Mayeen a particular or specified portion.

Zihar collectively pronounced takes place upon every individual to whom it is addressed.—WHERE a man addresses all his wives collectively, saying, “ye are to me as the back of my mother,” Zihar is established with respect to every one of them, he having on this occasion applied the Zihar to them all indiscriminately, as in divorce, where if a man direct a sentence of divorce to the whole of his wives collectively, it takes place upon the whole. And here an expiation is incumbent upon him, on account of each wife respectively, because prohibition has been established with respect to each; and expiation is ordained for the purpose of terminating and abolishing the prohibition; and where that is numerous the expiation must be so likewise, according to the number of prohibitions; contrary to a case where a man pronounces an Aila (or vow of four months’ abstinence from carnal connexion) upon all his wives collectively, and breaks his vow by having carnal knowledge of them within the four months, for here a single expiation only is incumbent upon him, because in this case expiation is incumbent upon him, out of respect to the honour and greatness of the name of God; and his name, in a vow of Ali, is mentioned once only, as it is pronounced by the man saying to all his wives, “by God I will not have carnal connexion with you.”

Section.

Of Expiation.

* A Zihar may be expiated by the emancipation of a slave, &c.—THE expiation of a Zihar may be effected by the emancipation of a slave; or if, from not being possessed of such slave, this mode be impracticable, it may be effected by a fast of two months successively;† or if the state of the health do not admit of such fast, by the distribution of victuals to sixty poor men; because a passage which occurs in the Koran, respecting expiation, demonstrates the obligation of performing it in one or other of those ways: but the expiation is supposed to precede a man’s touching his wife, after having pronounced a Zihar upon:—in expiation by manumission or fasting this is evident, because the text relates to that; and so also in expiation by the distribution of victuals to the poor;—because by expiation prohibition is terminated, wherefore it is necessary that the expiation be first made, in order that carnal connexion may be lawful.

The emancipation of a slave of any description suffices.—It suffices for an expiation that a slave be released, whether that slave be an infidel or a Mussulman, an infant or an adult, a male or a female, because the word Rakba, in the Koran, applies equally to all of these, as it signifies one who is possessed, in right of property, by another, under any description whatever.—Shafei says that the emancipation of an infidel does not suffice as an expiation, because this is a right of God, which cannot lawfully be expended upon one who, as being an infidel, is his enemy; like Zakat, which is a right of God, and the disbursement of which upon infidels, as being the enemies of God, is therefore illegal.—To this our doctors reply, that the emancipation of a slave [Rakba] is what is mentioned in the text, and that is fulfilled by the manumission of an infidel: and as to what Shafei advances, of expiation being a right of God, and therefore not to be expended upon his enemies, it may be replied that the intention of the expiation is to render the slave equal to the fulfilment of such duties as relate to God, that is to say, of Zakat, pilgrimage, bearing evidence, fighting for the faith, magistracy, and so forth; and if the slave be not a Mussulman, and continue an infidel after manumission, thereby enhancing his crime of infidelity, and precluding himself from receiving those advantages which he was qualified to enjoy through his freedom, it is to be attributed to the error of his choice, and not to any defect in the act of the expiator.

Unless such slave be defective in one of his faculties.—It is not sufficient, as an expiation, to emancipate a slave who is blind, or maimed of both the fellow-members, whether hands or feet, because here such a slave is utterly deprived of one of his bodily endowments either of seeing, carrying, or walking, and the privation of any one advantage in a slave renders the manumission of him insufficient as an expiation, since a person in such a state is accounted dead: but where the privation is not entire it does not forbid the validity of the expiation, and hence it suffices for that purpose to emancipate a slave who is blind of one eye, or maimed of one hand or foot, or of a hand and foot, from opposite sides, as this amounts not to an absolute privation of one of the advantages, but only to a defect: the case, however, is otherwise where he is maimed of a hand and foot upon the same side, for in this case his emancipation would not suffice, as this amounts to a privation of the advantage of walking, since, without the assistance of the hand upon the lame side, that is impracticable.

The emancipation of a deaf slave suffices.—It suffices, as an expiation, to emancipate a deaf slave. Analogy would suggest that this is not sufficient, as the slave is here deprived of one faculty; but it is admitted as sufficient, upon a favourable construction of the law, as the radical faculty still continues. since one who is considered as deaf may yet be capable of hearing what is spoken aloud: if, however, he cannot hear at all (as where a person is born perfectly deaf), his emancipation does not suffice.

* That is, there are no particular rules instituted for it in the Koran, the laws respecting it being taken from the Sonna.

† By Sawm, or fasting, is here and elsewhere understood an abstinence from food and every carnal enjoyment from the rising to the setting sun of each day, within the prescribed term.

But not that of one who has lost both his thumbs.—It does not suffice, as an expiation, to emancipate a slave who has lost both his thumbs, as his power of carrying, which is one of his bodily endowments, is in that case destroyed.

Or who is insane.—NEITHER does it suffice to emancipate a slave who is insane, because no use is to be derived from the members of the body unless they be informed with reason, and therefore a privation of reason amounts to a privation of all the corporal endowments.

Unless it be an occasional insanity only.—BUT if the slave be one who is insane only at intervals, his freedom suffices for an expiation, as this circumstance is not an utter privation of the faculty, but only a defect in it, which does not prevent the sufficiency.

Nor of a Modabbir, or Am-Walid, or Mokatib, who has paid part of his ransom.—It does not suffice, as an expiation, to emancipate a Modabbir, or Am-Walid, as such are eventually entitled to their freedom, and hence their bondage is incomplete;—and so also of a Mokatib who has fulfilled his contract of Kitabat in part, because in this case his freedom must be accounted as in return for the part of his ransom already received, and consequently does not suffice for an expiation, as that is an act of piety, in which speciality is essential.—It is recorded as an opinion of Haneefa that the release of this Mokatib is sufficient, as bondage is found to exist in him in every shape, and accordingly the contract of Kitabat admits of being annulled: contrary to Am-Walids and Modabbirs, as a Tadbeer or Isteealad cannot be cancelled.

If a person who pronounces Zihar emancipate, for expiation, a Mokatib who has not paid any part of his ransom, it suffices.—Shafei says that it does not suffice, because the Mokatib is a claimant of freedom, in virtue of the contract of Kitabat, and is therefore the same as a Modabbir.—The argument of our doctors is that bondage exists in a Mokatib in every shape, because the contract of Kitabat is capable of annulment; and also, because the prophet has declared “a MOKATIB is a slave as long as a single DIRM remains due from him.”

That procured for a parent or child suffices.—If a man purchase his father or his son, intending expiation thereby, it suffices.—Shafei says that it does not suffice;—the same difference of opinion subsists in the case of expiation of a Yameen, as shall be recited at large in treating of vows.

But not that of a share in a coparcenary—If a man, being rich, emancipate his half of a coparcenary slave, and then indemnify his partner for the value of the remainder, this does not suffice for an expiation with Haneefa.—The two disciples hold that it suffices, because the expiator, becoming possessed of his partner's share by indemnifying him, does in effect emancipate a slave who is entirely his own property:—but it were otherwise if the expiator be poor, as in this case it is incumbent upon the slave to perform Siayet, or emancipatory labour, for the partner's share; and hence the emancipation is, so far, for a return. The argument of Haneefa is that in this case the emancipation is defective in the proportion of the partner's share, until the transition of the property in it to the emancipator be effected by his indemnifying the other partner, and this circumstance forbids its sufficiency for an expiation.

The partial emancipation of a sole slave (when followed by the emancipation of the remainder) suffices.—If a man emancipate half of his own slave, as an expiation, and afterwards emancipate the remainder for the same purpose, it suffices, as this amounts to no more than emancipating him by two sentences instead of one; and the defect which appears in the second half on account of the first half being already free is not regarded, since this defect has been induced upon the expiator's property, in consequence of his emancipating it on account of expiation; and a defect like this is not regarded; but is considered in the same light as when a man having thrown a goat on its side for the purpose of sacrifice, happens to direct his knife in the animal's eye, so as to render it defective, which is not regarded, the sacrifice of the goat being still lawful, as the defect has befallen the property on account of sacrifice: contrary to the preceding case, because there the defect appears in the property of the other partner.—This proceeds upon the tenets of Haneefa.—With the two disciples manumission is indivisible, and consequently the emancipation of an half is, in effect, the emancipation of the whole slave, so that it is not considered in that instance as proceeding from two sentences.

But not if carnal connexion take place between the two emancipations.—If a man emancipate half his slave, as an expiation of Zihar, and then have carnal connexion with the wife upon whom he had pronounced the Zihar, and afterwards emancipate the other half, it is not valid as an expiation, according to Haneefa, because he holds that manumission admits of division, and the condition of its sufficiency, in the sacred writings, is that it be performed before the man touch his wife; but here the emancipation of one half takes place after touching.—With the two disciples, on the contrary, the emancipation of an half amounts to an emancipation of the whole, wherefore the emancipation in this case appears to take place upon the whole, before touching.

Zihar may be expiated by fasting two months.

—If the person pronouncing a Zihar be not possessed of a slave, his expiation may be made by fasting for two successive months, provided those do not include the Ramzan, nor the festival of Fittir,* nor the days of Nihir† or Tashreek.‡ The fast must be successive (that is, uninterrupted), because it is thus expressed in the text; and it is a condition that the Ramzan be not included, because the abstinence observed in that period is not counted in expiation; for if it were to be so counted, this would in effect induce the annulment of a thing ordained by God; and it is also a condition that the festival of Fittir, and the days of Nihir and Tashreek, be not included, as (these being ordained festivals) any extraordinary abstinence in them is forbidden.

But if carnal connexion take place during the fast, it must be commenced de novo.—If the expiator, either wilfully or through forgetfulness, in the night, or, from the latter cause, in the day time, should during the term of expiation have carnal connexion with the wife upon whom he had pronounced the Zihar, he must again begin the fast anew, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Abou Yoosuf says that it is not incumbent upon him to begin it again, as his connexion with the wife does not amount to an interruption of the fast, since that is not broken by it; and if it be said that one condition of the fast is that it precede touching, it may be replied that a compliance with that injunction is here rendered impossible; he therefore holds that it must in this case suffice that a part of it precede touching, for if the fast be commenced anew (as in the doctrine of Haneefa and Mohammed), it follows that the whole would be subsequent to touching.—The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the conditions of making expiation by fast are twofold;—one, that the fast precede touching;—another, that the two months be exempt from touching; and the second of these being violated by the connexion, the circumstance with respect to which the condition was made is not fulfilled, and therefore the fast must be commenced anew, because though the observance of the first condition be now rendered impossible, yet still it remains in his power to perform the expiation in such a way as may fulfil the second condition of it.

If the expiator wilfully break his fast in the day time, within the two months, either with or without excuse, he must commence it anew, according to all the doctors, as this is an interruption of the fast, a condition of which is that it be for two months successively; and this being still in his power it is therefore incumbent upon him.

Fasting the only mode in which a slave can expiate Zihar.—If a slave pronounce a Zihar upon his wife, a fast of two months successively is the only mode of expiation which is allowed him, because he is incapable of possessing any thing in his own right as a proprietor, and consequently cannot expiate in any other way.—And here, if the owner of this person were to release another of his slaves, or to distribute victuals to sixty poor men, on his behalf, yet it does not suffice, as a slave, being incapable of possessing property, cannot be regarded as a proprietor, from his master's consignment or transfer of it.

Zihar may be expiated by the distribution of alms.—If the person pronouncing a Zihar be incapable of observing a fast (from the ill state of his health or other cause), it is incumbent upon him to give victuals to sixty poor men, God having said, "WHERE A MAN CANNOT FAST, LET HIS EXPIATION BE MADE BY DISTRIBUTING VICTUALS TO SIXTY POOR MEN."—By the term victuals is here understood half a Saa* of wheat, or one Saat of barley or dates, or the value thereof in money; because the prophet has said, "for each pauper there is half a SAA of WHEAT;"—and also, because regard is here had to the removal of want from each for one day, and consequently the proportion to each is determined by the Sadka Fitter, or alms given on the festival breaking Lent.—Observe that what is here said, "or the value thereof in money," is the opinion of our doctors, as has been related at large in the book of Zakat. And if the expiator bestow one Man‡ of wheat, or two Mans of Barley, or dates upon the poor, it suffices, since this fulfils the design, as wheat and barley are of one and the same genus or nature, in respect to food, and consequently to compensate the defect in one grain by an addition of the other is lawful: contrary to a case where a man fasts, and at the end of a month becomes incapable of continuing the fast, on account of sickness, for here the expiation would not be effected by giving victuals to thirty paupers, because fasting and victuals are not homogeneous, and consequently the completion of one by means of the other is insufficient.

If the person pronouncing a Zihar desire another person to distribute the victuals for him as an expiation, and the latter do so, it suffices, as this amounts to borrowing so much; and the pauper to whom the person so commissioned gives the victuals appears first to make seisin of them in behalf of the expiator, and then to receive them on his own account; thus the expiator is first seised of the property, and then makes it over to the pauper.

If the pronouncer of a Zihar feed sixty paupers morning and evening, it suffices, where they are filled, whether they eat more or less.—Shafei says that this does not suffice, as it is requisite that the victuals be regularly consigned to sixty poor men, the same as in Zakat and Sadka Fitter, because in consigning, their wants are more effectually relieved than by feeding, which is only an act of permission, and consequently cannot stand for consignment.—The argument of our doctors is that the word Itaam, or feeding, is what is mentioned in the text, and the literal meaning of that is to give a power over food, which is found in permitting to eat, the same as in consignment: but in Zakat and Sadka Fitter, consignment is essentially requisite, and mere permission does not suffice, because there the gift is incumbent, and by gift, consignment is understood.—In short, with respect to whatever is mentioned in the sacred ordinances of the law under the term victuals, permission is sufficient; but in what is mentioned under the terms of gift or payment, consignment is a condition.

If among the sixty paupers thus fed morning and evening there be an infant newly weaned from the breast, it does not suffice, as the expiation is not in that case completely performed, a child of this description not being yet able to eat a full proportion of victuals.

With barley-bread it is requisite that some provision be bestowed such as it is usual to eat with bread, as the appetite cannot be satisfied with that alone; but with wheaten-bread this is unnecessary.

If victuals be given to one pauper for sixty days, it suffices, because the relief of want is what is required, and want recurs every day, wherefore giving it to the same person a second day amounts to giving it to a second pauper.—But if the victuals for sixty be given at once to a single pauper, it does not suffice:—yet if they be given to him at sixty separate times within the day it suffices, according to some; but others allege that it does not suffice.

Carnal connexion during expiation by alms does not require that the alms be distributed anew.—If the person pronouncing a Zihar have carnal connexion with his wife within the time of his performance of expiation by alms, as above, still it is not necessary that he should recommence, as it is not set forth as a condition in the word of God that this species of expiation should precede touching: but it nevertheless behoves him not to touch her until he shall have made expiation, as it is possible that in the interim he may be enabled to perform that by the manumission of a slave, or by fasting for two months, in which case this would induce expiation by those methods after touching, contrary to the injunction of the text.

If a man, as an expiation for two Zihars, distribute to each of sixty paupers a double proportion of victuals (suppose one Saa of wheat to each), yet this does not suffice for more than one Zihar, according to the two Elders.—Mohammed says it suffices for ooth.

—But if the victuals be bestowed in this way upon sixty paupers, as an expiation for the breach of a fast, and for Zihar, it suffices for both.—The argument of Mohammed is that what is bestowed upon the paupers aforesaid suffices for the performance of both expiations, and the persons upon whom it is bestowed are also proper subjects of both expiations, and consequently the act is effectual for two expiations, in the same manner as where the occasions of expiation are different (as in the case of expiation for a breach of fast and a Zihar),—or where the expiations are separately performed. The argument of the two Elders is that the intention, where things are of one and the same nature, is nugatory: but regard is had to it, when things are different in nature, because a respect to intention is ordained, for the sake of distinguishing between different things; and hence, if atonement were due from a person for the neglect or omission of two days' fast, in the month of Ramzan (a Thursday and a Friday for instance), and the person by fasting afterwards two days intend atonement, it suffices, although the days on which he thus fasts be not the same with the days of omission, because the thing is essentially the same; contrary to where a person owes one day's fast for atonement, and another day's fast in pursuance of a vow,—for then a distinction is necessary, because of the difference between the things: now as the intention, where the things are of the same nature, is nugatory, and as the thing bestowed is capable of constituting a single expiation only (because half a Saa of wheat to each pauper is ordained as the smallest amount sufficient towards expiation, wherefore the expiation is vitiated by being under, but not by exceeding, the prescribed quantity), it follows that the distribution of victuals as aforesaid is effectual towards one expiation only, the same as where a single expiation only is intended:—contrary to where the victuals are bestowed at separate times, because giving a second time is the same as giving to another pauper.

If the man upon whom two expiations of two Zihars are thus incumbent emancipate two of his slaves, it suffices, although he have no specific intention as to either the slaves or the Zihars, respectively:—and in like manner, if he fast for four months, or distribute victuals to one hundred and twenty paupers, it suffices, because, as the thing is the same, specific intention is not requisite.

If, moreover, this man emancipate a single slave in part of expiation of two Zihars, it rests with him to specify to which of the two he intends the manumission of that slave to apply; but if he were thus to emancipate a slave in part of expiation of a Zihar, and of a Murder, it is invalid with respect to either.

Ziffer says, that the emancipation of a single slave is totally ineffectual in either case.—Shafei, on the other hand, maintains that it is equally efficient in both cases, the specification resting with the expiator, because all expiations are of one and the same nature with respect to their end, which is the covering of criminality, but as intention with respect to things similar in nature, is unavailable, the simple intention remains; and as (if that were expiation) the expiator is at liberty to specify to which expiation the act is to apply, so here also.—The argument of Ziffer is that the expiator in this case appears to have emancipated half his slaves on account of one Zihar, and the other half on account of the other Zihar, and consequently, that he is not at liberty afterwards to specify his emancipation as applying to either Zihar in particular, after having granted it as applying to both, since he then possesses no further option.—Our doctors argue (with Shafei) that specification, with respect to things similar in nature, is unavailable, and consequently nugatory, wherefore simple intention remains; but where things are different in nature (such as the emancipation of a slave, as an expiation for Zihar, and also for homicide), the specification of intention is available; and the intention being approved, the emancipation of the slave does not apply wholly either to the expiation for Zihar, or to the expiation for homicide.—As to what Shafei advances, that all expiations are of one and the same nature, in regard to their end, it may be replied that a difference of nature between the expiations, in the present case, subsists in regard to the different occasions of them, although in respect to their end they be of one and the same nature.

CHAPTER X.

OF LAAN, OR IMPRECATION.

Definition of the term.—LAAN, in the language of the law, signifies testimonies confirmed by oath, on the part of a husband and wife (where the testimony is strengthened by an imprecation of the curse of God, on the part of the husband, and of the wrath of God on the part of the wife), in case of the former accusing the latter of adultery.

A man accusing his wife of whoredom must verify his charge by an imprecation.—If a man slander his wife (that is to say, accuse her of whoredom), or deny the descent of a child born of her, by saying, “this is not my child,” and she require him to produce the ground of his accusation, imprecation is incumbent upon him, provided both parties be competent in evidence—(that is, of sound mind, adults, free, and Mussulmans), and that the woman be of a description to subject her slanderer to punishment (that is, married,*) for if she be not such (as if she have been, for instance, enjoyed under an invalid marriage, or delivered of a child whose father is unknown), the man is not under any obligation to make an imprecation, although she be a person competent in evidence.

Conditions under which the imprecation is incumbent.—LAAN, according to the tenets of our doctors, is a testimony confirmed by oath, as was before observed; and it involves, on the part of the husband, if his accusation be false, the CURSE of God, which stands as a substitute of punishment for slander;—or, on the part of the woman, the wrath of God, which stands in the place of punishment for whoredom, if it be true:—it is therefore requisite that the parties be both competent in evidence, as the ground thereof is testimony; and it is also requisite that she be of a description to subject her slanderer to punishment, as the Laan, with respect to the husband, stands as a substitute of punishment for slander (whence the necessity of her being a married woman): and Laan is incumbent on account of the denial of a child, because the husband, in denying the child's descent, accuses his wife by implication.

OBJECTION.—The denial of the child's descent does not positively imply an accusation of the wife, as it is possible that the child may not have been begotten by the husband, and yet that the wife is not an adulteress (as where a man, for instance, has had carnal connexion with her erroneously, and a child is produced from it, in which case the child is the undoubted progeny of another), and hence, in his denial of its descent from him, the husband speaks truly, without any accusation of adultery against the wife being implied.

REPLY.—This possibility is of no weight, because a stranger, if he were to deny the descent of a child from the known and reputed father, is held to be a slanderer notwithstanding this possibility; and so in this case only.—It is also a condition of imprecation that the wife require her husband to produce the ground of his accusation, as this is her right, the demand of which is necessary, as well as that of all other matters of right; and if he decline it, the magistrate must imprison him until he either make an imprecation, or acknowledge the falsity of his charge, by saying, “I falsely attributed adultery to her,”—as this is a right due from him to his wife, and which it is in his power to render her, wherefore he is to be imprisoned till such time as he does what is incumbent, or acknowledges his falsity, so as that the occasion for the imprecation may be removed (that is, the condition of imprecation, namely, the mutual charge of falsehood), because imprecation is not incumbent except where each charges the plea of the other with falsehood, after the husband having produced against his wife an accusation of adultery. And the husband having made an imprecation, the same is then incumbent upon the wife, it being so ordained in the Koran (but imprecation commences with the husband, as he in this case appears as the plaintiff); and if she decline making imprecation, the magistrate is to imprison her till such time as she either agrees to make it, or to acknowledge her husband's veracity, this being his right incumbent upon her, and which she is able to render, wherefore she is to be imprisoned until she renders it.

Not incumbent upon slaves or infidels.—If a slave, or an infidel, or one who has suffered punishment as a slanderer, accuse his wife of whoredom, punishment for slander is due upon him, because here imprecation is impossible,* and consequently its original is due, and this is punishment for slander, that being the original ordinance in this case, according to the word of God,—“IF MEN ACCUSE MARRIED WOMEN OF WHOREDOM; AND PRODUCE NOT FOUR WITNESSES, SCOURGE THEM WITH EIGHTY STRIPES;” now imprecation is the substitute of punishment for slander; and where the substitute cannot be had, the original is due.

Nor, where the wife is a slave, an infidel, or a convicted slanderer.—If the accuser be a person competent in evidence, and his wife be a slave, or an infidel, or a Kitabeca, or one who has suffered punishment as a slanderer, or of the description of those whose accusers are not liable to punishment, as being an infant, or idiot, or adulteress, punishment is not due, nor is imprecation incumbent upon him, as in this instance neither competency in evidence nor marriage (in the sense which induces punishment) are attached to the accused.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that in this case punishment for slander is due upon the husband, as imprecation is a substitute for that, and where the substitute cannot be had, it follows that the original is due.

REPLY.—Punishment is not due upon the husband, as he is capable of imprecation, the obstacle to which exists in this case on the part of the wife, and this circumstance precludes punishment, in the same manner as where she acknowledges the truth of the accusation.—The foundation of this is a saying of the prophet, namely, “There are four descriptions of women with respect to whom imprecation is not incumbent, Jews and Christians married to MUSSULMANS, and slaves married to freemen, and free women married to slaves.”

Nor where both parties are convicted slanderers.—If the accuser and his wife be persons who have both already suffered punishment for slander, punishment is due upon the former, because in this case a reason is found against imprecation on the part of the accuser, he being incapable of making it.

Form of imprecation and the manner of making it.—THE manner of imprecation is as follows:—The Kazee first applies to the husband, who is to give evidence four several times, by saying, “I call God to witness to the truth of my testimony concerning the adultery with which I charge this woman;” and again, a fifth time, “may the curse of God fall upon me if I have spoken falsely concerning the adultery with which I charge this woman;”—after which the Kazee requires the woman to give evidence, four separate times, by saying “I call God to witness that my husband's words are altogether false, respecting the adultery with which he charges me;” and again, a fifth time, “may the wrath of God light upon me if my husband is just, in bringing a charge of adultery against me.”—Hasan records it: an opinion of Haneefa that the husband should, in making the imprecation, address himself in the second person, saying, “by God I speak truly concerning the adultery with which I charge you,” because the use of the second person does not admit the possibility of the address affecting any other. The reason for the form, as above stated, is that the relative, when joined to the third person, removes doubt.

When both parties have made imprecation, a separation takes place.—AND on both making imprecation in this manner, a separation takes place between them; but not until the Kazee pronounces a decree to that effect.—Zifler says that separation takes place upon the imprecation, independent of any judicial decree, because a perpetual prohibition is established by it, the prophet having said, “the two who make imprecation can never come together,”—which proves their separation, as the prophet's forbidding their ever coming together after imprecation expressly declares this. The argument of our doctors is that as, in consequence of the establishment of a prohibition between them, the retaining of the woman with humanity* is impossible, it is incumbent upon the husband to divorce her on a principle of benevolence; but if he decline so doing, it then behoves the Kazee to issue a decree of divorce, as the Kazee is the substitute of the husband in this matter for the purpose of removing injustice: and a proof of this is that Aweemar divorced his wife after imprecation, in the presence of the prophet, which shows that the marriage still continued, and was not virtually dissolved by the imprecation, otherwise the prophet would have prevented him from pronouncing divorce.—Observe that the separation here mentioned is an irreversible divorce, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, because the act of the Kazee must be referred to the husband, as in cases of impotence.

The husband, on receding from his imprecation, may again marry his wife.—If, after imprecation, the husband should acknowledge that his accusation was false, by saying, “I falsely laid adultery to her charge,” he becomes privileged with respect to her, that is to say, it is lawful for him to marry her as well as any other person.* This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Abou Yousaf says that she is for ever prohibited to him, and that he cannot marry her, the prophet having said, “two who make imprecation can never come together,” which shows the separation established between them to be perpetual; wherefore his marriage with her is illegal.—The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the husband’s acknowledgment is a retraction from his evidence (that is, from his imprecation), and evidence is by subsequent retraction rendered null and of no effect: and as to the saying of the prophet above cited, it means that the parties cannot come together as long as they both persevere in their imprecation; but after the husband’s acknowledgment, the imprecation no longer remains either in substance or in effect, and consequently they may then come together.

Imprecation occasions a decree of bastardy.—If a husband accuse his wife, by denying her child, it is requisite that the Kazee issue a decree denying the descent of the child from him and affixing it upon the mother;† and the manner of the imprecation here is that the Kazee first makes the husband give evidence, saying, “I testify in the sight of God that I speak truly concerning the matter I have brought against her, in denying the child;” after which he makes the wife give evidence in the same manner, saying, “I call God to witness that he speaks falsely concerning the matter he has brought against me, in denying the child.”

If a husband accuse his wife, both by bringing a charge of adultery against her, and also by denying a child born of her, it is necessary that both these circumstances be mentioned in the imprecation, after which the Kazee is to issue a decree, denying the descent of the child from the husband, and fixing it upon the mother, because the prophet once so decreed upon such an occasion, and also, because the design of the imprecation in this case is to bastardize the child, wherefore a decree must be passed agreeably to the design of it.

A DECREE of separation between the parties comprehends a decree of bastardy in respect to the child.—It is recorded as an opinion of Abou Yousaf that, in a decree of separation, a decree of bastardy is not comprehended, but that it is requisite that the magistrate first effect the separation, and then say, “I throw the child upon the mother, and remove it from the father’s house;” because separation may sometimes take place without affecting the descent of children, as where a man accuses of adultery a wife who has children,* in which case a separation is established by imprecation, but bastardy is not induced upon the children; the Kazee’s mention of bastardy is therefore requisite.

A husband receding from imprecation must be punished for slander.—If a husband, after imprecation, contradict himself, by acknowledging that he had accused his wife falsely, let the magistrate punish him, because he then acknowledges himself liable to punishment: and it is afterwards lawful for the husband to marry her again (according to Haneefa and Mohammed), because, having once suffered punishment for slander, competency to make imprecation no longer appertains to him; and the prohibition which is the effect of the imprecation is removed. In the same manner, if the husband and wife make imprecation, and the husband afterwards accuse of adultery a strange woman, who is married, and suffer punishment on that account, it then becomes lawful for him to marry his wife again, for the reason aforesaid. And so also, if the wife, after divorce in consequence of imprecation, be found in adultery, and suffer correction from the Kazee on that account, it then becomes lawful for the husband to marry her again, as a competency to make imprecation no longer appertains to her.

Imprecation not incumbent where the husband or wife is an infant, or an idiot.—If a man accuse his wife, she being an infant or an idiot, imprecation is not incumbent upon the parties, because the accuser of such a person is not liable to punishment for slander unless he be a stranger; imprecation, therefore, is not incumbent in the accusation of such wives by their husbands, as it is the substitute of punishment for slander. And the rule is the same where the husband is insane, or an idiot, because such an one is not competent in evidence.

Or where the husband is dumb.—If a dumb person accuse his wife, imprecation is not incumbent, because imprecation is not incumbent unless the accusation be expressed in terms, as is the case in slander, where punishment is not incurred unless the accusation has been expressly made.—Shafei opposes this; for he holds that punishment is due upon the accusation of a dumb person, and consequently, that imprecation is incumbent, because his signs are the same as the words of one who has the power of speech; but the argument of our doctors is that the signs of a dumb person are not altogether free from doubt, and punishment is removed by any circumstance of doubt.

* That is, without her being previously married to another.

† That is, bastardizing it.

* Meaning, children already born, before the period of the husband’s accusation.

Or where the accusation is indirectly insinuated.—If a man say to his wife, “your pregnancy is not of me,” imprecation is not incumbent.—This is the opinion of Haneefa and Ziffer; and the reason upon which they found it is, that the circumstance of pregnancy does not admit of being positively certified, wherefore the husband’s words do not convey an immediate accusation.—The two disciples say that imprecation is incumbent in this case, provided the woman be delivered of a child within six months; and it is this which is meant by what is said in the Mabsoot that “the existence of pregnancy at the time of accusation may be certified;” but to this we reply that where the accusation cannot be immediately established, it must remain suspended upon a condition, in the same manner as if the husband were to say to his wife, “if you produce a child it is not mine;” and the suspension of accusation upon a condition is nugatory.

BUT if he were to say to her, “you are an adulteress, and your pregnancy proceeds from adultery,” imprecation is incumbent upon both parties, as accusation is here established in the mention of adultery. Yet the Kazeer is not in this case to issue any decree affecting the descent of the fetus.—Shafei says that a decree of bastardy must be pronounced, because the prophet decreed a bastardy in the instance of Hillaal, who had accused his pregnant wife.—The argument of our doctors is that the effect of a decree of bastardy cannot take place until after delivery, since before delivery there is a possibility of doubt respecting the pregnancy; the Kazeer, therefore, is not to decree a bastardy.—As to the decree of the prophet quoted by Shafei, it is possible that the prophet may have been certified of the woman’s pregnancy by inspiration.

Imprecation made posterior to the birth of a child does not affect that child’s descent.—If a husband deny the descent of the child upon the near approach of birth, or at the time when it is usual to receive congratulations, and to purchase clothes and make preparations for it, his denial holds good, and imprecation is incumbent upon him on account of it: but if he do not deny it until afterwards, although imprecation be here also incumbent, yet the descent of the child remains established in him.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa.—The two disciples say that the denial is admitted during labour, as it is admitted within a little time, but not within a long time, and hence a distinction is made between the shorter period and the longer, by the time of labour, as the pains of labour are among the effects of breeding.—The argument of Haneefa is, that it is impossible to fix any time, because time is fixed for the purpose of consideration, and mankind vary in the length of time necessary for that purpose; wherefore regard is had to a thing which shows the child to be his, namely, his receiving the usual congratulations, or remaining silent at the time of such congratulations, or purchasing things to prepare for the birth, or letting that time pass without denying it.—This is where he is present; but if he be absent, and ignorant of the birth of the child, and afterwards come, the time aforesaid is regarded, according to both authorities; that is to say, with Haneefa, it remains to him to deny the child within such space of time as congratulations are admitted—and with the two disciples, within the space of time which corresponds with a woman’s labour.

If two children be produced at one birth, and the husband deny the descent of the first-born, and admit that of the second, in this case the parentage of both is established in him, because they are both supposed to be begotten from one seed; and punishment is due upon the husband, because he has contradicted himself in acknowledging the second child; and if he admit the first, and deny the second, the parentage of both is established in him for the same reason: and imprecation is here incumbent, because his denial of the second child implies an accusation from which he does not afterwards retract (as in the former instance), since his virtual declaration of his wife’s chastity, in acknowledging the parentage of one of the children, here precedes the accusation, being the same as if he were first to say, “she is chaste,” and then to say, “she is an adulteress,” in which case imprecation would be incumbent, and so here likewise.

CHAPTER XI.

OF IMPOTENCE.

An impotent husband must be allowed a year’s probation, after which separation takes place.—If a husband be Inneen [impotent], it is requisite that the Kazeer appoint the term of one year from the period of litigation, within which if the accused have carnal connexion with his wife it is well; but if not, the Kazeer must pronounce a separation, provided such be the desire of the wife, because the same is recorded from Alee, and Omar, and Ebn Musood,—and also, because the woman is entitled to the carnal enjoyment, and it is possible that the husband may be incapacitated from the performance of that act, not only by a radical infirmity, but also by some supervenient and accidental cause, whence it is necessary that some certain term be appointed, in order that the true reason of his inability may be ascertained;—and this term is fixed at one year, because that contains four seasons, and diseases are principally occasioned by an excess either of heat, cold, dryness, or humidity: qualities which are peculiar to each season respectively; and it is probable that one of these four may particularly agree with the man's constitution, so as by its influence to dissipate his disease; thus it may be ascertained, when a year has completely elapsed, whether his inability proceeded from any radical infirmity, in which case, it is impossible to retain the wife with humanity,* and hence it is incumbent upon the husband to separate from her, upon a principal of benevolence: but if he should not do so, the Kazee is in that case to pronounce a separation, as his substitute; yet it is requisite that the woman desire such separation, as it is her right.—The separation here mentioned amounts to the execution of a single divorce irreversible, because the act of the Kazee is attributed to the husband, whence it is the same as if he had himself pronounced such a sentence upon her. Shafei alleges that this separation is an annulment of the marriage; but with our doctors marriage is held to be incapable of being annulled of itself, although it may be annulled by effect, in the same manner as in the case of a husband's apostacy. And this separation amounts to an irreversible divorce, not a reversible, because the intent of it is the woman's relief from a hardship, which cannot be effected but by complete divorce; for if it were not so, it would still remain in the husband's power to reverse it, which would defeat the design.

And the wife retains her whole dower, if the husband should ever have been in retirement with her.—The wife, in the case here mentioned, is entitled to her whole dower, if the husband should ever have been in retirement with her, because retirement with an Inneen is accounted a Khalwat Saheeh, or complete retirement, as well as with any other person; and an Eddit is incumbent upon her, as was mentioned in a former place.—What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the husband acknowledging that he has not performed the carnal act with his wife.

But the wife's claim of separation may be here defeated by the husband swearing that he had enjoyed her.—But if he controvert her plea, asserting that he has copulated with her, and she have been married as a Siyeeba, his affirmation upon oath is to be credited, because he is the defendant against her claim of separation, and the affirmation of a defendant must be credited when given upon oath: moreover, the instrument of generation is originally created free from inability or disease, and it is natural that he should perform the carnal act where no obstruction exists; and the declaration of a person is to be credited when apparent circumstances bear testimony to his veracity, and where he rests his cause upon the nature of things. If, therefore, the husband thus make oath, the wife's right of separation is thereby defeated; but if he decline this, the term of a year is then to be appointed as aforesaid. Where she was married as a virgin, she is to be examined by some of her own sex, and if they declare her to be still a virgin, the term of a year is to be appointed, as above, because the husband's falsehood is then evident: but if they declare her muliebrity,* the Kazee is in that case to require the husband to make oath, which if he do, her right to separation is defeated; but if he decline, decision is to be delayed for a year as above.—All that has here been said supposes the husband to be merely Inneen, or impotent: but if he be a Majboob, or complete eunuch (that is, one deprived both of yard and testicles, or of the former only), the Kazee is to pronounce an immediate separation (where such is the woman's desire), because in this case the delay of a year can be attended with no advantage: if, however, he be only a Khasee, or simple eunuch (that is, castrated), decision is to be deferred for a year, as in a case of impotency, because there the yard still remains, with which it is possible that he may perform the act.

Rules to be observed at the expiration of the year of probation.—WHERE the term of a year is appointed for the trial of a man charged with impotency by a wife whom he had married as a virgin, and he declares, at the expiration thereof, that he has had carnal connexion with her within that interval, and she denies this, she is then to be examined by some of her own sex; if they pronounce her to be still a virgin, she has it at her option either to separate from her husband, or to continue with him, because the testimony of the examiners is confirmed by her virginity, that being the original state of every woman; but should they declare her muliebrity, the husband is then to be required on the other hand to make oath, which if he decline, she has an option, as above, her plea being strengthened by the circumstance of his declining to swear; but if he swear, she has no option. If, moreover, she was a Siyeeba originally (that is at the time of marriage), and the husband declare that he has had carnal connexion with her within the year of probation, and she deny this, his declaration upon oath is to be credited,—that is to say, the oath is to be tendered to him, which, if he take, she has no option; but if he decline it, she has then an option as already stated. And here, if she choose to continue with him, she has no subsequent option, as by so doing she manifests an assent to the relinquishment of her right.

The year of probation to be calculated by the lunar calendar.—THE year of probation appointed by the Kazee in cases of impotency is to be counted by the lunar calendar; this is approved; and the days of the courses, and of religious fasts (such as Ramzan), are

* Alluding to the words of the Koran before mentioned therein included, as these occur in all years alike, nor can a year pass without them; but the days of sickness of either party are not included, as a year may pass exempt from such an occurrence.

A husband cannot annul the marriage, where the defect is on the part of the wife.—If the defect be on the part of the woman, the husband has no right to annul the marriage.*—Shafei maintains that he may annul it, and put her away, on account of any of the five following defects, namely, leprosy, scrophula, madness, Ritk,† or Karrn,‡ because some of these (such as the two latter) are obstructive of generation; and others (such as the three former) are causes of natural and insuperable aversion, as is confirmed by a tradition of the prophet, who has said, “flee from LEPERS as ye would from a WILD BEAST.”—The argument of our doctors is that if the enjoyment of the wife’s person were to be totally precluded by any circumstance (such as death, for instance, before retirement), yet the marriage is not annulled, but is rather established and confirmed, inasmuch that the whole dower remains due; and hence, where such privation of the connubial enjoyment is merely dubious, on account of its being occasioned only by a defect in the subject, it remains unannulled, a fortiori, upon this ground, that the design of matrimony is to legalize generation, and the connubial enjoyment is the advantage proposed in it; and the ability to perform the act, where any natural obstruction exists, may be obtained, as in a case of Ritk or Karrn (for instance), which are to be remedied by chirurgical operations; and in all other cases the ability is evident.

A wife cannot sue for a separation on the ground of her husband being leprous, scrophulous, or insane.—If the husband be lunatic, leprous, or scrophulous, yet his wife has no option, as in cases where he is an eunuch, or impotent. This is according to Hancefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed says that she is entitled to an option, in order that she may remove an evil from herself: contrary to the case of a husband, he having it in his power, in similar circumstances, to relieve himself by divorce. The argument of the two Elders is that in marriage no right of option originally exists, for if this were allowed, it would operate to the destruction of the husband’s right; and it is admitted in the case of eunuchs, or of persons naturally impotent, only because the circumstance of natural or accidental infirmity tends to defeat the end for which marriage was instituted; but with persons of the descriptions now under consideration this reason does not hold, as the husband who labours under any of those defects is still capable of generation, whence an evident difference appears between the two cases.

CHAPTER XII.

OF THE EDIT. ¶

Definition of the term.—By Edit is understood the term of probation incumbent upon a woman in consequence of the dissolution of marriage after carnal connexion: the most approved definition of Edit is, the term by the completion of which a new marriage is rendered lawful.

The Edit of divorce of a free woman is three menstruations.—WHEN a man repudiates his wife, being a free woman, either by a reversible or an irreversible divorce, or when separation takes place between a husband and wife, without divorce, after carnal connexion, the Edit, or woman’s term of probation, consists of three terms of her courses, provided she be one who is subject to the menstrual discharge, God having so commanded in the Koran.—The separation which takes place between a married couple, independent of divorce, bears the same construction as divorce, because the Edit is made incumbent in a case of divorce for the purpose of ascertaining whether the woman be pregnant, and the same necessity occurs where separation takes place between a husband and an enjoyed wife without divorce.—The separation without divorce may be occasioned either by a woman admitting the son of her husband to carnal connexion, or by her apostatizing from the faith.

And of one not subject to courses, three months; and of one who is pregnant, the term of her travail.—THE Edit of a woman who, on account of extreme youth or age, is not subject to the menstrual discharge, is three months, because God has so ordained in the sacred writings.—The Edit of a pregnant woman is accomplished by her delivery, whether she be a slave or free, because God, in the sacred writings, has so ordained respecting woman in that situation.

That of a slave is two menstruations.—THE Edit of a female slave is two terms of her courses, because it is thus mentioned in the traditions, and also, because bondage is restrictive to the half, whence it would appear that the Edit of a slave should be only one term and a half of her courses, but the menstrual discharge being incapable of subdivision, the half is, of necessity, made a whole term, and hence the Edit of such an one is two terms; and it is to this that Omar adverts, where he says, “I would if possible fix the Edit of a female slave at one and an half of her courses.”

And of one not subject to courses a month and an half.—WHERE the female slave is one who from extreme youth or age is not

* That is, to break it off, so as to destroy the woman’s claim to her dower, which could not be done by divorce.

† Vulva impervia cocuntis.

‡ A bone, or other unnatural excrescence, vulva anteriore parte enascens.

subject to the menstrual discharge, her Edit is one month and an half, because time being capable of subdivision, the term is fixed at the half on account of her bondage.

Edit of widowhood.—THE Edit of a free woman upon the decease of her husband is four months and ten days, such being the term mentioned in the Koran;—and that of a female slave in the like circumstance is two months and five days, bondage being restrictive to the half.

Case of Edit of widowhood after divorce.—If a man divorce his wife upon his deathbed, so as that she still inherits of him,* Hancefa and Mohammed say that her Edit, in consequence of his decease, is four months and ten days, if she complete three terms of her courses within that period; but if the three terms be not accomplished, as requiring a longer time (five months for instance), her Edit is in that case three terms of her courses, whatever time those may require. In short, here are two terms; one, that of four months and ten days; and the other, that of three menstruations; and whichever of these is the longest, the same is the term of Edit.—Abou Yoosaf says that the Edit of this woman is three menstruations.—This difference of doctrine obtains where the sick person has repudiated his wife by one divorce irreversible, or by three divorces:—but where the divorce is reversible, the Edit is four months and ten days, according to all the doctors. The argument of Abou Yoosaf, in support of this doctrine, as above, is that the marriage had been dissolved and terminated by the divorce, previous to the decease of the husband, and the Edit of divorce is three terms of the courses, whence such is the Edit incumbent in the present case, as that of four months and ten days (being the Edit of widowhood), is required only where the marriage was dissolved by the husband's decease; but in the present case it was dissolved before his death, by divorce. To this indeed it may be objected that, if the marriage be dissolved before the husband's decease, it would follow that the wife cannot inherit:—but the marriage is accounted to hold in respect to inheritance only, and not so as to alter or affect the Edit:—contrary to where a dying husband repudiates his wife by a reversible divorce; her Edit in that case being universally held to be strictly an Edit of widowhood, since the marriage then actually continues in every shape.—The argument of Hancefa and Mohammed is that the marriage being here accounted to continue with respect to inheritance, is also accounted to continue with respect to Edit; and hence the longest of the two is regarded.—If a man be put to death for apostasy, so as that his wife inherits of him, the same difference of opinion obtains respecting her Edit as is above recited.—Some commentators allege that her Edit is held to be three terms of her courses by all the doctors, as her marriage is not accounted to continue to the time of her husband's decease with respect to inheritance, since a Mussulman woman cannot inherit of an infidel: but yet the wife does her inherit, because her claim to inheritance is established upon the instant of her husband's apostasy;—her Edit, therefore, is three terms of her courses.

A female slave, emancipated during Edit, must observe the Edit of a free woman.—If a master emancipate his female slave, whilst in her Edit from a reversible divorce, she is in that case under Edit as a free woman, and must count it accordingly: because, in reversible divorce, so long as the Edit is unaccomplished, marriage continues in every shape:—but if a master emancipate his female slave, whilst in her Edit from a divorce irreversible, or from the decease of her husband, her Edit is not affected or altered by such emancipation:—that is, it does not become the Edit of a free woman, because her marriage has been completely dissolved by the irreversible divorce, or by the husband's death.

Rule of Edit of a woman past bearing.—If an Aycesa* be in her Edit, counting it by months, and the menstrual discharge should chance to appear upon her, in this case all regard to that portion of the Edit which has been counted by months drops, and her Edit commences de novo, to be counted by the terms of her courses.—The compiler of this work observes that this is where the Aycesa had been subject to the courses before she became hopeless of children, as in this case her despair is done away; and this is approved, because it is evident that months, with respect to such a woman, are not the absolute substitutes of Edit: but if an Aycesa be one to whom the menstrual discharge had never occurred before, and be in her Edit, counting it by months, and see the appearance of the sanguinary discharge, regard to the term of the Edit which has been counted by months does not drop, because the counting by months is the original rule with respect to such a woman, and not merely the substitute for her courses.

If a woman be in her Edit, counting it by the term of her courses, and after two of those they should stop, and she become an Aycesa, her Edit commences de novo, to be counted by months, and all regard to the courses drops, so as that the substitute (which is months) and the original (which is the courses) may not be confounded.

Rule of Edit in an invalid marriage.—THE Edit of a woman wedded by an invalid marriage is counted by her courses, both in case of her husband's death, and also of a separation taking place between them; and so likewise that of a woman with whom a man has had carnal connexion erroneously; because, in those cases, the Edit is incumbent merely for the purpose of ascertaining whether the woman be pregnant, and not as a right of marriage; and as the courses are the means of ascertaining the state of the womb, the Edit of those women is to be counted by their returns.

* Literally, a despairer, that is, a woman whose courses are stopped, and who is consequently supposed to be past child-bearing.

Edit of an Am-Walid.—If the master of an Am-Walid should die, or emancipate her, her Edit is three terms of her courses.—Shafei says that her Edit is only one term, as it is incumbent upon her on account only of the extinction of the owner's propriety, and consequently no more is requisite to effect it than what may suffice to cleanse her womb.—The argument of our doctors is, that Edit is incumbent upon her, on account of the extinction of *Firash (for she is the partner of her master's bed), and is, therefore, the same as that used in the dissolution of marriage:—moreover, Omar has said, "the Edit of an AM-WALID is three terms of her courses."—If the Am-Walid be not subject to the menstrual discharge, her Edit is three months, the same as that of a married woman.

Edit of the widow of an infant.—If an infant die, leaving a wife pregnant, her Edit is accomplished by her delivery, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Abou Yoosaf says that it is four months and ten days (and such also is the opinion of Shafei), because the pregnancy cannot be attributed to the infant, and is, therefore, with respect to him, the same as if it had taken place posterior to his decease.—The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed herein are twofold: FIRST, the word of God, who has said in the Koran, "A WOMAN, IF SHE BE PREGNANT, MUST WAIT UNTIL HER DELIVERY,"—which is generally expressed, and therefore applies to the woman here treated of: SECONDLY, the Edit of a woman whose husband dies is (in case of her pregnancy) fixed at the remaining term of her travail, whether that be short or long; now the Edit of a widow is not designed for the purpose of ascertaining the state of her womb; for if it were so, it would not be determined by the lapse of time (supposing her to be one who is subject to the menstrual discharge), but by three terms of her courses; whereas we see that the law fixes it at four months and ten days, although she be a woman of that description; but it is made incumbent merely as a fulfilment of one of the rights of marriage: and the same reasoning applies to the wife of the infant in question, although her pregnancy be not attributed to him: contrary to where pregnancy takes place, subsequent to the infant's decease; for here her Edit of four months and ten days having commenced, is not afterwards to be altered by her subsequent pregnancy; but in the case now under consideration, the Edit of the term of travail was due from the instant that Edit became incumbent; hence there is an evident difference between the two cases; and consequently there is no analogy between them. The pregnancy is determined to have taken place after the death of the husband, where the woman is not delivered within less than six months from the date of the husband's decease.—This is the approved rule. Some have said that it is so judged only where she is delivered within not less than two years. But if a husband, being adult, should die, and his wife be delivered of a child at any time between six months and two years from the period of his decease, her Edit is accomplished by her delivery, because the pregnancy is in this case attributed to the husband, and hence is accounted the same as if it had existed at the period of his decease.—Observe that the parentage of a child born of the wife of an infant cannot be established in the infant, whether her pregnancy had appeared during his life, or not until after his decease, because an infant, not being possessed of seed, cannot be conceived capable of impregnating a woman; and marriage is not held to be a substitute for seed,* excepting where the existence of seed on the part of the man may be supposed.

Edit of divorce of a menstruous woman.—If a man divorce his wife whilst in her courses, that term is not to be counted in her Edit, because the Edit is fixed at three complete menstruations, and if the above were to be counted, it would induce a deficiency, as part of that had passed previous to divorce, and therefore cannot be included.

Edit of a divorced woman who has connexion with a man during the term of her Edit of divorce.—If a man have carnal connexion with a woman who is in her Edit from divorce, another Edit becomes incumbent upon her, and the two are blended together,—that is to say, her ensuing courses are accounted in both Edits; and if the former Edit should be accomplished before the latter, the accomplishment of that still remains incumbent upon her. This is the opinion of our doctors.—Shafei maintains that two Edits cannot be blended together, because the Edit is an act of piety (as it restrains from taking another husband, and so forth), and two acts of piety are not permitted to be united in one account; as in fasting for instance, where no part of the abstinence of one day can be put to the account of another.—The argument of our doctors is that the design of the Edit is to ascertain the state of the womb, and as that is answered by a single Edit, the two Edits may be counted together; and piety is not the design of the Edit, but rather a dependant on it;

* Firash literally means a bed, whence it is metaphorically used to express a right of cohabitation or concubinage: it is so used in the sense of a wife or a concubine, whence it is here and elsewhere translated partner of his bed.

* That is, cannot be held to amount to a virtual establishment of parentage.

whence it is that the Edit may be accomplished, even without the knowledge of the woman, merely by her refraining from going abroad, or from marrying another husband, or from consummating her marriage with him during the term of it.

Edit of a widow who admits a man during her Edit of widowhood.—If a man have carnal connexion with a woman who is in her Edit from the death of her husband, she is to complete that of four months and ten days, being the Edit of widowhood; at the same time counting such terms of her courses as may occur within the remainder of that time, so as that the two Edits may be counted together as far as is possible.

The Edit of a widow, or a divorced wife, may be accomplished without her knowledge.

The Edit of divorce commences immediately upon divorce, and that of widowhood upon the decease of the husband; if, therefore, a woman be not informed of her widowhood or divorce until such time as the term of Edit be passed, her Edit is then accomplished, because the occasion of Edit being incumbent is widowhood or divorce, and it is therefore held to commence upon the occurrence of the occasion.—Our modern doctors have decreed that the Edit of divorce should not be held to commence until the divorce be publicly declared, in order to guard against collusion between the parties; as it is possible that a husband and wife might privately agree to declare a divorce, and pretend that Edit had already past, so as that, by this means, the marriage being dissolved, he might be enabled to acknowledge a debt in her favour, or make her a bequest of more than her proper inheritance.

Edit from an invalid marriage.—In an invalid marriage the Edit commences immediately upon the Kaze's decree of separation, or upon the determination of the husband, expressly signified, to refrain from carnal connexion.—Ziffer says it commences from the date of the last carnal connexion of the parties, because, in an invalid marriage, it is the carnal connexion which gives occasion for it, and not the marriage.—The arguments of our doctors are twofold;—FIRST, every instance of carnal connexion occurring in an invalid marriage stands only as one single act, as they all proceed from, and originate in, one contract (whence it is that one dower suffices for the whole); wherefore, until the actual separation, or determination signified, as above, Edit cannot be established, for in every previous instance of carnal connexion it is possible that the same may be repeated; and hence, so long as the separation or determination do not exist, no particular instance of the carnal act can be positively termed the last;—SECONDLY, the last instance of carnal connexion cannot be ascertained to be the last, but by the husband's signified determination to refrain for the future, since permission on the part of the woman, and ability on that of the man, in a matter of so concealed and doubtful a nature as carnal connexion, stand as a continuance of it, and any other man who may be desirous to marry the woman will require to know the effect of the Edit; it is therefore requisite that something known and visible be substituted for that which is concealed, so as that such visible circumstance may afford a standard whereby to determine.

A woman's oath confirms the accomplishment of her Edit.—If a woman under Edit should declare that it is accomplished, and her husband deny this, her declaration upon oath is to be credited, because she is confided in in this point, and he has thrown an imputation upon her veracity; she is therefore to swear in the manner of a plaintiff.

Case of a woman re-married after divorce, and again repudiated.—When a man, having repudiated his wife by an irreversible divorce, marries her again during her Edit, and afterwards divorces her before consummation, a complete dower is in this case incumbent upon him, and upon the woman an Edit de novo, according to Haneefa and Abou Yoosaf.—Moffammed says that no more is incumbent upon the man than an half dower, nor upon the woman than the accomplishment of her first Edit, because the second divorce is a divorce before consummation, and therefore does not require either that he should pay a complete dower, or that he should observe a new Edit; nor does anything remain with respect to her; but that she complete the first Edit incumbent in consequence of the first divorce: for the obligation upon the woman to complete her first Edit disappeared upon the husband marrying her again; but this last marriage being done away by his divorcing her a second time, her obligation to the completion of her first Edit recurs. The argument of Haneefa and Abou Yoosaf is that the second-divorce is, in fact, given after carnal connexion, since the woman is still actually within the seisin of the man in consequence of such connexion formerly had with her, the effect of which remains, namely, the Edit; and where he marries her again during her Edit, she being still within his seisin, such possession is the substitute of that which appertains to him in virtue of the second marriage; as in the case of an usurper, who if he make purchase of the article usurped whilst it is within his seisin, is held to be seised of the purchase on the instant of the execution of the contract of sale; it is therefore evident that the second divorce is a divorce after carnal connexion.—Ziffer says that no Edit whatever is incumbent upon the woman, because the former Edit dropt in consequence of the second marriage, and therefore cannot recur; and no Edit is due on account of the second divorce, as that is a divorce before consummation: but the arguments of the two Elders, as above recited, are a sufficient reply to this.

If a Zimnee, or infidel subject, repudiate his wife who is also an infidel subject, no Edit is incumbent upon her: and the same applies to an alien woman who, having been converted to the faith, comes from the foreign into the Mussulman territory :* it is therefore lawful for such women to marry before the expiration of the term of Edit, unless they be pregnant. This is the opinion of Haneefa with respect to such infidel subjects as do not hold or believe in the obligation of Edit. The two disciples say that Edit is incumbent upon women of either description ;—upon infidel subjects, because they have bound themselves to the observance of all such things as appertain to the temporal law ; and upon aliens who, having embraced the faith, come into the Mussulman territory, because it is so upon such women on other accounts, such as the death of their husbands, or their admitting the son of the husband to carnal connexion, and is therefore equally obligatory on account of separation of country,—contrary to the case where a man, being converted to the faith, comes from a foreign into a Mussulman territory, and his wife remains in the foreign country, for upon her no Edit is incumbent, as the obligation of it cannot reach or affect her in a foreign land.

—The argument of Haneefa with respect to infidel subjects is that they not being under any obligation in respect to the ordinances of the law, the obligation of the Edit, as a right of the law, cannot be conceived to affect them nor can it be supposed to do so on account of the right of the husband, as he does not hold or believe in the obligation of it ; and his arguments with respect to alien women are twofold :—FIRST, God has commanded Mussulmans, saying, “ YE MAY MARRY FOREIGN WOMEN, WHO BEING CONVERTED TO THE FAITH, COME INTO THE TERRITORY OF THE BELIEVERS.” SECONDLY, wherever the Edit is incumbent, the right of man is connected with it ; but a Hirbee, or alien, is not considered as man, but as mere matter (whence it is that he is made a property or slave).—But where the woman is pregnant the Edit is incumbent, on account that the fetus of which she is pregnant is of established descent.—It is recorded from Haneefa that it is lawful to marry such women, being pregnant, but that the husband must refrain from carnal connexion until after delivery, in like manner as in the case of women pregnant and by whoredom.—The former, however, is the better opinion.

Section.

Of Hidad, or Mourning.

Definition.—By Hidad is understood a woman abstaining from the use of perfumes, such as scented or other oils ; or of ornaments, such as dyeing the edge of the eyelids with antimony, and so forth, except on account of some particular pretext, or (as is said in the Jama Sagheer) on account of aches or pains which those applications may remedy.

—Mourning is incumbent on the death of a husband.—HIDAD, or mourning, is incumbent upon a woman whose husband dies, where she is of mature age and a Musslima, because the prophet has said, “ It is not lawful for a woman who believes in God, and a future state, to observe HIDAD for more than three days on account of the death of any one except her HUSBAND ; but for him it is incumbent upon her to observe HIDAD for the space of four months and ten days.”

Although he die during the wife's Edit from irreversible divorce.—OUR doctors say that it is equally incumbent upon a woman whose husband dies whilst she is under repudiation by irreversible divorce.—Shafei asserts that it is not incumbent upon her, because the sole intention of its institution is to signify grief for the decease of a husband who has faithfully adhered to the marriage contract until death ; but there is no cause of grief for the demise of one who had, during life, thrown his wife into difficulty and perplexity by divorce. The arguments of our doctors, in support of their opinion upon this point, are twofold ; FIRST, the prophet forbade women under Edit dying their hands with Henna,* as it is a species of perfume ; SECONDLY, mourning is incumbent as a sign of grief for the loss of the blessings of matrimony, which is not only the means of her support, but also of the preservation of her chastity ; and an irreversible divorcee is a more complete termination of those blessings than even death itself, since it is lawful for a woman to perform the last offices of ablution, and so forth, to the corpse of a deceased husband from whom she is not irreversibly divorced, whereas it is not lawful for her to perform those offices to the corpse of one from whom she is completely divorced ; wherefore in this case also a mourning is incumbent.—It may here be observed that mourning is incumbent for two reasons ; FIRST, as it is a manifestation of grief (as was mentioned above) ; SECONDLY, because ornamenting or setting off the person by the use of the above articles is a means of exciting the desires of men, and to a woman under Edit marriage is forbidden, wherefore she must refrain from the use of such things, lest she fall into that which is prohibited.—It is recorded, in the Nakl Saheeh, that the prophet would not permit women under Edit to use antimony upon their eyelids, or to anoint themselves, as the former is an ornament, and the latter is one way of using perfume.—By what is said in the definition of Hidad, in the beginning of this section, viz., “ abstaining from perfumes, and so forth, except on account of some particular pretext,” is to be understood that the use of those is lawful, where there is any sufficient reason for it, as they are then used of necessity; but it is requisite that the intention [of the Mourner] in the use of them be medicine, and not ornament.

If a woman be accustomed to the use of unguents, in such a manner that there might be an apprehension of her health suffering from the disuse, in this case, provided the cause for apprehension be in her conception apparent and evident, it is lawful to continue the use of them, because things of which occurrence is strongly apprehended by her are considered as actually existing and established; and in the same manner, she may be furnished with velvet garments, where there is a necessity; but it is in no wife lawful for her to use Henna, because of the precept of the prophet before recited; nor to wear cloth dyed with saffron, because that gives a perfume.

*Mourning not incumbent upon infidel women or infants (but it is incumbent upon slaves).—*MOURNING is not incumbent upon an infidel woman, as she is not bound to the observances required by the law; neither is it incumbent upon infants or girls under age, for the same reason; but it is incumbent upon female slaves, they being bound to the observances of the law in all such points as do not affect the right of their owner, which is the case with mourning; it is to be observed, however, that the mourning, with respect to female slaves, does not include a prohibition from going abroad, since this would be an infringement upon the proprietor's right, which precedes the right of God, as the individual is necessitous, whereas God is not so.

Nor upon Am-Walids, nor upon widows from invalid marriage.—MOURNING is not incumbent upon an Am-Walid under Edit from the decease of her proprietor; nor upon a woman under Edit who has been contracted in an invalid marriage, because, with respect to such women, the blessings of marriage cannot be said to perish so as to afford a reason for the manifestation of grief; moreover, ornaments and the use of perfumes, and so forth, are in their original nature allowable; and where no special reason appears for the prohibition of them, they necessarily continue to be so.

Proposing for a woman during her Edit is disapproved.—It is not decent in any person publicly or expressly to solicit or seek connexion with a woman under Edit; but it matters not if this be done in an indirect and ambiguous manner: yet they should not pass any secret promise of marriage to each other, this being forbidden in the Koran.—The ambiguous mode of proposal above mentioned is described by Ebn Abbas to be, that the man in the woman's presence may declare his wish to marry, in general terms without any particular application.

Rules for the behaviour of women during Edit.—It is not lawful for a woman under divorce to go abroad, either in the night or day, whether the divorce be reversible or irreversible, because the word of God in the Koran forbids them from appearing abroad: but a widow is at liberty to go forth during the whole day, and for a short season of the night also; yet she must not pass the night anywhere but in her own apartments. The reason of this indulgence is that as a widow has no provision from her husband's property, it may be necessary that she should go forth to seek for a subsistence, and it may sometimes happen that she is detained abroad a considerable time, perhaps till after night-fall, whence the extension of the liberty to a part of the night; but it is otherwise with a woman under divorce, as she is entitled [during Edit] to a subsistence from the husband. Yet if a woman were to enter into an engagement of Khoola with her husband, making the consideration for Khoola to consist of her subsistence during her Edit, some say that she is at liberty to go during the day, while others maintain that she has no liberty of going forth whatever, as the loss of her subsistence is the consequence of her own voluntary act, wherefore the prohibition, which is right of the law, still continues in force.

It is incumbent upon a woman under Edit that she observe and accomplish the same in the place where she was resident at the period of divorce taking place, or of the husband's decease, whether that be her own accustomed dwelling, or a house where she may be upon a visit (that of her parents, for instance), because this is so ordered in the Koran; and it also appears in the traditional precepts of the prophet that he said to a woman whose husband was slain, "stay in your own house until your Edit be accomplished."

A widow may remove from her husband's house, if inconveniently situated there.—If the apartment allotted to a widow, in the house of her deceased husband, be not sufficiently spacious for her accommodation, and it should happen that the heirs of the defunct exclude her from the other parts of the house, it is then lawful for her to remove elsewhere, because she has here an excuse, and any good pretext suffices in all matters appertaining to the spiritual law, of which description is Edit; the case is therefore the same here as where the woman has reason to fear thieves in her own house, or where there is an apprehension of its falling, or where she holds it by hire, and is unable to pay the rent; all which circumstances are a sufficient cause of removal, as well as in the present case.

A wife under irreversible divorce must be accommodated with a separate apartment.—WHERE a husband and wife are separated by irreversible or triplicate divorce, it is requisite that there be a curtain or partition between them; and there is no objection to their continuing to reside in the same house, provided this be attended to, as the husband has himself declared her to be prohibited to him; but if he be a dissolute person, one who has no command of his passions, and of whom it may be apprehended that he will commit with her that which is unlawful, it is in this case expedient that she remove to another house (since there is evidently a sufficient excuse), and that she continue there until the accomplishment of her Edit;—it is better, however, that the dissolute husband leave her in his house, and remove to another himself.—It is laudable in the parties, whether the husband be dissolute or otherwise, to engage a female friend to reside in the house with them, who may be able to prevent any improper connexion.—If the dwelling-house be so small as not to admit of their residing in it under these precautions, it is then necessary that the wife remove elsewhere; but it is better that the husband remove, and leave her to reside in the house. All this proceeds upon a supposition of the husband's having no more than one house.

Rule respecting a wife divorced upon a journey.—If a woman accompany her husband upon a journey, or on a pilgrimage to Mecca, and he give her three divorces upon the way, or die, leaving her in an uninhabited place, she must return to her own city, provided the distance be within three days' journey, because this is not to be considered as going abroad, but rather as a consequence of her having before gone abroad; but if the distance exceed three days' journey, she is then at liberty either to return home, or to proceed upon the pilgrimage, whether her guardian be with her or not.—The compiler of this work observes that this is only where she is left within three days' journey from Mecca, where her stay would be more dangerous than her proceeding; but her return to her own city is preferable, in order that she may there accomplish her Edit in the house of her husband.—But if, in the case under consideration, the divorce or death occur in a city, or other inhabited place, the woman must not go forth from that place until her Edit be accomplished, after which she may leave it, provided she be accompanied by any male relation within the prohibited degrees.—What is here advanced is the doctrine of Haueefa.—The two disciples say that, if the woman be accompanied by a relation within the prohibited degrees, she may leave the place before her Edit be past; for they argue that she ought to be allowed to return home, in order that she may relieve herself from the disagreeable circumstances attending her residence in a strange place, and also from the derangement and trouble of a journey, because these are sufficient pretexts, and the impropriety of her travelling is removed by the circumstance of her relation accompanying her.—To this Haueefa replies that Edit affords a stronger reason against removal than even the want of a relation's protection, as a woman may lawfully go to any distance within a day's journey, without being accompanied by a relation, whereas this is not it is unlawful for a woman to go to any greater distance, unaccompanied by a relation, it is so for one under Edit, à fortiori.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF PARENTAGE.

A child born after six months from the date of a marriage upon which is suspended a conditional divorce, is the lawful offspring of such marriage.—If a man make a declaration, saying, "if I marry such a woman she is divorced," and he afterwards marry her, and she produce a child after six months from the day of the marriage,* the parentage of the child is established in him, and the dower is incumbent upon him; the former is established, because the wife is in this case considered as a partner of his bed at the period of conception, as having brought forth a child at the expiration of six complete months from the date of the marriage, a time considerably posterior to the divorce, since that takes place immediately after the marriage, wherefore the conception must be considered as having taken place prior to the divorce, that is, within the marriage.

OBJECTION.—It is not to be imagined that conception should take place at the time of marriage, as it is a consequence of the carnal act, which happens posterior to it; how, therefore, can it be established that the conception took place before divorce, since the latter occurs upon the instant of the marriage?

REPLY.—Conception may be imagined upon the instant of the marriage, as it is possible that the man may marry the woman whilst in the commission of the carnal act, and consequently, that marriage and conception may have taken place at the same instant: and as genealogy is a matter the establishment of which is of great moment, this supposition has therefore been adopted: and the dower is incumbent, because the descent of the child being established in him, he is virtually held to have cohabited with his wife; and it is due on account of consummation.

The parentage of a child born two years after reversible divorce is established in the divorcer.—If a man repudiate his wife by a divorce reversible, and she bring forth a child at the end of two years, or more, from the time of the divorce, the parentage of the child is established in him, and the divorce is reversed, provided she had not before declared the accomplishment of her Edit, because it is possible that her pregnancy may have taken place during Edit, as the Tohar (or term of purity) of some women

* This means any time between six months and two years from the date of the marriage, as the former of these is held to be the shortest, and the latter the longest possible is much longer than that of others, which circumstance may have protracted its continuance; but if she be delivered of a child within less than two years from the time of divorce, she becomes completely separated from her husband, on account of the completion of her Edit by delivery; and in this case also the parentage of the child is established in the husband, because it is as possible that the conception may have taken place previous to divorce (that is, within the marriage), as it is that it may have taken place after divorce (that is, within the Edit); but yet reversal is not established, because, as it is possible that conception took place after divorce, so it is also possible that it took place before divorce; wherefore reversal cannot be established, on account of the doubt which exists on this point; but where the woman is not delivered until after two years, reversal is established, as the conception is posterior to divorce, and must be attributed to the husband, since no charge of adultery has been advanced against the wife, wherefore it is evident that he has had connexion with her during Edit, a circumstance by which reversal is established.

And so also of a child born within two years after triplicate or irreversible divorce.

—If a man repudiate his wife either by three divorces, or by an irreversible divorce, and she be delivered of a child within less than two years from the period of the divorce, the parentage is established in him, as it is possible that the pregnancy may have existed at that time; and the right of cohabitation does not positively appear to have been dissolved previous to pregnancy, whence the parentage is established in this manner for the sake of caution.—But if the delivery were not to take place until after the expiration of two years from the period of separation, the parentage of the child is not established, as pregnancy in that case evidently appears to have taken place posterior to divorce, and consequently the child cannot be supposed to be begotten by the man in question, since to him carnal connexion with the woman is unlawful; yet if he claim the child as his own, the parentage is established in him, as he here takes it upon himself, and it may be accounted for by supposing him to have had connexion with the woman, erroneously, during her Edit.

And so likewise of a child born of a wife under age within nine months after either irreversible or reversible divorce. If a man repudiate, by an irreversible divorce, a wife who is under the age of puberty, but yet such an one as may admit of carnal connexion, and she bring forth a child after the expiration of nine months from the time of divorce, the parentage of the child is not established in him; but if the delivery be within less than nine months, it is established.—This is according to Hancefa and Mohammed.—Abou Yoosaf says that the parentage is established in the man, although the child should not be born within less than two years from the period of divorce, because she was under Edit, and it is possible that the pregnancy may have existed at the time of the divorce, and she not have declared the accomplishment of her Edit, wherefore this infant wife is the same as a full-grown woman.—The argument of Hancefa and Mohammed is that the Edit of the wife is in this case appointed to be counted by months, wherefore it is accomplished at the expiration of three months, by the rule of the law, independent of any declaration on her part,—if, therefore, she be delivered of a child within less than six months from the end of that term which completes her Edit, the parentage of the child is established; but, if she bring not forth until after that time, the parentage is not established, as it appears to have been begotten at the time when she was not a partner of the husband's bed, for the case treats of a girl irreversibly divorced under puberty, and consequently not subject to the menstrual discharge, and whose Edit is therefore completed by the lapse of time, namely, three months, wherefore it is not possible that pregnancy should have existed at the time of divorce; and the right of cohabitation appears to have undoubtedly expired before pregnancy, so that the descent cannot be established. And if the wife under these circumstances be repudiated by a reversible divorce, the rule is the same (with Hancefa and Mohammed) as before recited. Abou Yoosaf says that the parentage of the child is established in the husband if it be born within twenty-seven months from the time of divorce, as it must be allowed that he may have had connexion with her at the latter end of the term of three months, which constitutes her Edit, and she be delivered within the longest term of pregnancy admitted by the law, namely two years. But if the infant wife declare her pregnancy to have taken place during Edit, the rule is then the same as with respect to grown women; that is to say, the parentage of the child is established in the husband, as her puberty is proved by her own affirmation.

The parentage of a child born of a widow within two years after the decease of her husband is established in him.—If a widow bring forth a child, the parentage is established in her husband, provided the delivery happen within two years from the time of his decease.—Ziffer says that if she be not delivered until after six months from the time of the completion of the Edit of widowhood, in this case the parentage cannot be established, because her Edit, upon the lapse of four months and ten days, is completed by the ordinance of the law, as the Edit is, by the law, fixed to that time, and is therefore the same as if she were to declare the accomplishment of her Edit, as in the case of the infant before mentioned.—Our doctors, on the other hand, say that the Edit of the woman in question is not absolutely fixed at four months and ten days, but has also another mode of completion, namely, delivery, since marriage with an adult woman is considered as a cause of pregnancy: contrary to the case of a girl under puberty, because the natural state of such an one is an incapacity to bear children, as an infant is not a subject of impregnation until she attain maturity, and concerning the maturity of the infant there is a doubt.

And so also of a child born within six months after the wife declaring her Edit to have expired.—If a woman under Edit declare the same to be accomplished, and be afterwards delivered of a child within less than six months from the time of her declaration, the parentage of the child is established, as it is evident that her declaration was unfounded, and is consequently null: but if she be delivered after six months from the time of her declaration, the parentage is not established, because nothing appears in this case to annul her declaration, as it is possible that her pregnancy may have occurred after that.

Whatever be the occasion of the Edit.—This reasoning applies to every woman under Edit, whatever the occasion may be, whether divorce reversible or irreversible, or the decease of her husband; or of whatever description or nature, whether it be counted by months, or by the returns of the courses.

The birth must be proved by evidence.—When a woman under Edit is delivered of a child, the parentage is not established, (according to Haneefa), unless the birth be proved by the evidence of two male witnesses, or of one male and two female.—This is where there is no apparent pregnancy, or where the same is not acknowledged by the husband: but if the pregnancy be apparent, or the husband have acknowledged it, the parentage is established independent of the testimony of witnesses. The two disciples maintain that, in all cases, the parentage is established upon the testimony of one woman,—because the habitation still continues during Edit, and it is this right which occasions the fixing of the parentage of a child upon the husband, wherefore nothing more is required than that some person prove the birth, and the identity, by testifying “This is the child of which such a woman was delivered.”—and thus much may be sufficiently proved by the testimony of a single woman, in the same manner as it is during marriage, in a case where the husband disputes the child’s identity. Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that the Edit is accomplished by the woman’s declaration of delivery; but the mere completion of Edit is not proof, and the descent still remains to be first established, for which reason it is that complete proof (that is, the testimony of two men, or of one man and two women) is made a condition: but it would be otherwise if the pregnancy were apparent, or acknowledged by the husband, as in this case the parentage is established prior to the birth; and the child’s identity is there ascertained by the identity of one woman,—the midwife, for instance.

The parentage of a child born of a widow, when uncontroverted, is established in her deceased husband, independent of evidence.—

If a woman under Edit from the death of her husband bring forth a child, and declare it to be his, and the heirs confirm her assertion, though no person bear evidence to the birth, the child is held to be descended of the husband, according to all our doctors.* This, with respect to inheritance, is evident, as inheritance is a sole right of the heirs, and consequently their testimony or acknowledgment is to be credited in every matter which affects it.—A question, however, may arise in this case whether the parentage of the child be by such testimony established with respect to others than those heirs: and upon this the learned in the law observe, that if those heirs be persons of a description capable of being admitted as witnesses, the parentage is established with respect to all others as well as themselves, because their testimony amounts to proof, for which reason some doctors require that their confirmation of the woman’s assertion be delivered in the form of evidence: but the necessity of this is denied by others, because the establishment of parentage, with respect to the rest of mankind, is a necessary consequence of its establishment with respect to the immediate heirs of the deceased by their confirmation; and where a matter is once fully established upon any particular ground, no necessity exists for any further conditions with respect to its establishment.

A child born within less than six months after marriage is not the offspring of that marriage; but if after six months it is so, independent of the husband’s acknowledgment; or upon the evidence of one witness to the birth where he denies it; and Taam incumbent, if he persist in his denial; and the wife’s testimony is to be credited in all to the date of the marriage.—If a man marry a woman, and she bring forth a child within less than six months after the marriage, the parentage of the child is not established in the husband, as pregnancy in that case appears to have existed previous to the marriage, and consequently cannot be derived from him; but if she be delivered after six months, it is established, whether he acknowledge it or not, because then the marriage appears to have existed at the time of impregnation, and the term of pregnancy is complete. If, moreover, the husband deny the birth, it may be proved by the evidence of one woman, after which the parentage is established in virtue of the marriage; and such being the case, if he persist in denying the child, impregnation becomes incumbent, because his denial then amounts to an imputation on his wife’s chastity, since it implies a charge of adultery against her. And if, upon the birth of a child, a dispute were to arise between the husband and wife, he asserting that he had married her only four months before, and she maintaining that they had been married six months, the declaration of the wife is to be credited, and the child belongs to the husband, because apparent circumstances testify for the wife, as it appears that her pregnancy has been a consequence of marriage and not of whoredom.—A question has arisen among our doctors whether the woman's assertion is to be credited without being confirmed by oath? The two disciples hold that it requires her oath; but Haneefa maintains the contrary opinion.

Divorce suspended upon the birth of a child cannot take place on the evidence of one woman to the birth.—If a man suspend divorce upon the circumstance of his wife's bearing a child, by saying to her, "upon being delivered of this child you are divorced,"—and a woman afterwards give testimony to her being delivered, yet divorce does not take place, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that divorce takes place, because the evidence of a single woman suffices in all such matters as are improper to be beheld by men; and the evidence of one woman to a birth being admitted, it is also to be admitted with respect to whatever proceeds from the birth, which in the present instance is divorce.—The argument of Haneefa is that the woman, in this case, stands as a plaintiff for penalty against her husband, and he appears as the defendant, wherefore her claim cannot be established but by complete proof.—The foundation of this is that the evidence of a woman is admitted with respect to child-birth from necessity only, and has therefore no effect with respect to divorce, since that is a matter altogether distinct from child-birth, and unconnected with it, although such connexion appear to exist from the peculiar circumstances of the present case.—But if the husband acknowledge the pregnancy, divorce takes place upon the woman independent of the evidence of others, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples hold that in this case also the testimony of the midwife is necessary, because proof is indispensable to the establishment of a Dawee Huns, or claim of penalty, and the evidence of the midwife amounts to proof, according to what was before said.—The arguments of Haneefa are twofold;—FIRST, the acknowledgment of pregnancy amounts to an acknowledgment of that which pregnancy induces, and extends thereto, and that thing is child-birth; SECONDLY, the husband, in acknowledging the pregnancy, declares his wife a trustee, as the child is a deposit in her possession, and consequently her word is to be credited in the surrender of the deposit, as much as that of any other trustee.

The term of pregnancy is from six months to two years.—THE longest term of pregnancy is two years, because of the declaration of Aysa, "the child does not remain in the mother's womb beyond two years:" and the shortest term is six months, because the sacred text says, "THE WHOLE TERM OF PREGNANCY AND WEANING IS THIRTY MONTHS;" and Ibn Abbas has said that the term of suckling is two years, wherefore six months remain for the pregnancy.—Shafei has said that the longest term of pregnancy extends to four years; but the text here quoted, and the opinion of Ibn Abbas as above, testify against him.—It is probable that Shafei may have delivered this opinion upon hearsay, as this is a matter which does not admit of reasoning.

Case of a man divorcing a wife who is a slave, and then purchasing her.—If a man marry a female slave, and afterwards divorce her, and then purchase her, and she be delivered of a child within less than six months from the day of purchase, the parentage is established in him; but if she be delivered after six months, the parentage is not established; because, in the first instance, the child is considered as born of a woman under Edit, conception appearing to have taken place before purchase; but, in the second instance, it is regarded as slave-born, as the length of the term of pregnancy here admits of conception being referred to a time subsequent to purchase; and the child thus appearing to be born (not of a wife, but) of a slave, his acknowledgment is requisite to the establishment of its parentage.—What is now advanced proceeds upon the supposition of the slave being repudiated by a single divorce, reversible or irreversible, or by Khoola: but if she be repudiated by two divorces, the parentage of the child is established, if it be born within two years from the date of the divorce, because in this case she is rendered unlawful to her husband by the rigorous prohibition, whence the pregnancy can be referred only to a time previous to divorce, since, under such a circumstance, she is not rendered lawful to the man by his subsequent purchase of her.

Miscellaneous cases.—If a man say to his female slave, "if there be a child in your womb it is mine," upon a woman afterwards bearing testimony to the birth, the slave becomes Am-Walid to that man, because here all that is requisite is to prove the child's identity, by showing that "such a woman has been delivered of such a child,"—and this is sufficiently ascertained by the testimony of the midwife, according to all our doctors.

If a man say of a boy, "this is my son," and afterwards die, and the mother come declaring herself to be the wife of the deceased, she must be considered as such, and the boy as his child, and they both inherit of him. It is recorded in the Nawadir that this rule proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law, for analogy requires that the woman should not inherit, since descent is established not only in virtue of a valid marriage, but also of an invalid marriage, or of erroneous carnal connexion, or of possession by right of property, and therefore the man's declaration that "this is his son" does not amount to an acknowledgment of his having married the mother: but the reason for a more favourable construction of the law here is, that the case supposes the woman to be one whose freedom and maternal right in the child are matters of public notoriety, and the validity of a marriage is ascertained by circumstances. But if the woman be not known to be free, and the heirs of the husband maintain that she is only an Am-Walid, she is not entitled to any inheritance, because the mere appearance of freedom (supposing this case to occur in a Mussulman territory), although it defend the party from slavery, is not sufficient to establish a claim of inheritance.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF HIZANIT, OR THE CARE OF INFANT CHILDREN.

In case of separation, the care of the infant child belongs to the wife.—If a separation take place between a husband and wife, who are possessed of an infant child, the right of nursing and keeping it rests with the mother, because it is recorded that a woman once applied to the prophet, saying, "O, prophet of God! this is my son, the fruit of my womb, cherished in my bosom and suckled at my breast, and his father is desirous of taking him away from me into his own care;"—to which the prophet replied, "thou hast a right in the child prior to that of thy husband, so long as thou dost not marry with a stranger"—moreover, a mother is naturally not only more tender, but also better qualified to cherish a child during infancy, so that committing the care to her is of advantage to the child: and Siddeck alluded to this, when he addressed Omar on a similar occasion, saying, "the spittle of the mother is better for thy child than honey, O OMAR!" which was said at a time when separation had taken place between Omar and his wife, the mother of Assim, the latter being then an infant at the breast, and Omar desirous of taking him from the mother; and these words were spoken in the presence of many of the companions, none of whom contradicted him:—but the Nifka or subsistence of the child is incumbent upon the father, as shall be hereafter explained. It is to be observed, however, that if the mother refuse to keep the child, there is no constraint upon her, as a variety of causes may operate to render her incapable of the charge.

Order of precedence in Hizanit, after the mother.—If the mother of an infant die, the right of Hizanit (or infant education) rests with the maternal grandmother, in preference to the paternal, because it originates in, and is derived from, the mother; but if she be not living, the paternal grandmother has then a right prior to any other relation, she being as one of the child's mothers (whence it is that she is entitled to a sixth of the effects of a child of her son, which is the mother's share *); and she must, moreover, be considered as having a more tender interest in her own offspring than any collateral relation. If there be no grandmother living, in this case a sister is preferable to either a maternal or paternal aunt, as she is the daughter of the father and mother, or of one of them, whence it is that she would take place of the aunts in inheritance—(according to one tradition, the maternal aunt is preferable to a half-sister by the father's side, the prophet having said, "the maternal aunt is as a mother").—A full sister, also, has preference to an half-sister, maternal or paternal; and a maternal sister to a paternal sister; because the right of Hizanit is derived to them through the mother. The maternal aunt has preference to the paternal, because precedence is given, in this point, to the maternal relation. The same distinction also prevails among the aunts as among the sisters;—that is, she who is doubly related has a preference to her who is singly related; thus the maternal aunt, who is full sister to the mother, precedes an half-sister, maternal or paternal; and, in the same manner, a maternal sister precedes a paternal sister; and so also of the paternal aunts. If, however, any of these women, having the right of Hizanit, should marry a stranger, her right is thereby annulled, on account of the tradition before quoted, and also because, where the husband is a stranger, it is to be apprehended that he may treat the child unkindly; where the woman, therefore, who has charge of an infant marries, it is neither advantageous nor advisable that the infant remain with her, unless the person she marries be a relation,—as where the mother, for instance, having charge, marries the child's paternal uncle, or the maternal grandmother marries the paternal grandfather,—because these men, being as parents, it is to be expected that they will behave with tenderness:—and so also of any other relation within the prohibited degrees, for the same reason.

ANY woman whose right of Hizanit is annulled by her marrying a stranger recovers the right by the dissolution of the marriage, the objection to her exercise of it being thereby removed.

In defect of the maternal, it rests with the nearest paternal relation.—If there be no woman to whom the right of Hizanit appertains, and the men of the family dispute it, in this case the nearest paternal relation has the preference, he being the one to whom the authority of guardian belongs (the de-gresses of paternal relationship are treated of in their proper place): but it is to be observed that the child must not be entrusted to any relation beyond the prohibited degrees, such as the Mawla or emancipator of a slave, or the son of the paternal uncle, as in this there may be apprehension of treachery.

Length of the term of Hizanit.—The right of Hizanit, with respect to a male child, appertains to the mother, grandmother, or so forth, until he become independent of it himself; that is to say, become capable of shifting, eating, drinking, and performing the other natural functions without assistance; after which the charge devolves upon the father, or next paternal relation entitled to the office of guardian, because, when thus far advanced, it then becomes necessary to attend to his education in all branches of useful and ornamental science, and to initiate him into a knowledge of men and manners, to effect which the father or paternal relations are best qualified—(Kasaf says that the Hizanit, with respect to a boy, ceases at the end of seven years, as in general a child at that age is capable of performing all the necessary offices for himself, without assistance).—But the right of Hizanit with respect to a girl appertains to the mother, grandmother, and so forth, until the first appearance of the menstrual discharge (that is to say, until she attain the age of puberty), because a girl has occasion to learn such manners and accomplishments as are proper to women, to the teaching of which the female relations are most competent; but after that period the charge of her properly belongs to the father, because a girl, after maturity, requires some person to superintend her conduct, and to this the father is most completely qualified. It is recorded from Mohammed that the care of a female child devolves upon the father as soon as she begins to feel the carnal appetite,* as she then requires a superintendence over her conduct, and it is universally admitted that the right of Hizanit of girls is restricted to that period, with respect to all the female relations except the mother and grandmother. It is written in the Jama Sagheer, that the right of Hizanit, with any except the mother or grandmother, discontinues upon the girl becoming capable of performing the natural offices without assistance, because no other is entitled to require any service of her (whence it is that they cannot hire her as a servant to others), and such being the case the end (namely, the girl's education) cannot be obtained: but it is otherwise with the mother or grandmother, as they are invested with a legal right to require her services.

A slave has the right upon obtaining her freedom.—If a man contract his female slave or Am-Walid, in marriage to any person, and she bear a child to her husband, and the master afterwards emancipate her, she then becomes (with respect to the child) as a free woman; that is, upon becoming free she obtains her right of Hizanit which had not existed while she was a slave, because her service, as a slave, would necessarily interfere with the proper discharge of the duties of Hizanit.

And also an infidel mother the wife of a Mussulman.—A ZIMMEEA, or female infidel subject, married to a Mussulman, is entitled to the Hizanit of her child, although he be a Mussulman like the father; but this only so long as the child is incapable of forming any judgment with respect to religion, and whilst there is no apprehension of his imbibing an attachment to infidelity; but when this is the case, he must be taken from the mother, because, although it be for the child's advantage to be under her care until that period, his remaining longer with her might prove injurious.

Children, after the term of Hizanit, remain solely under the care of the father.—A boy or girl, having passed the period of Hizanit, have no option to be with one parent in preference to the other, but must necessarily thenceforth remain in charge of the father. Shafi maintains that they have an option to remain with either parent, because of a tradition of the prophet to this effect. The argument of our doctors is, that young persons, from want of judgment, will naturally wish to stay with the parent who treats them with most indulgence, and lays them under least restraint, wherefore giving them a choice in this matter would not be tenderness, but rather the reverse, as being contrary to their true interest; and it appears in the Naki Saheeh that the companions withheld this option from children. With respect to the tradition cited by Shafi, it may be observed that, in the instance there alluded to, where the prophet gave a boy his choice, he first prayed to God to direct him therein, and the boy then chose, under the influence of the prophet's prayer.

Section.

A mother cannot remove with her child to a strange place.—If a divorced woman be desirous of removing with her child out of a city, she is not at liberty to do it; but yet if she remove with her child out of a city, and go to her native place, where the contract of her marriage was executed, in this case her removal is lawful, because the father is considered as having also undertaken to reside in that place, both in the eye of the law, and according to common usage, for the prophet has said, "Whoever marries a woman of any city is thereby rendered a DENIZEN of that city;" and hence it is, that if an alien woman were to come into the Mussulman territory, and there to marry an infidel subject, she also becomes an infidel subject; it is to be observed, however, that this rule does not apply to an alien man, that is to say, if an alien man were to come into the Mussulman territory, and there to marry a female subject, he is not thereby rendered a subject; for if he choose, he may divorce this wife and return to his own country.

If a divorced woman be desirous of removing with her child to a place which is not the place of her nativity, but in which her marriage contract was executed, she is not at liberty to do it. This is demonstrated by Kadoorce in his compendium, and also accords with what is related in the Mabsoot. The Jama Sagheer says that she may take her child thither, because where a marriage contract is executed in any place, it occasions all the ordinances thereof to exist and have force in that place, in the same manner as sale amounts to a delivery of the article sold in the place of sale; and a woman's right to the care of her children is one of the ordinances of marriage, wherefore she is entitled to keep her child in the place where she was married, although she be not a native of that place. The principle upon which the Mabsoot proceeds in this case is, that the execution of a contract of marriage in a place merely of casual residence (such as the station of a journey, does not constitute it a home, according to general usage, and this is the better opinion. In short, to the propriety of the woman carrying her child from one place to another, two points are essentially requisite, one, that she be a native of the place to which she goes; and the other, that her marriage contract has been there executed; this, however, means only where the places are considerably distant; but if they be so near that the father may go to see his child and return the same night, there is no objection to the wife going to the other place with the child, and there remaining; and this, whatever be the size or degree of the places, whether cities or villages; nor is there any objection to her removing from the village to the city or chief town of a district, as this is in no respect injurious to the father, and is advantageous to the child, since he will thereby become known and acquainted with the people of the place, but the reverse [that is, her removal from the city to a village], would be injurious to the child, as he would thereby be liable to acquire the low manners and mean sentiments of villagers; wherefore a woman is not at liberty to carry her child from a city to a village.

CHAPTER XV.

OF NIFKA, OR MAINTENANCE.

Definition of the term.—NIFKA, in the language of the law, signifies all those things which are necessary to the support of life, such as food, cloths, and lodging: many confine it solely to food.

Section I.

Of the Nifka, of the Wife.

The subsistence of a wife is incumbent upon her husband.—WHEN a woman surrenders herself into the custody of her husband, it is incumbent upon him thenceforth to supply her with food, clothing, and lodging, whether she be a Mussulman or an infidel, because such is the precept both in the Koran and in the traditions; and also, because maintenance is a recompense for the matrimonial restraint; whence it is that where a person is in custody of another on account of any demand, or so forth, his subsistence is incumbent upon that other,—as when a public magistrate, for instance, is imprisoned on account of any mal-administration in his office, in which case his subsistence must be provided from the public treasury; and as the authorities upon which this proceeds make no distinctions between a Mussulman and an infidel, the rule holds the same with respect to either in the present case.

In proportion to the rank and circumstances of the parties.—IN adjusting the obligation of the Nifka, or maintenance of a wife, regard is to be had to the rank and condition both of her and her husband: thus if the parties be both wealthy, he must support her in an opulent manner; if they be both poor, he is required only to provide for her accordingly; and if he be rich, and she poor, he is to afford her a moderate subsistence, such as is below the former and above the latter.—The compiler of this work says that this is the opinion adopted by Khasaf; and that decrees pass accordingly. Koorokhee is of opinion that the rank and condition of the husband alone is to be regarded (and such also is the doctrine of Shafei), because the sacred text says, “LET HIM SUPPORT HER ACCORDING TO HIS ABILITY.”—The ground of Khasaf's opinion is a tradition respecting the prophet, who, on a woman applying to him for his judgment upon this point, said to her, “take from the property of your husband whatever may suffice for the subsistence of yourself and your child in the customary way;” from which it appears that the circumstances of the woman are to be regarded as well as those of the man, for maintenance is incumbent only so far as may suffice for the purpose intended by it, and as a woman in mean circumstances has no occasion for the same subsistence as one who is accustomed to live in affluence, such is (with respect to her) unnecessary; and as to the text above quoted by Shafei, it means no more than that if the woman be in affluent circumstances, and her husband otherwise, he shall support her according to his ability, and the remainder, or difference, shall be a debt upon him. By the expression “customary way,” in the tradition quoted by Shafei, is to be understood a middling or moderate way, that is, a medium between the circumstances of the wife, and those of the husband where the former happens to be rich and the latter poor; and as the prophet in his decision left this to the judgment of the parties themselves, the proportion is not specifically determined by the law.—Shafei has so determined it, saying that the Nifka or maintenance incumbent upon a husband in behalf of his wife, if he be opulent, is two Mids, or about one thousand Dirms* annually,—if he be poor, one Mid: and if in middling circumstances, one and a half: this, however, is not admitted, because a thing declared to be incumbent “so far as may suffice” cannot be legally fixed at any specific rate, as the proportion must necessarily vary according to circumstances.

And this, although she withhold herself on account of her dower.—If a woman refuse to surrender herself to her husband, on account of her dower (that is, on account of its not having been paid to her), her maintenance does not drop, but is incumbent upon the husband, although she be not yet within his custody, since her refusal is only in pursuance of her right, and consequently the objection to the matrimonial custody originates with the husband.

But not if she be refractory.—If a wife be disobedient or refractory, and go abroad without her husband's consent, she is not entitled to any support from him, until she return and make submission, because the rejection of the matrimonial restraint in this instance originates with her; but when she returns home, she is then subject to it, for which reason she again becomes entitled to her support as before. It is otherwise where a woman, residing in the house of her husband, refuses to admit him to the conjugal embrace, as she is entitled to maintenance, notwithstanding her opposition, because being then in his power, he may, if he please, enjoy her by force.

Or an infant incapable of generation.—If a wife be so young as to be incapable of generation, her maintenance is not incumbent upon him, because although she should be within his custody, yet as an obstacle exists in her to the carnal embrace, this is not the custody which entitles to maintenance, that being described “custody for the purpose of enjoyment,” which does not apply to the case of one incapable of the act:—contrary to the case of the sick woman to whom maintenance is due, although she be incapable, as shall be hereafter demonstrated.—Shafei says that maintenance is due to an infant wife, because he holds it to be: return for the matrimonial propriety, in the same manner as it is with respect to a slave for the propriety in his personal service. To this, however, our doctors reply that the dower is the return for the matrimonial propriety, and one thing does not legally admit of two returns; wherefore, in the case of an infant wife, the dower is due but not maintenance.

But it is due to an adult wife from an infant incapable of generation.—But if the husband be an infant incapable of generation, and the wife an adult, she is entitled to her maintenance at his expense, because in this case delivery of the person has been performed on her part, and the obstacle to the matrimonial enjoyment exists on the part of the husband.

It is not due where the wife is imprisoned for debt.—If a woman be imprisoned for debt, her husband is not required to support her, because the objection to the matrimonial custody does not in this case originate with him, whether her imprisonment be owing to herself (as in a case of wilful delay and contumacy) or otherwise (as where she is poor and unable to discharge the debt).

Or forcibly carried off.—AND, in the same manner, if a woman be forcibly seized and carried off by any person, she has no claim to maintenance from her husband; and so also, if a woman go upon a pilgrimage, under colour of a relation within the prohibited degrees,—because she is not then in custody of her husband, and her not being so is occasioned by her own voluntary act.

Or goes upon a pilgrimage.—It is recorded on Abou Yousaf that a woman upon a pilgrimage is entitled to a maintenance from her husband, as her undertaking the indispensable pilgrimage* is a sufficient pretext for her leaving him; but he allows her only a Nifka-Hizr, or support as in a settled place; and not a Nifka-Sifr, or support as upon a journey; as the former only is incumbent upon the husband, not the latter.

Unless she be accompanied by the husband.—But if the husband accompany his wife upon her pilgrimage, her maintenance is then incumbent upon him according to all our doctors, because in this case she continues in his custody; but she is entitled to a Nifka-Hizr only, not to a Nifka-Sifr, as he is not the occasion of her travelling, whence it is that he is not obliged to furnish her with a conveyance.

It continues during her sickness.—If a woman fall sick in her husband's house, she is still entitled to a maintenance. This is upon a principle of benevolence, as analogy would suggest that she is not entitled to maintenance where she falls sick so far as to be incapable of admitting her husband to the conjugal embrace, since in this case she cannot be deemed in custody for the purpose of enjoyment; but the reason for a more favourable construction of the law in this case is, that she still remains in custody, as her husband may associate and indulge in dalliance with her, and she may continue to superintend his domestic concerns, and the obstacle to carnal enjoyment is (like the menstrual discharge) an accidental occurrence.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that if a woman deliver herself into the custody of her husband, and then fall sick, she is still entitled to maintenance; but if she fall sick first, and then deliver herself to him, she has no claim to maintenance until her recovery, as the surrender of her person is not in this case complete; and the learned in the law admit this to be a proper distinction.

A husband must maintain his wife's servants.—THE maintenance of the wife's servants is incumbent upon her husband, as well as that of the wife herself, provided he be in opulent circumstances, because he is obliged to provide his wife's maintenance, "so far as may suffice" (as aforesaid), and it is not sufficient, unless her servants also be supported, they being essential to her ease and comfort; but it is not absolutely incumbent upon him to provide a maintenance for more than one servant, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf says he must provide maintenance for two servants, as one is required for service within the house, and the other out of doors.—The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed on this point are twofold:—FIRST, one servant may answer both purposes, whence two are unnecessary; SECONDLY, if the husband were himself to undertake all the services required by the wife, it would suffice, and a servant would be unnecessary; and, in the same manner, it suffices if he constitute any single servant his substitute therein; wherefore a second servant is not requisite. The learned in the law say that the rate of maintenance due from an opulent husband to his wife's servants is the same as that due from a poor husband to his wife,—namely, the lowest that can be admitted as sufficient.—Haneefa says that a husband who is poor is not required to find maintenance for his wife's servants: and this is an approved doctrine, as it is to be supposed that the wife of a poor man will serve herself. Mohammed holds that it is due from a poor husband, in the same manner as from one more opulent.

If the husband be poor, the magistrate empower the wife to raise subsistence upon his credit.—If a husband become poor, to such a degree as to be unable to provide his wife her maintenance, still they are not to be separated on this account, but the Kazee shall direct the woman to procure necessities for herself upon her husband's credit, the amount remaining a debt upon him.—Shafei says that they must be separated, because whenever the husband becomes incapable of providing his wife's maintenance, he cannot "retain her with humanity" (as is required in the sacred writings), and such being the case, it behoves him to divorce her; and if he decline so to do, the Kazee is then to effect the separation "as his substitute, in the same manner as in cases of emasculation or impotence: nay, the necessity for this is more urgent in the present instance than in either of those

as the maintenance is indispensable. *To this our doctors reply that if a separation take place the right of the husband is destroyed in toto, which is a grievous injury to him; whereas, if the wife be desired to procure maintenance for herself upon his credit, his right is by this means preserved with the smallest possible injury; wherefore they are not to be separated, but the wife shall be directed to take up the articles necessary for her subsistence upon his credit, as was already stated:—but the wife is in this case restricted in her expences to a rate which must be determined by the Kazee.

At a certain specified rate.—THE Kazee cannot act as the substitute of the husband in effecting a separation here, as in cases of emasculation or impotence, because property in marriage is only a dependant, or secondary consideration, the primary object being procreation, and that which is a dependant merely cannot be put in competition with the original intent, upon which principle it is that the Kazee is empowered to effect a separation in either of the other two instances, as there the original intent is defeated; but it is not so in the present case. The advantage of the Kazee desiring the woman to procure a maintenance upon her husband's credit, and of his fixing the rate thereof, is that she is thereby enabled to make her husband responsible for the amount; for if she contract any debt without this authority, the creditor's claim lies against her, and not against her husband.

To be varied according to any change in his circumstances.—If the husband were in indigent circumstances at the time of the Kazee authorizing the wife as aforesaid, and he have consequently determined her maintenance at the rate of poverty, and the husband afterwards become rich, and she sue for a proportionable addition to her maintenance, a decree must be given in her favour, as the rate of the maintenance differs according to the poverty or opulence of the husband.

Arrears of maintenance not due unless the maintenance have been decreed by the Kazee or the rate of it previously determined on between the parties.—If a length of time should elapse during which the wife has not received any maintenance from her husband, she is not entitled to demand any for that time, except when the Kazee had before determined and decreed it to her, or where she had entered into a composition with the husband respecting it, in either of which cases she is to be decreed her maintenance for the time past, because maintenance is an obligation in the manner of a gratuity,* as by a gratuity is understood a thing due without a return, and maintenance is of this description, it not being held (according to our doctors) to be as a return for the matrimonial propriety; and the obligation of it is not valid but through a decree of the Kazee, like a gift, which does not convey a right to possession but through seisin, which establishes possession: but a composition is of equal effect with a decree of the Kazee, in the present case, as the husband, by such composition, makes himself responsible, and his power over his own person is superior to that of the magistrate.—This reasoning does not apply to the case of dower, as that is considered to be a return for the use of the wife's person.

Arrears of a decreed maintenance drop in case of the death of either party.—If the Kazee decree a wife her maintenance, and a length of time elapse without her receiving any, and the husband should die, her maintenance drops; and the rule is the same if she should die: because maintenance is a gratuity, respecting which the rule is that it drops in consequence of death, like a gift, which is annulled by the decease of either the donor or donee before seisin being made by the latter.—Shafei says that the maintenance is in all circumstances to be considered as a debt upon the husband, in conformity with his tenet, that it is not a gratuity but a return, wherefore it cannot drop like demands of the former description.—This was before replied to.

Advances of maintenance cannot be reclaimed.—If a man give his wife one year's maintenance in advance, and then die before the expiration of the year, no claim lies against the woman for restitution of any part of it.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf.—Mohammed says that she is entitled only to the proportion due for the term past, from the beginning of the year till the husband's decease, the remainder being the right of his heirs; if, therefore, the difference remain with her in substance, she must restore it; or, if it do not remain, she is responsible for the value (and this also is the doctrine of Shafei, and the same difference of opinion obtains in respect to clothes and apparel). Because the wife in this case has received in advance the return for the matrimonial confinement, to which she has a claim, in virtue of such confinement, but her claim is annulled by the husband's decease, since she no longer remains confined, and consequently the return is annulled in proportion to the annulment of her claim, in the same manner as the stipend of a Kazee.—The argument of the two Elders is that the maintenance is a gratuity, of which the claimant has already taken possession; and restitution of a gratuity cannot be demanded after death, the virtue of it being completed by that event, as in a case of gift; whence it is that if the maintenance were to perish in the woman's possession, without her consuming it, no part of it can be demanded of her, according to all the doctors, whereas, if it were a return, it might be demanded in a case of destruction, as well as in one of consumption, nor would there be any difference between the two.—It is recorded from Mohammed that if the proportion advanced do not exceed that of one month, no restitution is required, as this proportion is inconsiderable, and stands as an allowance for present use.

A slave may be sold for the maintenance of his wife, if the latter be free.—If a slave marry a free woman, her maintenance is a debt upon him, for the discharge of which he may be sold; but this is only provided the marriage was with his owner's consent, as her maintenance being due from the slave, the obligation to it must ultimately affect his owner; the debt is therefore charged to the slave, in the same manner as one contracted in trade by a Mazoon, or privileged slave; but his owner is at liberty to redeem him by discharging the debt, because the woman's right extends to her maintenance only, not to the slave's person: and if the slave die, her right to any arrear of maintenance drops (and so also where he is killed), since it is a gratuity, as was already stated.

A husband must maintain his wife, being a slave, where she resides with him.—If a man marry the female slave of another, and her owner give her permission to reside in her husband's house, her maintenance is incumbent upon the husband, because she is then within his custody: but if she have not permission to reside with her husband, he is not responsible for her maintenance, as in this case her custody is not established.—The term here applied to the permission granted by the master [tabowecat] means not only liberty to reside in the husband's habitation, but also an exemption from all service: wherefore, if any service be afterwards required of her, the maintenance from the husband drops, as custody, which is the ground of her right to maintenance from him, necessarily ceases on such an occasion.—It is lawful for the master to require the service of his female slave, although he have granted her leave to reside with her husband, because such leave is not binding upon him, as is demonstrated in its proper place.—But it is to be observed that if the female slave voluntarily perform her master's service, without his calling upon her, her right to maintenance from her husband does not drop.

And the same of Am-Walids.—THESE rules apply equally to Am-Walids as to absolute slaves.

Section II.

A wife must be accommodated with a separate apartment.—It is incumbent upon a husband to provide a separate apartment for his wife's habitation, to be solely and exclusively appropriated to her use, so as that none of the husband's family, or others, may enter without her permission and desire, because this is essentially necessary to her, and is therefore her due the same as maintenance, for the word of God appoints her a dwelling-house as well as a subsistence: and as it is incumbent upon a husband to provide a habitation for his wife, so he is not at liberty to admit any person to a share in it, as this would be injurious to her, by endangering her property, and obstructing her enjoyment of his society; but if she desire it, the husband may then lawfully admit a partner in the habitation, as she by such a request voluntarily relinquishes her right: neither is the husband at liberty to intrude upon his wife his child by another woman, for the same reason.

If the husband appoint his wife an apartment within his own house, giving her the lock and key, it is sufficient, as the end is by this means fully obtained.

But under the control of her husband, with respect to visitors, &c.—A HUSBAND is at liberty to prevent his wife's parents, or other relations, or her children by a former marriage, from coming in * to her, as her apartment or habitation is his property, which he may lawfully prevent any person from entering; but he cannot prohibit them from seeing and conversing with her whenever they please, for if he were to do so, it would induce Katta Rihm, or a breach of the ties of kindred, and their seeing or conversing with her is in no respect injurious to him. Some have said that he cannot prohibit them from coming in to her, any more than from conversing with or seeing her, but he may prevent them from residing with her, as this might cause disturbance and inconvenience. Others have said that he cannot prohibit his wife from going to visit her parents, nor prevent the parents from visiting her every Friday; neither can he forbid her other relations from visiting her once a year; and this is approved.

Maintenance to the wife of an absentee is decreed out of his substance.—If a woman's husband absent himself, leaving effects in the hands of any person, and that person acknowledge the deposit, and admit the woman to be the wife of the absentee, the Kazeemust decree a maintenance to her out of the said effects; and the same to the infant children of the absentee, and also to his parents. And the rule is the same if the Kazeem himself be acquainted with the above two circumstances, where the trustee denies both or either of them.—The argument upon which this proceeds is that where the above person acknowledges the woman to be the wife of the absentee, and also, that he has property of the latter in his hands, such acknowledgment amounts to an avowal of her being entitled to receive her right out of the said property, without the husband's consent, as a woman is authorized to it by law.

* Although, by the customs of the east, men are not permitted to enter into the women's apartments without especial permission, yet it is not uncommon to converse with a woman through a curtain, or (as some part of this passage seems to imply) through a grate.

OBJECTION.—If a woman be decreed her maintenance out of the effects of her absent husband, in consequence of the trustee's acknowledgment, this admits the judgment of a magistrate against an absentee, which is illegal.

REPLY.—The order of the Kazeem is not in this case directly against an absentee, but only virtually, and by implication, because the above person is the Zoo-al-Yed, or immediate possessor of the property, and the acknowledgment of such an one is to be credited in anything affecting his trust, but more especially in the present case, since if he were to deny either the marriage or the deposit, it would not be in the woman's power to sue him, for if she do so, and produce witnesses in support of her plea, their evidence could not be received, as a trustee cannot be sued on a plea of marriage; nor can the woman appear as plaintiff against him with respect to the property in his hands, since she is not the husband's agent: and the trustee's acknowledgment being credited, the Kazeem, in consequence of it, issues a decree for the wife's maintenance, which must affect the husband of course; and the decree of a Kazeem, affecting an absentee in this way, is approved.—If, moreover, the property of the absentee be in the hands of the person aforesaid in the way of Mozaribat, or as a debt, the rule holds the same as if it were a deposit.

Unless that be of a nature different from what is necessary to her support.—WHAT is now said supposes the property to be of the same nature with the woman's right, such as money, grain, or cloth: but where it is otherwise, a maintenance must not be decreed out of it, because, in this case, it cannot be furnished from it but by selling a part, and defraying the expense of it out of the amount; and all our doctors agree that the property of an absentee cannot be sold.

Haneef is of this opinion, because the Kazeem cannot sell the effects even of a person on the spot, but must require him to sell them, and discharge the maintenance with the amount; and consequently he is prohibited from selling the property of an absentee, à fortiori. The two disciples also are of the same opinion, because, although they hold that the Kazeem may dispose of the property of a person on the spot, for the discharge of his wife's maintenance, without his consent, yet this is only where he refuses to do so; but the property of an absentee cannot be thus disposed of, as his refusal is not known.

But she must give security that she has not already received anything in advance.—When the Kazeem decrees a woman her maintenance out of the effects of her absent husband, it behoves him to take security from her for whatever she receives for the indemnity of the absentee, as it is possible that she may already have received her maintenance in advance, or that she may have been divorced, and her Edit be passed; and the Kazeem must also require her to make oath that she has not received any part of her maintenance in advance: contrary to a case where the Kazeer makes a distribution of inheritance among present heirs, according to evidence, and they do not deny any knowledge of another heir, for in this case he does not require a similar security from them in behalf of another heir, who may hereafter appear, because the Makfool-le-hoo, or surety, is there unknown and undefined; but in the present case the surety is known, being the absent husband.

It can be decreed only to the wife, infant children, or parents of the absentee.—A KAZEER cannot decree maintenance, out of the effects of an absentee, in behalf of any but those already mentioned (namely, the wife, infant children, and parents of the absentee), as they alone are authorized to receive a maintenance independent of any decree of the Kazeer (that, in the present case, being only in aid of their right), whereas the other relations within the prohibited degrees are not entitled to any maintenance without a decree of the Kazeer previously obtained for that purpose, as the obligation of it with respect to them varies according to circumstances, wherefore the Kazeer decreeing it to them would amount to a judgment against an absentee, which is not allowed.

No decree can be issued against an absentee's property upon the bare testimony of his wife.—If the Kazeer himself be not assured that the woman is the wife of the absentee and the trustee, factor, or debtor, do not acknowledge her to be so, and she should offer to produce witnesses to prove that she is so,—or, if the absentee should not have left any effects, and she offer to prove her marriage by evidence, with a view to obtain a decree authorizing her to procure a maintenance upon the absentee's credit, still the Kazeer cannot issue a decree accordingly, because this would be a judgment against an absentee, which is inadmissible.—Ziffer says that it is the duty of the Kazeer to hear the proofs, and (although he cannot decree the marriage to be thereby established) to order her a maintenance, as this is a tenderness due to her, and no injury to the absentee, because, if he should afterwards appear and confirm her assertion, she has only taken what was her right,—or, if he should deny the marriage, an oath will be tendered to her (in case of her having no witnesses), and if she decline swearing, his assertion remains established; but if she prove her assertion by evidence, her right is established; and if she cannot produce any proof, and he swear, she or her bail then remain responsible.—The author of this work says that it is the duty of the Kazeer, in the present instance, to decree maintenance to the absentee's wife, from necessity.

Section III.

A divorced wife is entitled to maintenance during her Edit.—WHERE a man his wife, her subsistence and lodging are incumbent upon him during the term of her Edit, whether the divorce be of the reversible or irreversible kind.—Shafei says that no maintenance is due to a woman repudiated by irreversible divorce, unless she be pregnant.—The reason for maintenance being due to a woman under reversible divorce is that the marriage in such a case is still held to continue in force, especially according to our doctors, who on this principle maintain that it is lawful for a man to have carnal connexion with a wife so repudiated.—With respect to a case of irreversible divorce, the arguments of Shafei are twofold; First, Kattima Bint Kays has said, "My husband repudiated me by three divorces, and the prophet did not appoint to me either a place of residence or a subsistence;"—SECONDLY, the matrimonial property is thereby terminated, and the maintenance is held, by Shafei, to be a return for such property (whence it is that a woman's right to maintenance drops upon the death of her husband, as the matrimonial property is dissolved by that event);—but it would be otherwise if a woman repudiated by irreversible divorce be pregnant at the time of divorce, as in this case the obligation of maintenance appears, in the sacred writings, which expressly direct it to a woman under such a circumstance. The argument of our doctors is that maintenance is a return for custody (as was before observed), and custody still continues, on account of that which is the chief end of marriage, namely, offspring (as the intent of Edit is to ascertain whether the woman be pregnant or not), wherefore subsistence is due to her, as well as lodging, which last is admitted by all to be her right; thus the case is the same as if she were actually pregnant; moreover, Omar has recorded a precept of the prophet, to the effect that "maintenance is due to a WOMAN "divorced thrice during her Edit:"—there are also a variety of traditions to the same purpose.

No maintenance due to a widow.—MAINTENANCE is not due to a woman after her husband's decease, because her subsequent confinement [during the term of Edit, in consequence of that event] is not on account of the right of her husband, but of the law, the Edit of widowhood being merely a religious observance, whence it is that the design of ascertaining the state of her womb is not in this instance regarded, and accordingly the Edit is not counted by the menstrual terms, but by time; maintenance is moreover due to a woman from day to day, and the husband's right in his property ceasing upon his decease, it is impossible that any maintenance should be made due from what is, after that event, the property of his heirs.

Nor to a wife in whom the separation originates.—WHEN the separation originates with the woman, from anything which can be imputed to her as a crime, such as apostatizing from the faith, or having carnal connexion or dalliance with the son of her husband, she on account of extreme youth or tender habit), the owner must then be compelled either to provide their maintenance, or to sell them, because slaves are claimants of right notwithstanding their bondage, and by sale their right is obtained, at the same time that the owner's right is also preserved to him by his acquisition of an equivalent in the price for which he disposes of them.—This rule does not hold with respect to other living property (such as horses, and so forth), because cattle are not claimants of right, and consequently the owner is not compelled to an alternative with respect to them, as in the case of slaves: but yet men are directed to furnish their cattle with subsistence on a principle of piety, as the neglect of this is cruelly towards the creature, and at the same time destructive of property, which is forbidden by the prophet.—Aboo Yoosaf is of opinion that the owner of cattle may be compelled to furnish them a proper and sufficient subsistence: but it is the more approved doctrine that he is not liable to any compulsion on that head.

CHAPTER I.

Oaths [of a sinful nature] are of three kinds.—OATHS are of three different kinds:—FIRST, Ghamoos;—SECOND, Moonakid (which is also termed Makoodat);—and THIRD, Lighoo.

Perjury.—A YAMEEN GHAMOOS* signifies an oath taken concerning a thing already past, in which is conveyed an intentional falsehood on the part of the swearer:—and such an oath is highly sinful; the prophet having declared—“whosoever swearth falsely, the same shall God condemn to hell.”

KAFARA, or expiation, is not incumbent (that is to say, is of no avail) in a Yameen Ghamoos; but a repentance and deprecation of the anger of heaven are incumbent. Shatei alleges that expiation is incumbent, because that was ordained for the purpose of doing away any disrespect shown to the name of God, which is sinful; and this disrespect is evident in a Yameen Ghamoos, as it is calling God to witness to a falsehood; a Yameen Ghamoos is therefore the same as a Yameen Moonakid; and as, in that, expiation is incumbent, so in this likewise. The argument of our doctors is that a Yameen Ghamoos is a crime of great magnitude (or deadly sin),—and expiation is an act of piety (whence it may be fulfilled by fasting, and intention is a condition of it); but there is no expiation for a deadly sin, and consequently there is none for a Yameen Ghamoos: contrary to the case of a Yameen Moonakid, as that falls under the class of Mobah, or things indifferent.

OBJECTION.—The description of Mobah, or indifferent, applies to things in which there is no offence; now as a Yameen Moonakid is of an offensive nature, how can it be Mobah?

* Literally, a false oath, or perjury.—It is here proper to observe that the distinctions explained in this chapter relate solely to such oaths or vows as, being false or broken, are sinful, and consequently supposed to excite the divine anger, which must be appeased by expiation: contrary to true oaths or to vows duly fulfilled, as the former of these are frequently required for the sake of justice, and the latter are permitted, whence neither an oath nor vow, simply as such, can be supposed to require expiation.

REPLY.—The offence, in a Yameen Moonakid, occurs subsequently to the declaration of it, and is occasioned by a disrespect shown by the vower to the name of God, of his own free option; whereas the offence, in a Yameen Ghamoos, exists from the first; and such being the case, a Yameen Ghamoos is not to be confounded with a Yameen Moonakid.

*Contracted vows (when not fulfilled).—A YAMEEN MOONAKID signifies an oath taken concerning a matter which is to come. Thus a man swears that he will do such a thing, or he will not do such a thing:—and where the pronouncer fails in this—(that is, where he does not act according to the obligation of his oath).—expiation is incumbent upon him; and this is established upon the authority of the sacred writings.

*And inconsiderate oaths. —*A YAMEEN LIGHOO† is an oath taken concerning an incident or transaction already past, where the swearer believes that the matter to which he thus bears testimony accords with what he swears, and it should happen to be actually otherwise: and from the divine mercy it may be hoped that the swearer will not be condemned for such an oath, since God has declared, in the Koran, “I WILL NOT CALL YOU TO ACCOUNT FOR AN INCONSIDERATE OATH.” An instance of Yameen Lighoo is where a person sees Amroo passing at a distance, and supposing him to be Zeyd, says, “by God that is Zeyd!”

*Expiation is incumbent, whether the vow be wilful or compulsory, or although the oath be taken under a deception of the memory.—*A WIFEUL vow, and a compulsory vow, and an oath taken under a deception of the memory, are all the same, and on account of each expiation is incumbent,‡ because the prophet has said, “there are three points of serious import, the sporting with which is also serious, to wit, MARRIAGE, DIVORCE, and a VOW.”—Shafei, controverts this doctrine. His arguments will be hereafter recited at large under the head of Ikrah, or compulsory process.

*The violation of a vow, whether by compulsion or through forgetfulness, requires expiation.—*If a man do a thing which breaks his vow, either by compulsion, or through forgetfulness, these are both the same, and expiation is incumbent upon him in either case, because the specified act which is the condition of expiation is not made void by the circumstances of compulsion or forgetfulness:—and so also, if the thing should be done by a maniac or an idiot, —because there likewise the condition is actually fulfilled.

OBJECTION.—Expiation is not incumbent

but for the purpose of obliterating a sin now no sin can be imputed to maniacs or idiots, as such are not made answerable: it would therefore follow that expiation is not incumbent upon them.

REPLY.—Although expiation be intended for the purpose of expunging sin, yet the obligation of it in this case rests upon the argument of a sin (namely, the breach of a vow), and not upon the actual sin itself, so that, wherever the breach of a vow appears, expiation is incumbent.

CHAPTER II.

OF WHAT CONSTITUTES AN OATH OR VOW, AND WHAT DOES NOT CONSTITUTE IT.

*An oath may be expressed by using the name of God, or any of his customary attributes.—YAMEEN (that is, an oath or vow) is constituted by the use of the name of Almighty God, or of any of those appellations by which the Deity is generally known and understood, such as Rihman and Rihcem. An oath may also be expressed by such attributes of the Deity as are commonly used in swearing, such as the power, or the glory, or the might of God, because an oath is usually expressed under one or other of those qualities: and the sense of Yameen, namely, strength, is by this means obtained, since as the swearer believes in the power, glory, might, and other attributes of the Deity, it follows that the mention of these attributes only is sufficient to strengthen the resolution in the performance of the act vowed, or the avoidance thereof.

*Excepting his knowledge, wrath, or mercy.—*If a man swear “by the knowledge of God,” it does not constitute an oath, because an oath expressed by the knowledge of God is not in use: moreover, by knowledge is frequently implied merely that which is known; and in this sense the word knowledge is not expressive either of the name of God, or of any of his attributes.—In the same manner, should a person swear “by the wrath of God,” or “by the mercy of God,” it does not constitute an oath, because an oath is not commonly expressed by any of these attributes: moreover, by the word Rihmat [mercy] is sometimes understood rain, and heaven is also occasionally expressed by that term; and by the word Ghazb [wrath] is understood punishment; and none of these are either appellations or attributes of the Deity.

*It is not constituted by using any other name.—*If a person swear by any other name than that of God, —such as the prophet, or the holy temple, this does not constitute an oath,—as the prophet has said, “if any man among ye take an oath, he must swear by the name of God, or else his oath is void.” If a person also swear by the Koran, it does not constitute an oath, although the Koran be the word of God, because men do not swear by the Koran. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this is where the swearer only says “by the prophet,” or “by the temple,” or “by the Koran;” but if the swearer say, “if I act contrary to what I now say, may I be deprived of the prophet,” or “of the temple,” or “of the Koran;” this constitutes an oath, because such privation would reduce the swearer to the state of an infidel, and the suspension of infidelity upon a condition amounts to Yameen.

† Literally, a nugatory oath, or (sometimes) a rash oath.

‡ That is, if the thing sworn to be false, or the vow be violated.

Particles of swearing.—An oath is confirmed by the use of the particles of swearing; and these (in the Arabic) are three, namely, the letters, waw, and be, and te,* as oaths are commonly repeated and understood under this form; and in this sense these particles occur in the Koran. Let it be also observed that the particles of swearing are sometimes understood, though not expressed, that is, are omitted in the expression, although implied in the sense; and this constitutes an oath: as if a man were to say “God, I will not do this:” because [in the Arabic] it is common to reject the particle for the sake of brevity: sometimes indeed the letter lam is used for the swearing particle, as it is capable (according to Mookart†) of being substituted for be.

Swearing by the truth of God is not an oath.—HANEFA alleges that if a man should swear “by the truth of God,” this does not constitute an oath, and in this Imam Mohammed coincides. There are two opinions of Aboo Yoosaf recorded on this point: according to one it is not an oath; but according to the other it is an oath, because truth is one of the attributes of the Deity, signifying the certainty of the divine existence, and hence it is the same as if the swearer were to say, “by God, the truth!” and as oaths are common under this mode of expression, so an oath is here constituted. The argument of Mohammed and Haneefa is that the term “the truth,” as here expressed, relates merely to the identity of the godhead as the object of obedience, and hence an oath thus expressed appears to be taken by that which is neither an appellation nor an attribute of God. The learned, however, say, that if a person express himself thus, “by the truth, I will do so and so,” this constitutes an oath, because the truth is one of the appellatives or proper names of God. But, if a person were to say, “I will do this truly,” it does not amount to an oath, because the word truly can only be taken, in this case, as a corroboration or confirmation of the promise contained in the speech, being the same as if he were to say, “I shall do this indeed.”

The expressions, “I swear,” “I vow,” or “I testify,” constitute an oath, without the name of God.—If a man say, “I swear,” or “I vow,” or “testify,” whether the words “by God” be superadded or not, it constitutes an oath, because such words are commonly used in swearing: the use of them in the present tense is undisputed; and they are also sometimes used in the future tense, where the context admits of a construction in the present; and attestation amounts to an oath, as in that sense it occurs in the sacred writings: now swearing by the name of God is both customary and conformable to the divine ordinances, but without the name of God it is forbidden; when it so occurs, therefore, it must be construed into a lawful oath: hence, some say, that intention is not requisite in it; others, however, allege that the intention is essential, because the words here recited bear the construction of a promise,—that is, they admit of being received as applying to the future, and also of being taken as a vow without the name of God.

If a person, speaking in the Persian language, were to say, “I swear by God,” it amounts to an oath, because here the idiom confines the expression solely to the present; but, if he were to say simply, “I swear,” some allege that this does not constitute an oath. If he were to say, “I swear by the divorce of my wife,” this is not an oath, as an oath is not so expressed in practice.

Swearing by the existence of God makes an oath.—If a man, in swearing, say, “by the age,” or “the existence” (of God), it constitutes an oath, because the age or existence of God signifies his eternity, which is one of his attributes. [Several other forms of swearing are here recited, but of no consequence, as their validity or nullity depends altogether upon certain peculiarities in the Arabic idiom.]

A vow may be contracted by the imprecation of a conditional penalty.—If a person should say, “if I do this may I be a Jew,” or “a Christian,” or “an infidel,” it constitutes an oath; because, as the swearer has made the condition a sign of infidelity, it follows that he is conscious of his obligation to avoid the condition; and this obligation is possible, by his making it an oath, in such a way as to render unlawful to himself that which is lawful.—And if the oath relate to any thing which he has done in the time past, as if he were to say, “if I have done so

* Each of these letters, prefixed to the name of God, is expressive of the English by.

† A celebrated Arabic grammarian and rhetorician.

may "I be a Jew," or "an infidel," and so forth, this is a Yameen Ghamoos, or perjury. The swearer is not, however, in this case made a Jew or an infidel, because the words, "may I be an infidel" (and so forth), relate to some future indefinite period.—Some, on the contrary, have alleged that he becomes actually an infidel,* because the penalty which the swearer imprecates upon himself relates to the present instant of his testimony, being the same as if he were to say, "I am a Jew, &c."—But the fact is, the swearer does not become a Jew or infidel in either of the cases before us (that is, in that of a vow with respect to the future, or an oath regarding the past), provided he consider this merely as a form of swearing:† but if he believe that by thus swearing he fully subjects himself to the penalty expressed, he suffers accordingly, in either instance, because he appears consenting to infidelity, on account of having ventured upon a thing by the commission of which he conceives that he may be rendered an infidel.‡

If a person say, "if I do thus, may the anger of God fall upon me," this does not constitute a vow, as not being a customary mode of expression for that purpose. And so, also, if a person were to say, "may I be an adulterer," or "a drunkard," or "an usurer," because these are not generally understood or received as forms of swearing.

CHAPTER III.

OF KAFARA, OR EXPIATION.§

!A For may be expiated by the emancipation of a slave, the distribution of alms.—THE expiation of a vow || is effected by the emancipation of a slave; and the emancipation of such a slave as suffices in Zihar, suffices also in the case of a vow:—or if the swearer choose, let him clothe ten paupers, giving to

* That is, becomes subjected to the penalties of actual apostasy from the faith.

† Where no other penalty than that of expiation can be incurred.

‡ All these cases suppose the thing sworn to be false.

§ The term Kafara means not only an expiatory atonement for the breach of an absolute vow, but also the substitution of an expiatory act for the penalty imposed by a vower upon himself in the case of a vow suspended upon a condition, by which he had designed to restrain himself from the commission of any particular act.

|| Meaning expiation for the breach or violation of a vow,—or for any other description of Yameen which admits of expiation, such as a Yameen Lighoo, &c.

each one piece of cloth, or more (the smallest quantity to each is as much as is necessary in prayer*)—or if he please, let him distribute victuals among ten paupers, the same as in the expiation of Zihar.—All these modes of effecting the expiation of a vow are authorized in the Koran, according to the words in the text,—"THE EXPIATION THEREOF MAY BE EFFECTED BY FEEDING TEN POOR PERSONS WITH SUCH FOOD AS IS USUALLY CONSUMED IN YOUR FAMILIES, OR BY CLOTHING TEN POOR PERSONS, OR BY THE RELEASE OF A SLAVE."—It is manifest, therefore, that, in the present instance, one of these three modes is indispensable.

Or fasting.—BUT if the delinquent (from his poverty, or other cause) should not be able to effect his expiation in any of these three modes, he may do it by fasting three days successively.—Shafei says that he has an option; if he think proper, he may fast for three days successively, or for any three separate days,—because the words of the Koran are, "IF HE BE UNABLE TO DO THIS, LET HIM FAST FOR THREE DAYS," which expression is general.—The Haneefite doctors, in support of their opinion upon this point, quote the authority of the reading of Abdoola Ibn Massaood, who expounds the text to mean three days successively; and this accords with what occurs in the Hadees Mashhoor.†—With respect to what has been said of the smallest quantity of cloth sufficient in expiation, it is recorded from Imam Mohammed. —Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf assert that the smallest quantity of cloth proper upon this occasion is as much as may be sufficient to clothe nearly the whole body; for a mere Shilwar‡ is not sufficient; and this is the more authentic doctrine: because one who is only thus clothed is regarded as naked.—That portion of cloth, however, which may not suffice in regard to clothing, may be sufficient in eating, according to its value; that is, if a person were to bestow, as an expiation, such a quantity of cloth as, although it may not suffice for the proper clothing, yet is equal in value to the feeding of ten poor men, it suffices as a feeding expiation, whether such may have been the intention or not.—Thus, if the person to make expiation were to give to each poor person the half of a proper dress (for instance), this would not be sufficient for an expiation by clothing; but if the value of the cloth thus distributed to each be equal to the price of three pounds of wheat, it suffices as an expiation by feeding.

Precious expiation does not suffice.—If a person perform the expiation before the violation of his vow, it does not suffice.—Shafei maintains that it suffices, where the expiation

* Mussulmans must be clothed in prayer at least from the waist downwards.

† A collection of traditions so called.

‡ A species of drawers which are a sufficient clothing for prayer.

is effected by means of property, and not by fasting, because the expiator makes his atonement posterior to the occasion of it, (namely, his vow), and hence the case is the same as that of a pilgrim performing expiation for wounding game,*—that is, if the pilgrim perform expiation after the act of wounding, it suffices; and so also in the present case. The argument of our doctors is that expiation is ordained as an atonement for offence; but in the case before us no offence has yet appeared.—In reply to what is advanced by Shafei, they observe that the vow is not the occasion of the offence, as nothing can be considered in any degree the occasion of an offence, but what necessarily leads thereto, and a vow does not necessarily lead to its own violation, but is rather prohibitory of it; hence the vow is not the cause of the offence in the present instance: contrary to the case of the pilgrim, adduced by Shafei, in which the wound inflicted upon the deer leads to its destruction, by ultimately occasioning its death; these therefore are not analogous cases.—It is to be observed that whatever the expiator may have given to the poor before the violation of his vow, he must not take back again, because this is alms, and it is not lawful for a man to take back his alms.

A lawful vow must be broken and expiated.—If a man bind himself, by a vow, to the commission of a sin, as if he were to swear, “by God I will not pray,” or “I will not converse with my father,” or “I will murder such an one in such a month,” it is incumbent upon him to violate his vow, and perform an expiation, because it is recorded in the traditions, that if a man vow a thing, knowing that the neglect is preferable to the fulfilment, he ought to act accordingly, performing an expiation for the breach of his vow.

The vows of infidels, being nugatory, cannot be held as violated.—If an infidel should make a vow, and afterwards violate the same, either as an infidel or as a Mussulman, (supposing him to have been converted to the faith in the interim), still he is not forsworn, because he was not competent to make a vow; as a vow is contracted (that is, is made binding) by a reverence for the name of God, and the vower, whilst he was an infidel, cannot be supposed to have entertained any reverence for the name of God:—an infidel, moreover, is not competent to the performance of expiation, as that is an act of piety.

Vows of abstinence.—If a man make certain articles unlawful to him,† which are in their own nature lawful, as if he were to say, “I have made this cloth (or, this provision) unlawful to me,”* yet such article does not actually become unlawful to him, but he must perform expiation when he happens to put on that cloth, or to eat that provision.—Shafei says that expiation is not incumbent upon him, because rendering unlawful that which is lawful does not amount to a vow, as a vow is an act authorized by the law.—The argument of our doctors is that the words, “I have made unlawful,” evince the establishment of illegality in the thing: now there is a possibility of establishing illegality in a thing that is really otherwise, by supposing that the speaker had taken an oath that he would not wear the clothes, or eat the provisions; and this supposition is adopted, in order to establish the illegality declared by the speaker; and it follows that whenever he does that thing which he has rendered illegal to himself, he becomes forsworn, whether the matter be great or small, because when unlawfulness is once established in a thing, the illegality pervades every part of it.

If a man were to say, “every thing lawful is unlawful to me,” every species of food and drink forthwith becomes unlawful to him, unless where the intention or design of the vow has regarded something else.—This proceeds upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that the vower, as soon as he has uttered his vow, must become forsworn, as being unavoidably and continually placed in the performance of some lawful act, such as breathing, moving, resting, or so forth; and such is the opinion of Ziffer upon it; but the more favourable construction is that the design of the vow is to establish something, the commission of which shall be a crime; and as this cannot be effected where the intention, from the words of the vow, appears to be general, regard to its universality drops, and such being the case, the vow will be construed respecting meat and drink, for the sake of general application, as it is in practice commonly applied to the articles of customary subsistence. A vow of this nature does not include the use of women, unless by the intention of the vower; but in this case it constitutes an Aila, because the form of words here recited is a vow, bearing the interpretation of “by God, I will not have carnal connexion with my wife:” and it is to be observed that, where the vower, by the words, “every thing lawful,” intends woman, yet meat and drink are not excluded from the vow, but still remain and are to be considered as constituting a part of it.—What is now advanced is taken from the Zahir-Rayawet.—Our modern doctors have said that divorce follows a vow of this form, independent of the intention, as the aforesaid words are frequently used in divorce;

* Pilgrims are forbidden to destroy game of any kind within a certain distance of Mecca, termed the Ihram [forbidden ground] of pilgrimage.

† This is a phrase by which is understood a vow of abstinence from the thing expressed.

* In reciting these forms of vows, the address [“by God,” or “I swear,” &c.] is, for the sake of brevity, omitted; it is always, however, to be understood.

and there are decrees upon record to this effect. It is also proper that the same rule should hold where the vow is pronounced in the Persian tongue, for the sake of general application. Let it be observed, however, that if a man were to say, "whatsoever I have in my right hand is unlawful to me," there is a difference among casuists concerning the effect of it; some doctors say that the intention is a condition, whilst others maintain that it is not so; it is evident, however, that divorce takes place from it, independent of the intention, on account of custom.

A vow is binding without any condition annexed.—If a person express a vow in general terms, that is, not suspended upon a condition, as if he were to say, "I shall fast upon such a day for the sake of God," he is bound to the observance thereof, because it is said, in the traditions, "whoever makes a vow, and specifies it, he is bound to the observance of what he has so specified."

If a person suspend a vow on a condition, and the condition afterwards occur, he is bound to the performance of what he has vowed; and expiation is here of no avail, because the tradition above recited is general,—that is, applies to a suspended as well as an unsuspended vow; and also, because a vow suspended upon a condition becomes, upon the condition taking place, the same as one of immediate performance.—It is recorded of Haneefa, that he receded from this doctrine, alleging that if a man were to say (for instance), "if I do so, I am under obligation to perform a pilgrimage," or "fast a year," or "to bestow all my property in alms," and then perform an expiation for his vow, it suffices; and such is the opinion of Mohammed. If, however, the vower should not make an expiation, but perform the thing which he had specified, he is discharged from the obligation of that also, provided the condition be of such a nature as that the vower had no intention it should ever take place. The reason of this is that, where the condition is of the description now mentioned, the speech of the vower, as aforesaid, bears the sense of a Yameen, or suspended vow, and also of a Nuzr, or absolute vow: evidently of a Nuzr, because such a form of words is commonly used to express a Nuzr; and also of a Yameen, because the design of the person, in so speaking, is to restrain himself from doing the act which constitutes the condition: and such being the case, it remains at his option either to perform expiation, regarding his words in the light of a Yameen, or to perform the condition specified, regarding them in the light of a Nuzr: it is otherwise, however, where the thing conditioned is not of the above-mentioned description, but is actually intended by the speaker,—as where a man (for instance) says, "if God grant me a recovery from this illness, I am under an obligation to perform a pilgrimage," for here expiation does not suffice, but it is incumbent upon him to perform the actual thing specified, because in this case the words do not bear the sense merely of Yameen, but also of an absolute vow of performance:—and this distinction is approved.

A vow pronounced, with a reservation of the will of God, is null.—If a person make a vow of any thing, adding, "if it please God," as if he were to say, "by God I will do this, God willing," he cannot be forsworn, because the prophet has said, "he who vows any thing, adding, 'if it please God,' cannot be forsworn."—It is to be observed, however, that it is a condition that the words "God willing," do follow in immediate connexion with the words preceding, because if they be pronounced separately, after having uttered the vow, it is a retractation: and a retractation in Yameen is not lawful.

CHAPTER IV.

OF VOWS WITH RESPECT TO ENTRANCE INTO, OR RESIDENCE IN, A PARTICULAR PLACE.

A vow against entering a house is not violated by entering a mosque, church, &c.—If a person make a vow, that "he will not enter any house," and he should afterwards enter a mosque, or synagogue, or church, he is not forsworn, because a house is a place built for the purpose of dwelling in (that is of sleeping, &c.), and buildings of the above description are not designed for this purpose:—the rule is also the same, if the swearer should enter a porch or portico before the door of a house for the same reason. Some have asserted that if the portico be inclosed, in such a manner, that when the front door is shut, a person may be said to be in the house, the swearer by entering such portico violates his vow, it being customary for persons to reside and sleep in such a place. If the swearer also enter an Iwan* he is forsworn, because that is designed as an occasional residence in the hot weather, and is a species of dwelling as much as a summer or winter residence. Some have conceived that this is the case only where the Iwan has four walls [that is, where it is a complete quadrangle]: this distinction is made, because those buildings in Koofa, and other parts of Arabia, are generally so constructed; whereas, with us [that is, in Hindostan and Persia] they have commonly three walls only, being quite open in front, and therefore are not to be considered as a house.—Others, however, say that entering an Iwan is a violation of the vow, whether it be constructed of three walls or of four; and this is approved.

* An Iwan is an open gallery or balcony, on the top of, or adjoining to, an house, the roof of which is generally supported by piers or pillars, for the benefit of the air in the hot season.

A vow against entering a Serai is no violated by entering a ruin.—If a person swear that "he will not enter into a place," that is, into a Serai, and he afterward enter a place which is desolate and in ruins, he is not forsworn: but if a person swear that "he will not enter such a place," the place being then in a good and habitable state, and he should enter it after it had fallen to ruin, and been laid level with the plain, he is forsworn, because the term Daar, among both the Arabs and Persians, means any particular place, as with them it is common to say, "such a Daar is peopled,"—or, "such a Daar is desolate (that is, abandoned);" now an edifice is the description of the term Daar, and this description is regarded in the first of the above cases, but not in the last.

If a man take an oath, saying, "I will not enter into this Daar;" and the said place should afterwards become ruined and desolate, and should again be rebuilt, or repaired, and the swearer should after that enter it, he is forsworn, according to what was before observed, that the appellation Daar still continues to be applied to the place, after the destruction of the edifice which stood upon it:—but if this place, after having been ruined and desolate, should be rebuilt as a mosque, bath, or dwelling-house, and the swearer should, after that, enter it, he is not forsworn, because in any of these cases the term Daar is no longer applied to the place, as it is then called by another name, such as mosque, and so forth: and the same rule holds where this person enters that place after the destruction of such mosque, bath, or other public building, as may in the interim have been erected there, because the place will not recover its original name after such destruction.

A vow against entering any particular house is not broken by entering it when in ruins.—If a man swear "he will not enter such a dwelling-house," and he should enter therein after it had been destroyed or become desolate, he is not forsworn; because the term dwelling-house is abrogated, as no person then dwells in it; whereas, if the roof only should have fallen in, and the walls remain, and he were then to enter it, he would be forsworn, because it is still considered as habitable, and the place does not lose its appellation of a dwelling-house [Bait] from that circumstance. In the same manner he is not forsworn where, the house having been destroyed and laid level with the plain, another house is built upon the same spot, and he then enters this house,—because the term dwelling-house, as applied to the former house, was rendered inapplicable by the circumstance of its ruin.

A vow against entering a house is not violated by going upon the roof, or entering the portico, &c.—If a man swear that "he will not enter certain house," and he afterwards go on the top of the house, from the outside, he is forsworn, because the roof is a part of the house. Some have said that, with us, he is not forsworn.—In the same manner, he is forsworn if he enter the portico only of the house specified in the vow. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this case admits of a distinction: thus, if the portico be such as that, if the door be shut, it forms a part of the house, and it is covered in, he is forsworn, but if otherwise, he is not forsworn.—If he stand under the arch of the doorway he is also forsworn, provided the arch be so constructed as that when the door is shut it becomes included as a part of the house; but if the arch be so situated as that, after shutting the door, it is not included as a part of the dwelling, he is not forsworn, because the door is designed as a protection to the house; so that whenever the archway is not, by shutting the door, included as a part of the house, but is without the door, it is evident that it is not included in the house.

Case of vows respecting abstinence from a thing in which the vower is at present engaged.—If a man should swear "I will not enter into this house," and it should so be that he is in the said house at the time of swearing thus, he is not forsworn by sitting down in that house, nor unless he go out of the house, and again enter it. This is upon a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest that the vower is forsworn, because the effect of the commencement of the act and of its continuance is one and the same; and as he would be forsworn by the commencement of the act, so he is by its continuance: but the more favourable construction is that, admitting the effect of the commencement and the continuance to be the same, yet this can only be where the act is of such a nature as to be capable of continuance, which the entrance into a place does not allow, as the word entrance implies passing from without to within.

If a person swear that "he will not put on a particular garment," and should happen to have the said garment upon him at the very time of his so swearing, and should forthwith take it off, he is not forsworn. And so also a person riding upon a mule [or other beast] if he takes an oath, saying, "I will not ride upon this animal," and should forthwith alight, he is not forsworn. In the same manner, a person residing in a house, if he swear that "he will not live in this house," and thereupon begin to remove out of it, he is not forsworn.—Ziffer maintains, however, that the swearer, in the last of these instances, is forsworn, as the circumstance upon which the violation of his vow is suspended (namely, his residence in the house), does already exist, however short the time may be. Our doctors argue that a vow is imposed with a view to the fulfilment of it, and therefore, that in the present instance, such a space of time as admits of the fulfilment must be excepted from the vow; and hence, if the swearer make any delay, he is forsworn, because such acts as are here mentioned are capable of continuance, as a man may, with propriety, say, "I rode a whole day," or "I wore such a robe for a day:" contrary to the act of entrance; as a man could not say, "I entered for a day:" and the possibility of continuance in such acts being thus proved, it follows that the effect of the commencement and the continuance is one and the same:—but if the swearer should here purely intend the commencement of the act, and say that his design was to vow that "he would not ride again" (for instance), his declaration is to be credited, as his words admit of that construction.

If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not reside in this house," and he should himself leave the house, his family and effects still remaining in it, although he may have no intention of returning to reside there, yet he is forsworn, because he is still supposed to be an inhabitant of that house, from the circumstance of his family and effects continuing therein; as merchants, who reside in the Bazaars (that is, have shops there), say, notwithstanding, "they reside in such a street," meaning the residence of their families.

A vow against residing in a city is not broken by the vower's family continuing there.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not reside in this city," and he go forth from it, resolving not to return thither, although his family should still continue to reside there, yet he is not forsworn, and his observance of the vow does not depend upon his carrying his family and effects out of that city, according to what is recorded from Abou Yoosaf, because (contrary to the preceding case) he is then no longer considered as an inhabitant thereof in the customary acceptance:—and a village is (in the Rawayet Saheeh) declared to be the same as a city, with respect to this rule.—Hanefaa observes, upon the preceding case, that the removal of the whole of the effects from the house is necessary, inasmuch that if even a single nail of the vower's property be left therein, he is forsworn, because, as his residence in that house was understood from the whole of his effects being there, so will it still be understood whilst any part of them remains therein.—Abou Yoosaf alleges that the removal of a principal part of them is sufficient, because the removal of the whole is sometimes impracticable. Mohammed says that the removal of such quantity only is necessary, as might be sufficient for house-keeping, because any thing beyond that is not of a residuary nature; and the learned have agreed that this is the most laudable distinction.—It is here requisite that the swearer remove to another house, without delay, in order that he may observe his vow; for if he should not remove into another house, but into the street or a mosque, the learned in the law say that he does not fulfil his vow; the reason of which is that if a person were to remove out of a city with his family, so long as he does not fix upon another place of abode, his first residence remains with respect to prayer;* whence, if he return to his former abode, he is still accounted an inhabitant; and the same holds good in the present case.

CHAPTER V.

OF VOWS RESPECTING VARIOUS ACTIONS; SUCH AS COMING, GOING, RIDING, AND SO

An evasion of a vow is a violation of it.—If a man swear that he will not go out of the mosque, and afterwards desire another to carry him forth from it, and the other do so, he is forsworn, because an act performed by the direction or any person is attributed to the director, and it is here, therefore, the same as if he had mounted a beast, and rode out upon it: but if another person were to carry him out of the mosque by compulsion, he is not forsworn, because the act of a person compelling cannot be attributed to the person who is forcibly compelled, as he gave no direction in it.—If, moreover, a person should carry out the swearer with his will, but without his direction, he is not forsworn (according to the Rawayet Saheeh), because his removal cannot here be established, as it can only be so by the circumstance of his directing or desiring it, and not by his will alone; and his desire or direction do not appear.

If a man swear that he will not go forth [from his house] except to a funeral, and he afterwards go to attend the funeral, and some other business should then occur to him, and he go upon that business, he is not forsworn, because the act of going to the funeral was excepted from his vow, and his motions after that are not forthgoings, as by going forth is understood removing from the inside of a house to the outside.

If a man swear, saying, "I will not go forth towards Mecca," and he afterwards go forth with a design of going to Mecca, and return, he is forsworn; because his going forth with a design of going to Mecca (which is the condition) is here found, since, by going forth is understood removal from the inside of the house to without, which has here occurred. But if he should have sworn, saying, "I will not come to Mecca," and he afterwards go towards Mecca, and return, he is not forsworn, nor until such time as he actually enters Mecca, because coming implies arriving, and that has not taken place. If a man swear also, "that he will not go towards Mecca," some lawyers say that the case will be the same as this last recited, whilst others assert that it corresponds with the preceding case; this last, however, is the more approved doctrine, because going implies removal, and arrival is not necessary to constitute removal.

An undetermined vow of performance is not violated until the death of the vower.—If a man make a vow that "he will go to Mecca," and he should not go to Mecca during his life, he is forsworn: but he will not be accounted forsworn until after his death, because whilst life remains there is a hope of his fulfilling his vow.

Vows made with a view of prevention.—If a man make a vow, saying to his wife, "if you go out unless by my permission, you are divorced," and he should afterwards once grant such permission, and the woman go out accordingly, and she should again go out without her husband's permission, the consequence of his vow is incurred (that is the woman becomes divorced), because permission is requisite each time that she goes out, as he excepted from his vow the act of her going out with his permission, and any other act of going out beyond that is included in the inhibition, wherefore the consequence is induced by her going forth without his permission.—If the vower explain, saying, "I intended one permission only," his declaration is to be credited in a religious view, but not in point of law, because, although his words, as above, are capable of this construction, yet it is contrary to their apparent tendency.

Case of a vow expressed generally, but restricted, in its sense, to some particular occasion.—If a woman be desirous of going out, and her husband say, "if you go out, you are divorced," and she thereupon sit down, and afterwards go out, the consequence is not induced,—that is, divorce does not take place:—and so also, if a man be desirous of beating his slave, and another vow, "if you beat him, such an one my slave is free," and the man, desisting only for a momentary space, beat his slave, the slave of the other person does not become free. The reason of this is that the design of the speaker in what he vows is to prevent that going forth of the woman, or that which (according to what then appears) the woman or the master is intent upon doing, and of course the vow is restricted to that beating, or that going forth, as the foundation of the vow rests upon what appears at the particular crisis.—This species of vow is termed Yameen Fowr, or a sudden vow: and Haneefa is the first who makes any mention of this kind of vow. For previously vows were described as of two species, one general (as where a man says, "I will not do so")—and the other restricted (as where a man says, "I will not do so this day")—but Haneefa deduced from these a third, saying, "the third sort is that which is general with respect to the words, but restricted with respect to the sense." *

If a man invite another to sit down and eat breakfast with him, and the other make a vow, saying, "if I eat breakfast my slave is free," and he should then proceed to his own house, and there eat his breakfast, he does not incur the penalty of his vow, because what he said, as being an answer, relates solely to the speech of the other person, and is therefore construed as regarding that breakfast to which the other had invited him. But if the person thus invited were to answer, "if I eat breakfast this day my slave is free,"—upon his breakfasting either there or elsewhere at any time during that day the penalty is incurred, because here he has superadded to his reply the expression "this day," and hence what he has said is rendered a separate sentence and not a reply.

If a man swear that he will not ride upon the beast of any other person, and he should afterwards ride upon a horse, the property of one of his slaves, who is a Mazoon, he is not forsworn (according to Haneefa), whether such Mazoon be involved in debt or not.*—If the Mazoon, however, should be very much involved in debt, the vower is forsworn, although he should not intend it, as the master, in such case, is not held (by Haneefa) to be possessed of any property in the animal. If, on the contrary, the debts of the Mazoon be of trifling consequence only, or if he should not be in debt at all, the master is not forsworn, where he does not intend it, because in either case, he is himself the virtual proprietor of the animal:—but the animal is held to belong to the Mazoon, both in the eye of the law, and also by common usage, and hence concerning his belonging to the master there is no doubt; wherefore his intention in the act is requisite. Abou Yoosaf says that he is not forsworn in any of those cases, unless he be intentionally, because whether the animal be the property of the master or not is dubious. Mohammed, on the other hand, says that he is forsworn, although he be so unintentionally, since the animal is his property, as the two disciples hold that debt is in no respect repugnant to a slave being the property of his master.

CHAPTER VI.

OF VOWS WITH RESPECT TO EATING OR DRINKING.

Vows with respect to eating dates.—If a person swear that "he will not eat of such a date-tree," his vow relates to the fruit of that tree only, because he has referred his vow, to a thing which is not eatable, namely, the tree: wherefore his vow is metaphorically taken to regard the article which is the product of the tree, namely, the dates; and the subject admits the metaphor, as the date-tree is the cause of that article existing. But it is a condition that the dates do not undergo any change by a new operation; for if he were to drink a Nabbeza (or infusion) prepared from these dates, or juice expressed from them, yet he would not be forsworn.

A vow of abstinence from anything is not broken by eating that thing when it has acquired a new description.—If a man swear that “he will not eat of those Boosrs” (half-ripe dates), and should afterwards eat of them when they have become ripe, he is not forsworn; and so also, if he should swear that “he will not eat of those Ritbs” (ripe dates), “nor drink of this milk,” and he afterwards eat of these mixed together, after the Ritbs shall have become mellow and the milk coagulated; because the description of half-ripe or of ripe is the motive for the vow, and those descriptions are no longer applicable, and in the same manner, the milk being in the state of milk is the motive of the vow, wherefore the vow is taken respecting it in that state; milk, moreover, is ranked among eatables, wherefore by milk is not understood any thing which may be produced from it. It is otherwise where a man vows that “he will not converse with such an infant,” or “with such a youth,” and he converses with the infant after he becomes a man, or with the youth after he has become aged, for here he is forsworn; because refraining from converse with a Mussulman is forbidden by the law, whether such Mussulman be an infant or a youth; hence the descriptions of infancy or adolescence are not regarded, in the eye of the law, as motives of the vow; consequently the vow is understood to respect such a person; and the vower is accordingly forsworn if he converse with that person after he arrives at years of maturity.

Or denomination.—If a person swear that “he will not eat of such a kid,” and he should eat thereof after the said kid shall have become a goat, he is forsworn, because the description of kid, in such an animal, is not the motive of the vow, since a person who avoids eating the flesh of kids, still more avoids eating the flesh of goats.

If a man make a vow that “he will not eat Boosrs (unripe dates), and should afterwards eat Ritbs (ripe dates), he will not be forsworn, because Ritbs are not Boosrs.

If a person make a vow that “he will not eat Ritbs or Boosrs,” and he should afterwards eat Mozen nibs (dates which are beginning to ripen), he is forsworn, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that he is not forsworn by eating Boosr-Mozen nibs, in a case where he may have sworn not to eat Ritbs; neither does he violate his vow by eating Ritb-Mozen nibs, in a case where he has made a vow against eating Boosrs; because Ritb-Mozen nibs are termed Ritbs, and Boosr-Mozen nibs are termed Boosrs. Thus it is the same as if a man were to make a vow with respect to buying;—that is, if a man were to swear that he will not this day buy Ritbs (or ripe dates), and he should afterwards on that same day purchase Mozen nibs (or half-ripe dates), he is not forsworn; and so in this case likewise. The argument of Haneefa on this point is that Ritb-Mozen nibs are such as rather incline to Boosrs, and Boosr-Mozen nibs are the reverse—(that is, such as rather approach to Ritbs), wherefore eating either of those is eating Boosrs or Ritbs, and the vow regards one or other of them:—contrary to the case of buying, as the buying relates to every species, wherefore the inferior species is a dependant of the superior.

If a man vow that “he will not buy any ripe dates,” and he should afterwards purchase a cluster of unripe dates, among which there may chance to be some ripe, he is not forsworn; because the purchase relates to the whole, and the smaller quantity is a dependant of the greater; but, if the vow were made with respect to eating, he is forsworn, because the eating of them relates from time to time, wherefore the vow regards every one of them. This case is therefore the same as if a man were to vow that he would not purchase any barley, and he should afterwards buy wheat, having among it some grains of barley, in which case he is not forsworn; but if he should vow that he would not eat any barley, and he should afterwards eat wheat, among which are some grains of barley, he is forsworn, for the reason here stated.

If a man vow that “he will not eat flesh,” and he should afterwards eat the flesh of fish, he is not forsworn, on a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would suggest that he is forsworn, because the meat of fish is termed flesh, and so it is denominated in the Koran; but the reason for the more favourable construction of the law is that the meat of fish is only termed flesh metaphorically, as flesh is produced from blood, and there is no blood in fish, on account of their inhabiting the water. If the vower, on the contrary, were to eat of the flesh of a hog or a man, he would be forsworn, because that is actually flesh, although the use of it be forbidden, and a vow is sometimes made with respect to forbidden things; and in like manner he is forsworn if he were to eat of the liver or the paunch of any animal, because that is in reality flesh, as being produced from blood, and is, moreover, used in the same manner as flesh. Some say that, in our time, the vower is not forsworn by eating of liver or paunch, as these articles are not among us accounted flesh.

If a person swear that “he will not eat or buy fat” (that is tallow), he is not forsworn by eating or purchasing fat, unless it be the fat or tallow of the belly. • The two disciples allege that the swearer would violate his vow by purchasing or eating the fat of the back, because the peculiar quality of tallow, which is melting in the fire, exists in this species, as well as in that of the belly. The argument of Haneefa is that the fat of the back is in reality flesh, as being produced from blood; and it is, moreover, used as flesh, and thence the flesh derives its value and goodness; for which reason a person eating it would violate his vow, where he had sworn not to eat flesh, and is not forsworn by selling the fat of the back, where he had sworn that "he would not sell fat." Some allege that this difference subsists only where the vower has sworn concerning fat, but not where he has sworn concerning tallow, as that is never used in the way of flesh.

If a man make a vow that "he will neither eat nor buy flesh or fat," and he should afterwards either eat or purchase the fat tail of a sheep, yet he is not forsworn, because this part is altogether distinct from both flesh and fat, as not being used for the same purpose as either of them.

If a man swear that "he will not eat of this wheat," he does not violate his vow, unless he chew it; and if he should eat bread made of the wheat, he is not forsworn, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples maintain that by eating the said bread he is forsworn, since by the terms of the vow is also understood wheaten bread, according to common usage.—The argument of Haneefa is that, the eating of wheat is a thing actually practised, as men eat wheat boiled and dressed in other modes, and the literal acceptance must (according to its tenets) always be preferred to the metaphorical, although that be sanctioned by custom.—If the swearer should chew the wheat, the two disciples coincide in opinion with our doctors, that he is forsworn; and this is approved, since the eating of the wheat comprehends the chewing of it, in the common form of Metonymy, as where a man vows that he will not set his foot in the house of such a person, and afterwards enters that house, in which case he is forsworn, whether he rides into the house, or goes in on foot.

If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not eat of this flour," and he should afterwards eat bread made thereof, he is forsworn: because flour is not eaten in its simple state, and hence it is construed to mean such articles of food as are prepared from it.—If, on the contrary, he were to eat the actual flour, he is not forsworn; and this is approved; because here it is certain that the words were intended in their metonymical sense, and with that sense the eating of flour in its simple state does not accord.—

If a person swear that "he will not eat bread," by this is to be understood, such bread as is commonly eaten in that place; and this is, in general, either wheaten or barley bread, one or other of which is almost universally used. If, also, the swearer should eat walnut or almond bread in Irak* he is not forsworn; because such bread is not common in that region; whereas, if he were to eat such bread in Tabristan, or any other place where it is the usual diet, he would violate his vow.

If a person swear that "he will not eat Shawa" (or stew), then the oath relates to the flesh of the stew, and not to the vegetables or eggs that may be mixed with it; because the term Shawa means the meat of the stew, and is therefore to be construed in its literal meaning, unless where the swearer may have intended by the word Shawa to express and include the above-mentioned articles also, when the abstinence ought to be conformable to the intention.

If a person swear that "he will not eat Tabbeekh" (or boiled meat), his vow respects boiled flesh.† This proceeds upon a favourable construction of the law, according to general usage; and the ground of it is, that the unrestricted sense of Tabbeekh cannot be admitted on account that this would preclude the vower from the use both of food and of medicine, which is not his design. The term Tabbeekh, therefore, is here construed to mean the particular thing usually understood by it (namely, flesh cooked in water), unless where the intention of the vower may have extended farther, as if he were to declare that he meant thereby every species of boiled provisions,—for here this declaration is to be credited, since this is a violence to himself, and a man is empowered to inflict penalties upon himself. If, moreover, in this case, the vower were to sup of the broth of flesh-meat he is forsworn, because it partakes of the quality of flesh, and broth is also termed Tabbeekh, wherefore he would be forsworn, "as having eaten Tabbeekh."

If a person vow that "he will not eat any Ras" (head), by this is to be understood the head of an animal, as usually prepared for cookery, and exposed to sale.—It is written in the Jama Sagheer, that if a person swear that he will not eat Ras, by this is understood the heads of cows, bullocks, and goats, according to Haneefa;—but that the two disciples hold it restricted to the heads of goats.—This diversity of opinion, however, arises solely from the difference of times; for in the time of Haneefa the word Ras was used to express the heads of both kinds; but in the time of the two disciples, the heads of ‡ Tabbeekh literally means boiled; in common usage it signifies boiled flesh; but according to its literal meaning, the term might equally well be applied to any other food.—This whole case turns upon the express and generally accepted meaning of the word.

goats only ; and in our times, decrees are issued according to whatever may be customary in conformity with general usage, as is mentioned in the abridgment of Kadooree.

If a person vow that "he will not eat Fakiha,"* and he should afterwards eat of oranges, citrons, dates, pomegranates, or cucumbers, he is not forsworn; but if he should eat apples, melons, or apricots, he violates his vow.—This is according to Haneefa.—The two disciples say that he is also forsworn if he eat oranges, dates, or citrons. In short, Fakiha is a term used to express things introduced as a delicacy before or after meals (that is, such things as are indulged in as a delicacy over and above the common food); and it is the same whether the fruit of which it is composed be dried, or in the natural state, provided it be thus indulged in, in both ways (for the vower would not be forsworn by eating dried melons, which it is not common to use as a superfluous delicacy), and this is the case with apples, melons, and apricots, wherefore he would be forsworn by eating them; but it is not the case with cucumbers and citrons, as these are considered merely as vegetables in buying and selling, and also in eating;—in buying and selling, as they are sold by green-sellers;—and in eating, as they are, at the time of meals, set along with other vegetables; wherefore the vower is not forsworn by eating cucumbers or citrons. With respect, however, to oranges, dates, and citrons, there is a difference of opinion, as above mentioned;—for the two disciples maintain that by eating of those the vower is forsworn, as the description of Fakiha is applicable to them, since they are the most rare of all delicacies, and a higher treat than any other: but he is not forsworn, according to Haneefa, because oranges and dates are eaten as food, and men eat citrons also as a medicine; wherefore the description of Fakiha is incomplete, since they are used for the support of life; and hence it is that when dried they are used in cookery.

If a person vow that "he will not eat Idam," by this is to be understood anything which is usually eaten in bread; thus Kabobs are not considered as Idam, whereas salt is supposed to come under the denomination.—This is according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf: but Imam Mohammed says that whatever is most commonly eaten along with bread is to be regarded as Idam (and there is also an opinion recorded from Aboo Yoosaf to this effect), because Idam is derived from Mowademit, or congeniality, and such articles are usually eaten with bread as are agreeable and congenial thereto, such as simple flesh, fowls, and so forth.—

* Fakiha is said, in the lexicons, to mean fruit; it in reality means any superfluous delicacy which does not come under the denomination of food, and this generally consists of fruit.

The argument of Haneefa herein is that Idam implies that which is eaten as a dependant, and dependancy is actually found in a case of admixture where it stands in the place of bread; and it virtually exists where the article used is of such a nature as never to be eaten alone. With respect to what Aboo Yoosaf alleges of Idam being derived from Mowademit, or congeniality, it may be replied that such congeniality is completely found in admixture:—and vinegar, or other similar fluids, are never eaten alone, but mixed with bread or other food; and salt, also, is not usually eaten alone; and it, moreover, is liable to melt; wherefore it is a dependant (contrary to the case of flesh, and other corresponding substances, which are frequently eaten alone):—and hence, by eating these, the vower is not forsworn, unless where he intends such articles in his vow, for this is a violence to himself, and a man is empowered to inflict penalties upon himself. It is to be observed that oranges and dates are not considered as Idam: this is approved.

If a person make a vow that "he will not eat Ghadd" [dinner], by this is understood eating at any time from daybreak till noon; as by Asha [supper], is understood what is eaten between meridian prayer and midnight, because any time after the sun's declination from the meridian is the time of Asha. Some assert that this was the distinction among the ancients; but that with the moderns the time of Asha is from afternoon prayer; and the morning meal is that which may be eaten between midnight and daybreak, because the morning is from midnight until daybreak.—It is to be observed that where a person makes a vow against eating dinner or supper, a full and entire meal is to be understood of either, such as is customary: this will, of course, be regulated by the usual quantity of those meals in different countries respectively; but, to violate the vow, more than half the usual quantity must be eaten.

If a man make a vow, saying, "if I clothe myself, or eat, or drink, my slave is free," and he should explain his intention, in the first of these articles, to regard a particular kind of cloth only, his declaration is not to be credited either with respect to a decree of the Kazee, or in a religious view (and the same is to be observed with respect to the two other articles of eating and drinking); because intention is not approved unless it be expressed, and the cloth, or so forth, are not mentioned in the vow.—If a man, also, were to make a vow, saying, "if I put on a robe," or "eat food," or "drink wine,—my slave is free," and he afterwards say that he meant this robe and not that robe, or so forth, his declaration is not to be credited in point of law: but it is credited in a religious view, because the words robe, food, and wine, are here mentioned; but yet an intention of discrimination with respect to them contradicts appearances, wherefore his declaration is not to be credited as far as regards a decree of the Kazees.*

Vows respecting drinking out of a fountain or vessel.—If a person were to make a vow that "he would not drink out of such a fountain," and afterwards lift water out of the fountain in a cup, and drink, he is not forsworn,—nor unless he lift it with his mouth [that is, drink it without a vessel], in which case he would be forsworn.—The two disciples say he is forsworn if he drink it out of a cup, as this is the usual mode of drinking. Haneefa's arguments are deduced from the Arabic.

If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not drink of the water of such a fountain," and afterwards drink the water of the fountain out of a vessel, he is forsworn, because the water of the fountain, after being taken up and drank, is still referred to the fountain, which is the condition, he is therefore forsworn as much as if he were to drink water out of a stream which runs from the fountain.

If a man make a vow, saying, "if I do not drink, this day, of the water which is in this vessel, my wife is divorced," and it should so happen that there is no water in it, he is not forsworn; and so also (according to Haneefa and Mohammed) if there be water in the vessel, and it should chance to be spilled before the night of that day, Abou Yoosaf says that he is forsworn, in either case, upon the close of that day;—and the same difference of opinion subsists where a man makes a vow to God (that is, where he says, "by God I will drink of the water which is in this cup this day"); for it is a rule with Abou Yoosaf that the possibility of fulfilling the vow is not a condition, either of the obligation of the vow, or of its continuance;—whereas, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, the possibility of fulfilment is a condition of the obligation of the vow, and also of its continuance, because a vow is taken with a view to its accomplishment, and it is therefore requisite that the accomplishment be possible and conceivable, so as to be obligatory.—The argument of Abou Yoosaf is, that although the accomplishment of the vow be impossible, yet its substitute (namely, expiation) is possible, wherefore such a vow may be lawfully taken, inasmuch as it is the occasion of expiation: but to this we reply that it is requisite that the original act be practicable, so as to render the taking of the vow valid, since, if the original act be practicable, how can the vow be taken so as to give occasion for a substitute?—and hence it is that a Yameen Ghamoos (or false-oath made respecting a thing already past) cannot be taken in such a manner as to occasion expiation.—If, moreover, in the case now under consideration, the words "this day" should not have been mentioned, but the vow be general, as if the man had said, "if I drink not of the water in this vessel, my wife is divorced," and there should happen to be no water in the vessel, he is not forsworn, according to Haneefa and Mohammed: but with Abou Yoosaf he is forsworn, upon the instant.—But if there be water in the cup at the time of speaking, and it be spilled before night, the vower is forsworn, according to all our doctors.—Abou Yoosaf makes a distinction between an unrestricted and a restricted case; for he says that, in the restricted case, the vower is forsworn after the day is closed; but, in the unrestricted case, he is forsworn the instant he ceases from speaking; the reason of which distinction is that, as the specification of a time is made for the purpose of extension, the act does not become absolutely incumbent until the last instant of the time; and hence the vower is not forsworn until then; but in the unrestricted case, the fulfilment is incumbent on the instant the person ceases from speaking, which, being impossible, the vower is forsworn on the instant.—Haneefa and Imam Mohammed also make a distinction between the restricted and the unrestricted case; for they say that where the vow is general, and there is water in the vessel, and it happens to be spilled, the vower is forsworn; but not where the vow is restricted; the reason of which distinction is that, in the unrestricted case, the fulfilment is incumbent on the instant the person ceases from speaking; and the fulfilment being defeated, by the thing no longer remaining, respecting which the vow was taken, the vower is forsworn, because the thing vowed is in this case defeated subsequently to the time when fulfilment was incumbent; in the same manner as if the vower should happen to die, and the water remain in the cup, in which case he would be forsworn:—but, where the vow is restricted, the accomplishment is not absolutely incumbent, until the last instant of the time specified; but the accomplishment is then impossible, because the water, which was the subject of it, no longer remains; and where the accomplishment is no longer possible, it is not incumbent; wherefore the vow becomes null, as much as if there were no water whatever in the vessel.

A vow made respecting an absolute impossibility is held as violated upon the instant.—If a person make a vow, saying, "I will, by some means or other, ascend to heaven," or, "I will, some how, convert this stone into gold," this constitutes a vow,* and the vower

* That is, if a man, having made such a vow, were afterwards to perform any of the acts therein specified, pleading that he made his vow under a restrictive intention, and that the articles he has eaten or drank, or the robe he has put on, were meant as exceptions therefrom, the possibility of the truth of this declaration is to be admitted; but yet the Kazees (who can judge only from appearances) must decree the emancipation of the slave.

* Arab. Yoonakido-al-Yameeno, the vow is forthwith forsworn.—Ziffer says that this does not constitute a vow, since ascending to heaven, or turning stone into gold, are impracticable, in the usual nature of things, and therefore are the same as things actually impossible.—The argument of our doctors is, that the fulfilment is here actually practicable, because it certainly is possible to ascend to heaven, as we know that the angels of God ascend the skies: and in the same manner it is possible that a stone may be converted into gold by the Almighty exerting his power for that purpose: now the thing vowed being possible, the vow is contracted so far as to give occasion for expiation; and the vower is forthwith forsworn, because of his inability, in the ordinary nature of things, to execute the thing which he has undertaken; in the same manner as if a vower were to die before the accomplishment of his vow, in which case he would be forsworn, although it be possible that he may yet be restored to life: contrary to the case of the vessel of water, because the drinking of the water undertaken to be drank is not possible in either of those cases, and therefore the vow is null.

CHAPTER VII.

OF VOWS WITH RESPECT TO SPEAKING AND CONVERSING.

A vow against speaking to such a person is violated by speaking to him within hearing distance, although he be asleep.—If a person make a vow, saying, “I will not speak to such an one,” and he should afterwards speak to that person while asleep, from such a distance as may be within his hearing, he is forsworn; because he has spoken to that person, and the words have reached his ears; although, in consequence of being asleep, he may not have heard them, and it is therefore the same as if he had called to that person from a place within his hearing, and the person be not sensible of his addressing him through inattention. In some passages of the Mabsoot it is said that it is conditional to the violation of the vow that the person sleeping be awaked by the words spoken (and in this opinion our doctors coincide): because, if he be not awakened, it is the same as if the speaker had called to him from a place so distant as not to be within hearing, in which case he would not be forsworn, and so here likewise.

Case in which the violation of the vow depends upon the meaning of the terms used in it.—If a man make a vow that, “he will not speak to such an one without his permission,” and the person mentioned should permit him to speak accordingly, but the vower be not certified thereof until after he shall have spoken to him, he is forsworn; because the term Izn [permission] is derived from the word Azan, which signifies indication; or if it signifies a thing received by the ears, which can only be done by hearing, Abou Yoosaf says that he is not forsworn, because Izn signifies licence, which is fully understood by tacit consent alone; that is (like the will), it does not depend upon anything else: for instance, if one were to swear that “he would not speak to such a person without his will,” and the person should will his speaking to him, but the vower be not certified thereof until after he has spoken, yet he is not forsworn, because the will is fully established by the person being merely willing, and does not depend upon anything else. But to this we reply that the will is merely an act of the mind, whereas Izn is not merely so, for the reasons above stated.

Case of a vow against conversing with a person for a specified time.—If a person make a vow, saying, “I will not speak to such an one for a month,” it is to be understood from the time of making such vow, because if he were not to mention the words for a month, the vow would take place as a perpetual relinquishment of converse with the person mentioned; the mention of a month, therefore, is for the purpose of excluding from the vow anything beyond one month, and hence that which is connected with the vow must be included in the vow, from the argument of the state in which it is pronounced, as being a state of anger, since the reason for the observance of the vow is the anger which occurs to the vower at that instant, for which reason converse with the person mentioned is prevented from that instant. It would be otherwise if a man should say, “by God I will fast for a month,” because, if the words “for a month,” were not mentioned, yet the vow would not take place as inducing a perpetual fast; the mention of a month, therefore, is merely for the purpose of restricting the fast to a month; and as the month is indefinite, and not specified, the specification of it is left to the vower.

Repetition of prayer, &c., at the stated seasons, does not violate a vow of silence.—If a man make a vow that “he will not speak,” and he afterwards read the Koran at the stated periods of devotion, he is not forsworn; but if he should, at any other time, read the Koran, he is forsworn. The same rule also holds with respect to the Tasbeeh,* Tahleel,† and Takbeer;‡—that is

* Calling upon the name of God in prayer by saying, “BEESM ALLAH! in the name of God.”

† Repeating the Kalma, or creed, “THERE IS NO GOD BUT GOD, &c.”

‡ Magnifying God (in prayer) by saying, “ALLAHOO AKBERO!” [God is the greatest].

to say, if he repeat any of these at the stated time of prayer, he is not forsworn; but if he should repeat them at any other time, he violates his vow. This proceeds upon a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest that the vower is forsworn in either case (and such is the opinion of Shafei), because reading the Koran, or repeating the Tasbeeh, and so forth, are all actual exertions of the speaking faculty.—The argument of our doctors is that prayer does not come under the description of speech, either generally, or in the construction of the law, the prophet having said, “these prayers which I teach are not capable of being construed as containing any of the words of men.”—Some have said that in our days the vower would not be forsworn, even at any other time than the stated periods of prayer, because the person who repeats those things is not said to be speaking, but reciting; and decrees pass accordingly.

A vow made respecting the day extends to the night also.—If a man were to say, “on the day [Yawm] upon which I speak to such an one, his wife is divorced,”* this extends both to the day and the night, because the word day, where it comes in context with a thing which is not a matter of continuance, mea is time generally; and as speaking to a person is not a matter of continuance, by the word day, is to be here understood time in general.—But if the swearer should declare that his intention in the vow was confined to the daytime in particular, his declaration must be credited with the Kazeer, because the term Yawm is used also in this sense.—It is recorded from Abou Yoosaf that his declaration is not to be credited with the Kazeer, as it is contradictory to general usage.—But if the vower should, in the place of the word day, use the word night, by saying, “on the night [Lail] on which I converse” (and so forth), by this is to be understood night only, because the positive meaning of the term Lail is night, in the same manner as the positive meaning of the term Nihar is day; but no instance is known of Lail being used to express time generally.

Case of a vow of inhibition restricted to a particular occurrence.—If a person say, “if I speak to Zeyd, unless a certain person come, his wife is divorced,” and he should afterwards converse with Zeyd, before the coming of the other person, he is forsworn,—but, if after, he is not forsworn.—In the same manner, if the swearer were to express himself, “if I speak to Zeyd until such an one shall have arrived,” or “unless by permission of such an one,” or “until the permission of such an one,”—“his wife is divorced,” and he should afterwards converse with Zeyd, before the arrival, or before permission obtained, of the other person, he is forsworn;—but, if after, he is not forsworn; because the arrival or permission is the termination of the vow, which remains in force until the termination, but discontinues upon that taking place; and he cannot be forsworn after the vow is completed.—In the case here stated, if the person named should happen to die, the vow ceases: contrary to the opinion of Abou Yoosaf, for with him the vow does not drop, but the vower is forsworn if ever he should speak to Zeyd.—The argument of Haneefah and Mohammed is that the thing prohibited by the tenor of the oath is conversation with Zeyd; and this, by his death, being rendered impossible, the vow drops of course: but with Abou Yoosaf the possibility is not a condition, whence upon the death of Zeyd the vow becomes perpetual.

A vow against conversing with a person described is (in relation to another) not violated by conversing with that person after the description (with respect to the other) is done away.—If a man make a vow, saying, “I will not speak to the slave of such a person,” without intending any particular slave,—or, if he should express his vow, “I will not speak to the wife,” or “the friend of such a person,” and the person should sell his slave, or repudiate his wife, or fall at enmity with his friend, and the vower afterwards converse with either of these, he is not forsworn, because his vow is taken as regarding a circumstance which has its existence in a matter relative to the person named, whether that matter be relation by right of property, as in the case of the slave; or relation by connexion, as in the case of the wife, or the friend; and when that matter no longer remains, the vower cannot be forsworn.—The compiler of this work observes that what is here said is taken from the Jama Sagheer; and other authorities agree with it, in respect to the relation by right of property: but in respect to the relation by connexion the vower would be forsworn, according to Mohammed, because such relation is purely of an indicative nature, and is not to be taken in a restrictive sense, since the case admits the design of the vower to be a renunciation of conversation with those persons, as either of them is capable of being held an enemy, from injuries received, but not because of the relation in which they stand to the person named; the continuance of that relation, therefore, is not a condition; and hence the effect is connected with the identical person of either, as in a case of pointed reference;—that is, if a person say, “I will not converse with this friend, or with this wife, of such a person,” and he should converse with them after the falling out with

* It is to be observed, in this and other similar modes of expression, that the vow is by no means efficient of divorce to the woman mentioned in it, but is considered, with respect to her, as a vague and idle speech, and in itself void, inducing nothing more than an expiation on the part of the person speaking.

the friend, or the divorce of the wife, he is not forsworn; and so here also.—The reason for what is recited in the Jama Sagheer is that it is possible that the design of the vower may be to quit conversing with those persons on account of the relation in which they stand to the person named (whence he has not mentioned them with any pointed reference), and it is also possible that the design may be merely to quit conversing with those persons; thus a doubt exists, whether the relation be the motive to the vow or not; and such being the case, the vower is not forsworn by conversing with any of those persons after the dissolution of the relation in which they stood to the person named.—If, moreover, the man should have made his vow with respect to a person particularly specified, by saying, “I will not converse with this slave of such an one,” or “this wife,” or “this friend” (and so forth), and he should converse with them after the slave shall have been sold, or the wife divorced, or the friend at enmity, he is not forsworn in the case of the slave, but he would be so in the case of the wife or the friend.—This is the doctrine of Hancefa and Abou Yoosaf.—Mohammed says that he is forsworn in the case of the slave likewise; and such also is the opinion of Ziffer. And if a man were to make a vow, saying, “I will not enter into this house of such an one,” or “I will not ride upon this beast of such an one,” and he should enter the house, or ride upon the beast, after the owner has disposed of them, the same difference of opinion prevails among the doctors as is above stated.—The argument of Mohammed and Ziffer is, that the mention of the relation of the slave to his owner is for the purpose of indication; but pointed reference is more forcible, in indication, than the relation, which a thing bears to another, as that altogether obviates doubt; wherefore regard is had to pointed reference alone, and the mention of the relation is nugatory, in the same manner as in the case of the wife or the friend.—The argument of Hancefa and Abou Yoosaf is that the moving cause of the vow, in the case of the slave, the house, or the animal, is some property which is to be found in the person to whom they have reference; because the house or the animal are incapable of being of themselves held in enmity; and so also the slave, as he does not stand in a rank sufficiently respectable to admit his being an object of enmity; wherefore the quitting from converse from those is on account of a property which is to be found in the proprietor of them; and hence the vow is restricted to the continuance of the right of the owner: contrary to a case of relation by connexion, such as the relation of the wife or the friend; as enmity and separation from them may be the design, for which reason the mention of the relation in which they stand to the person named is merely for the purpose of indication; and it is evident that the moving cause of the vow, with respect to them, is some property which is to be found in themselves, and not in the person to whom they have reference; because they are mentioned with a pointed reference: contrary to the case of the slave, the house, or the animal, as in those cases the thing mentioned is incapable of being of itself held in enmity, unless on account of some property to be found in the person in reference to whom it is mentioned, namely, the proprietor.

If a man make a vow, saying, “I will not speak to the owner of this turban,” and the owner of the turban should afterwards sell it, and the vower should thereafter converse with the said person, he is forsworn; because here the mention of the relation of the thing to the person is purely for the purpose of indication, since men do not fall at variance with turbans; and hence it is the same as if he had spoken with a pointed reference to the owner of it, by saying, “I will not speak to this owner of a turban;” in which case he would be forsworn; and so here likewise.

A vow against conversing with such a youth is violated by conversing with him after manhood.—If a person make a vow, saying, “I will not converse with this youth,” and he should afterwards converse with him when he has arrived at an advanced age, he is forsworn; because the effect is connected with the person mentioned; as a descriptive expression is not necessary to specify a person who is present, and the description of youth cannot be considered as the motive to the vow.

Section.

Vows respecting converse, with a reference to time.—If a person make a vow, saying, “I will not converse with such an one for a time” [Hyne]—or “for a space of time” [Ziman], by these modes of expressing time is to be understood six months; because Hyne sometimes means a short space of time, and sometimes forty years; and it also is sometimes used to express a few months;—and the space of six months is a medium between these extremes; wherefore, by the term Hyne is here to be understood six months. The principle upon which this proceeds is that a very small space of time cannot be designed for the prevention of conversation, as prevention may apply to a little space of time, in common usage, wherefore in such a case a vow is unnecessary for prevention; and a very long space of time is not designed for prevention, as that stands as a perpetuity: moreover, if he had omitted all mention of time, by not introducing the word Hyne, his vow would be taken as meaning to quit converse with the person named for ever; but as he mentioned time, it appears that his design is not perpetual; since if it were so, he would have omitted the word Hyne, or have used the word Abid [for ever]; and such being the case, it is ascertained that his intention in the word Hyne is six months:—and so also of the word

Ziman, as that is used in the same sense with Hyne.—What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition that the vower had no particular intention: but if he should have intended to express any particular space of time, it is to be understood according to his intention, because that is the literal meaning of the words aforesaid.*

If a person make a vow in the following terms, saying, "I will not speak to such an one for days" [Ayam]—by the word Ayam is to be understood three days: but if he should use the restricting article, saying,

I will not converse with such an one for the days" [Al-Ayam], by this is understood ten days, according to Haneefa, and a week according to the two disciples. If the vower, also, were to express himself, "I will not speak to such an one for months" [Shoo-hoor], by this is understood ten months, according to Haneefa,—and a year according to the two disciples:—and if he should vow, saying, "I will not converse with him for weeks" [Jooma] or "for years" [Soonatine],—by Jooma (according to Haneefa) is understood ten weeks,—and by Soonatine ten years; but the two disciples understand by either of these the whole life of the swearer. The arguments here, on both sides, are deduced from certain grammatical points in the Arabic.

If a man make a vow with respect to his slave, saying, "if you serve me for many days [Ayamoon Kaseeritoon], you shall become free,"—by many days (according to Haneefa) is understood ten days, because ten is the greatest number comprehended in the term Ayam, which is the plural of Yawm.—The two disciples, on the other hand, say that by the words many days are to be understood seven days only, because anything beyond is an excess. Some have asserted that if a man were to make this vow in the Persian tongue, by many days is understood seven, with all our doctors; because in the Persian language there is no difference between more than ten days and less than ten, for men say, "ten days or more," without expressing day in the plural.†

* Some grammatical controversy here follows respecting the word Dehr, which does not admit of an intelligible translation.

† This and the preceding case turn upon certain points of grammar. In the Arabic language are four sorts of plurals, which are termed plurals of paucity: some of the commentators suppose (with Haneefa) that this species of plural expresses any number up to ten, whilst others maintain (with Mohazmed) that the utmost number which can be expressed by it is seven. In the Persian language a noun is always expressed in the singular when preceded by a plural numeral, although it consequently has a plural signification.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF VOWS IN MANUMISSION AND DIVORCE.

Divorce vowed on condition of the birth of a child takes place although the child be still-born.—If a man say to his wife,* "whenever you bring forth a child you shall become divorced," and she should afterwards be delivered of a dead child, divorce takes place upon her; and in the same manner, if a man say to his female slave, "whenever you bring forth a child, you shall become free," and she should afterwards be delivered of a dead child, she becomes free;—because the condition (namely, childbearing) is fulfilled, as an infant, though stillborn, is yet actually a child, and it is also termed a child by general usage. Regard is moreover had, in law, to such a birth, whence it is that the Edit is accomplished by it: and the discharge which follows the birth of a dead child is termed Nifas, as well as that which follows the birth of a living child: and in the same manner the mother of such a child, where she happens to be a slave, and her owner acknowledges the child, becomes an Am-Walid.

Freedom vowed in favour of a child that may be born of a female slave, takes place on her first live-born child.—If a man say to his female slave, "whenever you bring forth a child, that child is free," and she be afterwards delivered, first of one child dead, and again of another child living, in this case the living child alone is free,—that is to say, that one is free, but no other who may be born afterwards.—This is the doctrine of Haneefa. The two disciples say that no child whatever is emancipated, because the condition of the vow has already taken place in the birth of the dead child, for the reasons stated in the preceding case; and hence the vow is dissolved, without its consequence, (that is, the vow is accomplished and done away, without its consequence taking place),—as the dissolution of a vow does not depend upon the induction of its consequence: thus if a man were to say to his wife, "if you go into such a house you are divorced," and she enter that house after having been repudiated by a complete divorce, and her Edit be past, the vow is dissolved without its consequence; and so also in the present instance, as a dead child is not a proper subject of manumission.—The argument of Haneefa is that the term Walid [a child] as expressed in the vow, although it be applicable to one born dead, yet in the present case is restricted to the description of living, because the design of the vower is to bestow freedom upon a child, and as this is a power by virtue of which the despotic authority of others over the person endowed with it is removed, it cannot possibly be established in one who is dead. The term Walid, therefore, expressed in the vow, is restricted to the living description; in the same manner as where a master says to his female slave, "whenever you are delivered of a living child, such child is free," and the slave is delivered of a dead child, and afterwards produces a living one;—in which case this living one is free; and so here likewise.—It is otherwise where divorce or manumission has been suspended upon the birth of a child, for there the divorce or manumission so suspended takes place: as in this instance it is not requisite that the birth be restricted to the living description, since the life of the child is not necessary to the divorce of the wife, or the manumission of the slave.

* In this and all the corresponding cases, the form of the vow, although omitted here for the sake of brevity, is always to be understood as preceding the sentence, thus, "BY GOD, whenever you bring forth, &c.," or, "I vow, Whenever, &c."

Case of a vow of freedom to the first purchased slave.—If a man say, "the first slave that I purchase is free," and he should afterwards buy a slave, such slave is free, because the word first points to the prior single slave, which applies in this instance: but if the vower, in such a case, were to purchase two slaves together, and afterwards a third, none of these slaves is free, because singularity does not apply to the third slave, wherefore he is not the first. If, however, this man had said, "the first slave that I purchase singly is free," the third slave would be liberated, because here the vower has intended singularity at the time of purchase, and this one is the first with respect to such singularity.

Case of a vow of freedom to a last purchased slave.—If a man say, "the last slave that I buy is free," and he should purchase a slave, and then die, yet the slave so purchased is not free; because the term the last applies to the individual adjunct, and as no other has preceded this one, he cannot be considered as adjunct; but if the vower were to die after having purchased another slave, this slave is free, as being the individual adjunct. It is to be observed that this second slave is free (according to Haneefa) from the day of purchase; and being free from the date of the purchase, the same is regarded as from the whole of the property of the deceased, on account of his having released him during health.—The two disciples say that he is emancipated upon the death of that person, and hence it is regarded as from the third of his property only, on account of the deceased having emancipated him upon his deathbed: for they argue that the posteriority of that slave cannot be fully established, until such time as it becomes certain that no other can be purchased after him; and this cannot possibly be determined but by death; hence the condition is found upon the master's decease, and the freedom of the slave is therefore also established upon that event. The argument of Haneefa is that the posteriority of the slave is ascertained by the master's decease, but the description of posteriority applies to him from the period of the purchase.—The suspension of a triplicate divorce upon posteriority is also subject to the same difference of opinion;—in other words, if a man vow, "the last woman I marry shall be thrice divorced," and he first marry one woman, and afterwards another, and then die, three divorces take place upon the second wife, according to Haneefa, insomuch that she cannot inherit of the deceased: but according to the two disciples the three divorces take place upon her from the day of her husband's decease, and consequently she does inherit of him.

Case of a vow of freedom to whoever of his slaves shall congratulate the vower on the birth of a child.—If a man say, "whoever of my slaves congratulates me upon the delivery of my wife shall be free," and afterwards several of his slaves successively should inform him of his wife's delivery, the one who first brought him the intelligence only is free; because by Bisharit [which is here rendered congratulation] is meant any intelligence which works a change upon the countenance, whether that intelligence be agreeable or otherwise (but yet in common usage, it is requisite that the intelligence be agreeable), and this description is fully found only in the first intelligence,—not in the second, or third, because no change is by that wrought upon the countenance.—If, however, the slaves all bring him news together, they are all free, as the Bisharit then proceeds equally from all.

The emancipation of a slave, in consequence of a vow, does not suffice for expiation.—If a man were to say, "if I purchase a slave he shall be free," and he afterwards purchase a slave, with a view, by his release, to effect the expiation of a vow, this does not suffice for expiation; because it is requisite that the intention of expiation be associated with the occasion of manumission, which is not the case here, as the vow is the cause of manumission in the present case, and at the time of making it expiation was not the intention of the vower; and as to the purchase of the slave, that is not the occasion of the manumission, but rather the condition of it.

But the emancipation of a father, in consequence of purchase, suffices.—If a man purchase, as a slave, his own father, with a view to the expiation of a vow, it suffices, with our doctors. This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer and Shafei, who contend that the act of purchasing a father is the condition of manumission, and not the occasion of it, as the occasion of it is relationship (for purchase is an establishment of right of property, and manumission is a destruction of that right, and each of these is repugnant to the other, wherefore it is impossible that purchase should be the occasion of manumission); and it thus appearing that the cause of the manumission is relationship and not purchase, the intention of the manumission is not associated with the cause of it.—The argument of our doctors is that the purchase is blended with the manumission, as the prophet has said, “no child makes so effectual a return to his parent as one who, finding his parent the slave of another, purchases, and thereby emancipates him,”—which proves that the prophet constituted the purchase itself a manumission, as there is here no other condition of manumission except purchase, according to all the doctors.

The emancipation (by purchase), of a female slave, by a person to whom she stands in the relation of an Am-Walid, does not—re.—If a man purchase, as a slave, a woman who has borne him a child, with a view to the expiation of a vow, it does not suffice.—The nature of this case is thus. A man marries the female slave of another, and she produces a child to him, and he says to her, “if I at any time hereafter purchase you, you shall become free, as an expiation of my vow,” and he afterwards purchase her, when the woman becomes forthwith released, because of the occurrence of the condition upon which her emancipation was suspended; but this does not suffice for the expiation of a vow, because the slave is a claimant of freedom in virtue of Istecad,* and hence her freedom is not purely in consequence of the vow, and therefore does not suffice for the expiation of a vow.—This case is contrary to one where a man says to a female slave, who has not borne a child to him, “if I purchase you, you shall become free as an expiation for my vow,” and he afterwards purchase her; for in this case the slave becomes free, and her freedom suffices for an expiation of his vow, because the slave is not in this instance a claimant of freedom on any other ground, she being emancipated purely in consequence of the vow, and not of anything else; and the intention of expiation is found associated with the occasion of the manumission;—she is therefore emancipated; and it suffices for an expiation.

Case of a vow of freedom to a female slave on condition of concubinage.—If a man say, “if I make a concubine of a female slave, she shall be free,” and he should afterwards make a concubine of any female slave, his own property, she is free accordingly; because the vow has been taken with respect to that slave, she being the property of the vower.—The principle upon which this proceeds is founded on the grammatical construction of the vower's words in the original Arabic; and it is accounted for thus:—the expression “a female slave,” in the case in question, is indefinite, and an indefinite noun is comprehended, in an instance of prohibition, in the way of general individuality: * now here this expression stands in the place of a prohibition, with regard to the design (as the design of the vower is to prohibit himself from concubinage), and such being the case, the expression “a female slave” applies to every slave individually.—If, however, the vower were to purchase a slave, and make her his concubine, she does not become free.—This is contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, for he maintains that she also becomes emancipated; because, as it is not allowed to a man to make a concubine of any woman who is not his property, it follows that the mention of concubinage is equivalent to the mention of a right of property; being the same as if a man were to say to the wife of another, “if I divorce you, my slave is free,” which is equivalent to his saying, “if I marry you, and afterwards divorce you,”—and so forth;—because, as divorce cannot take place without property by marriage, the mention of divorce may be said to amount to a mention of marriage;—and so also in the present case.—The arguments of our doctors on this point are, that a vow of manumission is not of any effect, excepting in a case of actual right of property, or where it is referred, either to the right of property itself, or to the cause of the right; and not one of these is found in the present case. There is no actual right of property, evidently; nor is there any reference to the right of property, as the vower did not say, “if I become possessed of a female slave, and make that slave my concubine:” nor is there any reference to a cause of right, as the vower has referred only to concubinage, and that is not a cause of right of property in a slave, because Hamefa and Mohammed define concubinage (Tasiree) to signify merely “a man's keeping his slave up, and providing a dwelling for her, and preventing her from going abroad, and having carnal connexion with her, whether he claim the children born of her or not;” (Abou Yoosaf holds that the claim of children is also a condition, as a concubine is, in general usage, one whose children are claimed);—and no one of these particulars is a cause of right of property.—Yet a right of property being requisite to concubinage, must, in the present instance, be taken for granted, as an essential, from the necessity of the concubinage (which is the condition) being legal: this right of property, however, is taken for granted only so far as is necessary, and does not appear with respect to the consequence (namely, emancipation), because whatever is established merely from necessity, does not pervade beyond the point of necessity. With respect to the example of divorce, cited by Ziffer, it may be replied that the consequence induced (namely, emancipation) is there admitted only on account of the vow being made with respect to actual property (for the slave is at the time the property of the vower); and the marriage, which is there taken for granted, as a necessary inference, is so only with respect to the condition (namely, divorce), but not with respect to the consequence; inasmuch that if the man were to say to the strange woman, "if I divorce you, you are divorced thence," and he afterwards marry her, and divorce her, yet three divorces do not take place, as the condition had not been declared either under an actual right of property, or in reference to such right, as to the cause of it:—this case, therefore, is analogous to the case in question, for this reason, that in both of them the establishment of the condition is merely for the purpose of admitting that, but does not pervade to the admission of the consequence.

A general vow of freedom to slaves includes every description of them.—If a man say, "every person my property is free," his Am-Walids, and Modabbirs, and Abids, all become free accordingly, because the reference to a right of property with respect to them is complete, as all these are the actual property of the swearer: but his Mokatibs do not become free, unless such be the intention, because absolute possession does not apply to a Mokatib, whence it is that his master is not the proprietor of his acquisitions, and also that it is not lawful for a master to have carnal connexion with his Mokatiba: contrary to a Modabbira, or Am-Walid: reference to a right of property, therefore, with respect to a Mokatib, is incomplete and deficient, for which reason intention is of a vow of divorce indefinitely expressed.—If a man, having three wives, say of them, "this one is divorced, or this, or this," divorce takes place upon the last wife; and it remains in the choice of the husband to declare any specify which one of the other two should become divorced, whether the first, or the second; because the vow, as above expressed, is the same as if he had said, "one of you two is divorced," and also this one."—The ground of this is found in the grammatical construction of those words in the Arabic.—In the same manner, if a master should say, with respect to three slaves, "this one is free,—or this one,—or this one,"—the last becomes free, and it remains at the option of the master to specify which of the others shall be free, the first or the second.

CHAPTER IX.

OF VOWS IN BUYING, SELLING, MARRIAGE, AND SO FORTH.

A vow against the performance of certain acts is not violated by procuring an agent to perform those acts.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will not sell, or purchase, or hire, or let out at rent," and he should afterwards appoint any person his agent, to buy, or sell, or so forth, he is not forsworn; because the agent is the contractor, and not his constituent, inasmuch that all the rights of the contract appertain to the agent, not to his constituent (whence, if the vower himself were a party to the contract, he would be forsworn); and such being the case, the condition of violation, namely, the contract of the principal, is non-existent, nothing attaching to him, excepting only the effect of the contract, not the contract itself. He is, therefore, not forsworn, excepting where he so intends (as this is injurious to himself), or where the principal is a person of high rank, and consequently is not accustomed himself to make contracts, in which case he would be forsworn by directing another to act for him; because a vow is made for the purpose of restraining from the commission of some customary act; and it is usual for such a person to transact all concerns of purchase or sale by commission; hence where he gives his orders to another respecting such transactions, and the other executes those orders, he is forsworn.

Except in a case of marriage, manumission, or divorce.—If a man make a vow saying, "I will not marry," or "divorce my wife," or "liberate my slave," and he should afterwards commission another person to perform any of these acts for him, by a power of agency, and the said agent do so accordingly, the vower is forsworn; because the agent in such concerns acts merely as the negotiator, or in the manner of a messenger, whence it is that he does not refer such acts to himself, but to his employer, to whom the rights thereof appertain, and not to the agent. Here, however, if the vower were to declare that his intention in the vow was restricted to such marriage, divorce, or manumission, as might be executed by himself alone, yet his declaration is not to be credited with the Kazeer: but it is credited with God.—The reason of this shall be explained in a subsequent case.

Or any act, the rights of which solely appertain to the vower.—If a man make a vow saying, "I will not beat my slave," or "I will not kill my sheep," and he should afterwards order another to do either of these, and the other act accordingly, the vower is forsworn; because a master has authority to beat his own slave, or to slay his own sheep, and is therefore entitled to authorize another to do so; and the advantage thereof results to him; whence he may be said to be himself the executor of either of these acts, because the rights of them do not in any respect appertain to the person so ordered.—But if the vower should explain that his intention was to restrain himself from the performance of such acts as executed by himself, his declaration is to be admitted by the Kazeer: contrary to the preceding case of divorce, &c., where the declaration is not credited by the Kazee. The reason of this difference is that divorce merely signifies a speech which goes to the repudiation of a wife; and a commission to effect divorce resembles such a speech; as the vow therefore extends to both of these, where the vower's intention was that he would not pronounce a divorce himself, he must have intended a particular restraint only, from a thing which was general in its application [his vow], and hence his declaration, although it be admitted with God, is not to be credited by the Kazee, as it contradicts appearances:—but the beating of the slave, or the slaying of the sheep, on the other hand, are perceptible acts, visible in their effects, and are immediately referable to the director of them in the way of an efficient cause (since he is the cause of the beating or slaying), and such being the case, where he intended, by his vow, to restrain himself from the commission of those acts with his own hands, he intended what is the literal meaning of the words of his vow; his declaration, therefore, is credited with God, and with the Kazee also.

Nor by employing another to do the thing, where the advantage results solely to the subject of the vow.—If a man make a vow saying, "I will not beat my child," and he should afterwards order another to beat the child, and the other should beat it accordingly, the vower is not forsworn; because the advantage of the beating, namely, instruction, results to the child, and hence the act of the person directed must not be referred to the director. It is otherwise where a person directs another to beat his slave, for there the advantage (namely obedience) results to the director, in consequence of his order, and hence the act of the person directed may be said to be the act of the director.*

A vow of freedom conditioned upon the sale of a slave takes place on the instant of sale, and the sale is null.—If a person make a vow saying, "if I sell this slave he is free," and he afterwards sell that slave under a condition of option,† he [the slave] is free, because the conditions of his freedom (namely, sale and possession) being both accomplished, the consequence, which is emancipation, takes place; and the sale is null.‡ Thus also, if a person, bargaining for a slave, make a vow saying, "if I buy this slave he shall be free," and he should afterwards buy that slave under a condition of option, the slave is free; because the conditions of his freedom, namely, purchase and possession, are both accomplished.—This, according to the tenets of the two disciples, is evident, because the freedom of the slave is suspended upon the act of purchase, and the condition of option on behalf of the purchaser does not with them prevent the establishment of the purchaser's possession;—and so also, according to the tenets of Haneefa, because the freedom in the case in question is suspended by the suspension of the vower, and a thing suspended becomes the same as a thing prompt, upon the condition being found; and, as if, after purchase, under a condition of option, the buyer were to emancipate his slave promptly, the slave would become free by possession being first established in the purchaser as an essential, so also in the present case.

Divorce suspended upon the not selling of a slave takes place on emancipation or Tadbeer.—If a man make a vow, saying, "if I do not sell this slave (or this bondmaid) my wife is divorced," and he should afterwards emancipate the slave or the bondmaid, or should grant to either a Tadbeer, divorce takes place upon his wife, because the condition, namely, his not selling them, is fully accomplished, as sale cannot now possibly take place, since the slave or bondmaid mentioned, in consequence of the act of manumission or Tadbeer, remain no longer subjects of sale.

A vow of general divorce in reply to a wife charging her husband with bigamy, takes place upon her in the same manner as upon the rest.—If a woman say to her husband, "you have married another woman, in addition to me," and the husband, in reply, make a vow saying, "every wife I have is divorced," a divorce takes place (on the decree of the Kazee) upon the wife who has asserted as above.—This is the Zahir-Rawayet.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the wife here mentioned does not become divorced, because the words of the husband, as above recited, are to be considered merely as a reply to the woman, and must be received as such: moreover, the design of the husband, in so speaking, may be merely to please and soothe his wife; and as this would be effected by the divorce of his other wives, the divorce is restricted to the other wives only.—The ground upon which the Zahir-Rawayet proceeds is that the husband's expression is general, as he has introduced the word "every" (which argues generality), in addition to the simple reply, whence it appears that his intention is generality, and not speciality; and it follows that the sentence must be received as a speech de novo, and not as a reply.—In reply to the arguments of Aboo Yoosaf, it is to be observed that the words of the husband admit of being construed into a design of terrifying and frightening the woman, on account of her having upbraided him with that which it is

* A long case is here omitted, as it is purely of a grammatical nature, turning entirely upon the different effects of the Arabic particle Lam, according to its different position in construction, and consequently does not admit of an intelligible translation.

‡ Consequently the master has no claim for the price stipulated in the sale.

lawful for him to do; and, under such a construction, the restriction to the other wives is not admissible.—If the husband were to declare that his intention respected only the other wives, he is to be credited with God, but not with the Kazeé; because he has intended a particular thing by a general expression, and his words admit of being taken in this sense; but it contradicts appearances; his declaration, therefore, is to be credited in a religious view, but not in point of law.

CHAPTER X.

OUR VOWS RESPECTING PILGRIMAGE, FASTING, AND PRAYER.

Case of a vow of Masha.—If a man make a vow "to perform a Masha [pedestrian pilgrimage] to the temple of God," it is incumbent upon him to perform a pilgrimage to the Kaba on foot,—or that he make the visitation termed Amrit; and if he choose he may ride on his pilgrimage, or Amrit;—but he must in this case perform a sacrifice. This is on a favourable construction of the law. Analogy would suggest that neither pilgrimage nor Amrit are rendered incumbent upon him, he having engaged no farther than to walk to the temple "on foot," which is no incumbent as an act of piety, but is merely an indifferent act; neither is going on for the original design, that being simply the performance of pilgrimage or Amrit.—The reasons for the more favourable construction here are twofold;—FIRST, Alee has declared that, in a vow of this nature, either pilgrimage or Amrit are incumbent upon the swearer;—SECONDLY, from the expression af'osa, either pilgrimage or Amrit are universally understood; and hence it is the same as if he had said, "I owe a visitation to the temple on foot;" wherefore it is incumbent upon him to perform his pilgrimage or Amrit on foot, or that, if he choose to perform it on horseback, he also perform a sacrifice.*

Case of a vow of manumission suspended upon the non-performance of pilgrimage.—If a man make a vow, saying, "if I do not perform a pilgrimage this year, such an one, my slave, is free,"—and after the lapse of that year a dispute should arise between the master and the slave,—the slave alleging that the master had not performed the pilgrimage, and the master alleging that he had performed it, and the slave's witnesses bear testimony in this manner,—"that he master had performed, within that year, a sacrifice at Koofa," the slave (according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf) is not emancipated.—Imam Mohammed says that the slave is emancipated, because the witnesses have testified to the master having performed sacrifice at Koofa, which is a well-known act, and which necessarily implies that he has not performed pilgrimage, and hence the condition of the penalty (namely, non-performance of pilgrimage) is fulfilled.

Case of a vow against fasting.—If a man make a vow that he will not fast, and he should afterwards intend a fast, and keep the same a short time, and then break his fast within the same day, he is forsworn on account of the condition of violation being fulfilled; because the word Sawm [fast] signifies abstinence from those things the use of which breaks a fast kept with a pious intent, which in this case is evident.

Case of a vow against fasting for a day.—If a man make a vow that "he will not fast a day," and he afterwards intend a fast, and observe the same for a few hours (for instance), and then break his fast, he is not forsworn, because he intended such a fast as is regarded in the law, and that is not completed until it be accomplished by the ending of the day; moreover, the full time of a day is expressly mentioned in his words, "I will not fast a day," and therefore it is to be so understood.*

Case of a vow against praying.—If a man make a vow that "he will not pray," and he should after that stand up and perform Kiraat [reading the Koran], or Rookoo [a submissive posture used in prayer], he is not forsworn; but if he perform the Soojda along with those other ceremonies, he is forsworn. This proceeds upon a favourable construction.—The suggestion of analogy is that he would be forsworn in consequence of beginning to pray, from the correspondence of this with a case of fasting; that is, if a man make a vow that "he will not fast," and he should afterwards keep a religious fast, he would be forsworn upon the commencement of it; and so also in the present case. The reason of this is that a person, upon beginning to pray, is termed a Moosillee, or praying person, in the same manner as one beginning a religious fast is termed a Sayim, or faster; but the reason for a more favourable construction is that a prayer implies and includes a variety of ceremonies, such as standing, kneeling, and prostration;—and hence, until the whole of these be performed, it is not termed prayer: contrary to fasting, as that consists of only one single observance, namely, abstinence.

If a man vow that "he will not perform prayer according to the ordinance of the law," he will not be forsworn upon praying, until he come to that part of the ceremony which requires the second genuflection; because, by the above mode of expression he appears to mean that kind of prayer is regarded in the law; and the smallest degree which constitutes that is two genuflections, as the prophet has forbidden short or interrupted prayer.

* Most of the expressions here treated of are to be fully understood only in the original idiom; hence much of the reasoning upon them is lost in a translation. Two other cases are here omitted for the same reason, and also because the rights of individuals are no way concerned in them.

CHAPTER XI.

OF VOWS RESPECTING CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS.

Vow of a husband against wearing cloth of his wife's manufacture.—If a man make a vow, saying to his wife, “if I put on any of your work (that is, cloth made of thread of your spinning), such cloth is Hiddee (that is, an offering at the shrine of the prophet),” and that man should afterwards buy cotton, and his wife spin it into thread, and of that thread cloth be woven, and the man put on the same, it is incumbent on him (according to Haneefa) to make an offering thereof at Mecca. The two disciples have asserted that it is not incumbent upon the vower, in the case in question, to make an offering of his cloth, unless where the thread has been spun of cotton which was his [the vower's] property at the time of his making the vow; for they contend that a Noozr, or devoting vow, is not valid, unless it respect actual property, or be pronounced in a way which has reference to the cause of a right of property; and neither of these are existent in this case, as the vower putting on the cloth, or the woman spinning the thread of which it is composed, are not causes of a right of property to the vower. The argument of Haneefa is that it is customary for a wife to spin her husband's cotton, and whatever is customary, the same is meant and intended; and the act of the wife, in spinning the cloth, is a cause of the husband's right in it; * here, therefore, appears a reference of the Noozr, or devoting vow, to the cause of a right of property, wherefore the vow is valid; and hence the vower is forsworn upon the wife spinning cotton which was his property at the time of the vow.†

If a man make a vow that “he will not sleep on such a bed,” and he should afterwards sleep thereon, it having a sheet, blanket, quilt, or so forth, spread over it, he is forsworn; because such covering is also an appurtenance to the bed, and hence sleeping on the covering may be said to be sleeping on such bed. But if another bed be laid upon the bed which is the subject of the vow, and the swearer sleep thereupon, he is forsworn, because a thing cannot be an appurtenance to a similar thing, and hence sleeping upon this bed is not to be accounted sleeping upon the other.

If a person swear that “he will not sit upon the ground,” and he should afterwards sit upon a carpet or mat spread thereon, he is not forsworn; because a person in such case is not said to be sitting on the ground. It is otherwise where the skirts of his garment only are between the ground and him, as his garment is merely an appurtenance to himself, and hence is not to be considered as the thing upon which he sits.

If a man vow that “he will not sit upon such a seat,” and he should afterwards sit thereupon when there is a covering spread upon it, he is forsworn; because the person who sits upon that covering is considered as the occupier of that seat, in common usage as this is the usual way of sitting upon a bench, or other raised seat. It is otherwise where the seat which is the subject of the vow has another seat set over it, and the vower sits upon the upper seat, for then he is not forsworn, because the second seat is a fellow to the first, and a thing cannot be an appurtenance to a similar thing (as has been already observed); sitting upon the second seat, therefore, is not to be accounted the same as sitting upon the first, which was the subject of the vow.

CHAPTER XII.

OF VOWS CONCERNING STRIKING, KILLING, AND SO FORTH.

A vow made against striking a person is not violated by striking that person when dead; and the same of a vow against clothing.

—If a person make a vow, saying [to another], “if I strike you, my slave is free,” and the vower should strike that man after his death, he is not forsworn; because striking is restricted to life, as being the name of an action which gives pain, and excites the feelings of the person struck, which is not possible with the dead. So also, if a man were to say to another, “if I clothe you, my slave is free,” and he should after his death clothe him, he is not forsworn; because by clothing, when it is indefinitely expressed, is meant a complete transfer of property in the article of clothing, and this transfer cannot be made to a defunct; unless when the vower by clothing simply meant covering, in which case he would be forsworn, for here he intends his words in a sense which they are capable of bearing. (Some doctors say that, if a person were to make a vow in the Persian tongue, saying to another, “if I clothe you,

* According to the Mussulman law, any change wrought in the descriptive quality of goods (such as turning cotton into thread), causes in itself a transfer of the property from the former proprietor to the person who makes or effects such change in it, independent of any previous contract of purchase, the person to whom such transfer of property is made remaining responsible to the original proprietor for the value of the goods in their former state. (See Usurpation of Property.)

† Here follows a long but very frivolous case of vows against wearing Hooleea [superfluous ornaments] omitted in the translation, as it turns entirely upon the acceptance of the term Hooleea, which has been held to consist of different articles at different times, my slave is free," and he should clothe that person after his death, he is forsworn; because by this, in the vulgar idiom, is meant simply covering.)

Speaking to, going to.—In the same manner, if a man were to make a vow, saying to another, "if I speak to you, my slave is free," or, "if I come to you," and so forth, and he should speak to, or go to, that person after his death, yet he is not forsworn; because the intent of speaking is to impart ideas, which death prevents the possibility of; and "coming to the dead" implies a Zecarrit, or visitation, which is not to the dead, but to the shrine or Mausoleum of the dead.

Or washing a person.—If a man make a vow, saying to another, "if I wash you, my slave is free," and he should wash that person after his death, he is forsworn; because to wash simply signifies to ablute with a view to purification, which takes place in the ablution of the dead.

A vow against beating is violated by any act which causes pain, unless that act be committed in sport.—If a man make a vow that "he will not beat his wife," and he afterwards pull her hair, or seize her by the throat, or bite her with his teeth, he is forsworn; because beating is the term for an act which causes pain, and pain is excited by the acts in question. Some have asserted that if these acts are done in the course of mutual playing and dalliance, the vower is not forsworn, because under such circumstances these bear the construction of jests, and not of beating.

Vow of slaying a person who is already dead incurs the penalty.—If a man say, "if I do not slay such an one, my wife is divorced," and the person mentioned be not living, and the vower himself know this, he is forsworn; because he here makes his vow respecting that life with which God may inspire the deceased anew; and as this is possible, his vow stands valid; and he is then forsworn, because the slaying of that person is in the common course of things impossible. If, however, the vower be not aware of that person's being already deceased, he is not forsworn, because he has here made his vow respecting that life which he supposes to be existing in such a person, but which, in the common course of things, is no longer conceivable. There is a diversity of opinion between Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf concerning this case, from the analogy it bears to the case of the vessel of water; that is, if a man were to vow, "if I do not drink out of this cup my wife is divorced," and there should happen to be no water in the cup, he is not forsworn, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, on account of the invalidity of the vow, from the impossibility of fulfilling it: but according to Aboo Yoosaf he is forsworn; because he does not hold the possibility of fulfilment to be a condition of the validity of the vow; and so also in the present case. In the case of the vessel of water, however, there is no distinction made with respect to knowledge; that is, the vower (according to Haneefa and Mohammed) is not forsworn, whether he be aware of the cup having no water in it or not; and this is approved. It is otherwise in the case in question, for there a distinction is made, as has been already mentioned.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF VOWS RESPECTING THE PAYMENT OF MONEY.

Difference, in a vow, between the terms shortly, and in a length of time.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will discharge my debt to such an one shortly," this means within less than one month; and if he say, "I will discharge my debt due to such an one in a length of time," this means more than a month; because any space within a month is accounted a short time, and a month or any term beyond it is accounted a long time; and hence it is that where two friends meet after a long separation, one will say to the other, "I have not seen you this month!" and so forth.

A vow to discharge a debt is fulfilled by discharging it in light or base money, or in money belonging to another.—If a man make a vow, saying, "I will discharge my debt, owing to such an one, this day," and he pay the debt upon that day accordingly, and some of the money in which he has paid it should afterwards prove light, or base, or the right of another person, yet the vower is not forsworn; because lightness is only a defect, which does not destroy the specie (whence it is that if one of the parties, in a contract of Sirf sale, should, through negligence, receive base metal in return for pure metal, the exchange is completely fulfilled—and so also, the seller is fully paid his price, in a contract of Sillim sale, where he receives base coin in place of pure coin)—and such being the case, the condition of fulfilment (namely the payment of the debt) is accomplished: the vower, therefore, is not forsworn; the receipt of the money, also, where it is the right of a third person, is valid nevertheless, and the fulfilment thus established is not afterwards affected by the restoration of the same to that third person. (If, however, any of the money, after payment, should appear to be composed of pewter, or tin, the vower is forsworn; because those metals are not regarded as specie, whence, if through negligence they should be accepted in a Sillim or Sirf contract, it is not a lawful payment.)

Or by means of liquidation.—If, also, the vower should sell his slave to his creditor, within the course of the day, in lieu of the debt, and the creditor accept of the same, the fulfilment of the vow is accomplished; because liquidation is once mode of discharging debts;—that is, the debt due to one party ceases in lieu of the debt due to the other (for the creditor is responsible for whatever he receives, as he receives it on its own account by becoming proprietor of it, and thus the same obligation rests upon the creditor in behalf of his debtor as already rests upon the debtor in behalf of the creditor); a mutual liquidation, therefore, takes place between them, and the debt of each is remitted in lieu of the debt of the other. (This mode of discharging the debt by liquidation is because the actual discharge is inconceivable, as the debtor does not here offer anything but substance, and the right of the creditor is not to substance, but is merely to the debt which has been incurred by the other; and hence the learned in the law say, “a debt must be discharged with its like.”) Liquidation, therefore, being one mode of discharging debt, the fulfilment of the vow, in the case in question, is established, because the liquidation is established upon the instant of the sale of the slave.

OBJECTION.—The liquidation being established upon the instant of sale, why is the purchaser's seisin of the slave made a condition?

REPLY.—Seisin is made a condition in order that the debt due to the seller, namely, the price of the slave, may be fully confirmed and established, because although it be incumbent upon the purchaser from the instant of sale, yet it stands within the possibility of ceasing, as it is possible that the article sold may perish before seisin; but by seisin the debt is fully confirmed and established upon the purchaser.

But not by the gift of the creditor.—If the creditor make a gift of the debt to the debtor within the course of the day, the fulfilment of the vow is not established; because repayment has not taken place; and also, because the discharge of the debt is an act of the debtor alone, and the gift of the debt implies that the creditor relinquishes his right to it, which is an act of the creditor, and not of the debtor, wherefore the condition of fulfilment (namely, the act of the debtor) is not accomplished. It is here to be observed, however, that although the fulfilment be not accomplished, yet the vower is not forsworn, but the vow becomes void; because the vow was restricted to that day, and the creditor having remitted the debt within that day, the swearer is thereby effectually precluded from the fulfilment of his vow before the expiration of its term, which does not take place until the end of the day, whence the vow becomes void, in the same manner as in the case of the vessel of water.*

A vow not to accept reimbursement of a debt in partial payments is not violated until the whole debt shall have been so received.—If a debtor were to make an offer, saying to his creditor, “I will discharge my debt to you, by partial payments,” and the creditor should reply, with an oath, saying, “I will not thus receive my due by accepting part, and not the whole,” and he should afterwards take a part of the debt, yet he is not forsworn so long as he receives not the whole debt thus by partial payments; because here the point which produces a violation of the vow is the receiving the whole debt, but in partial sums, and that has not taken place. —If the debt consist of articles computable by weight, and the vower accept payment by two or more weighings thereof, in such a manner as not to be employed in any other concern between these two weighings, he is not forsworn, although this be a partial mode of receiving payment, because the receipt of the whole at once is sometimes in any common way impossible, and hence any debt of this description is an exception from the present case.

If a creditor make requisition from his debtor of a part of what is due to him, suppose two hundred Dirms, and the debtor reply that “he has not so much money,” and the creditor disbelieve him, and he answer, “if I possess more than one hundred Dirms, my wife is divorced,” and it should happen that he is, at the time of saying this, possessed of fifty Dirms only, he is not forsworn; because his design, in this declaration, is merely to express his denial of being possessed of more than one hundred Dirms; and also, because his exception of one hundred Dirms involves an exception of every component part or proportion of one hundred; and fifty is one of these proportions; wherefore fifty also are excepted, and hence he is not forsworn. And the rule is the same, if, instead of “more than one hundred Dirms,” he should say, “other than one hundred Dirms,” or “beyond one hundred Dirms,”—but use all these terms equally express exception.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF MISCELLANEOUS CASES.

A vow against doing a thing, unrestrictedly pronounced, operates as a perpetual inhibition.—If a man make a vow, saying, “I will not do so and so,” it is necessary that he for ever abstain from the commission of that act, because he has expressed the negative of the act generally, and hence the prohibition is general, in consequence of the negative being unrestrictedly expressed.

A vow of performance is fulfilled by a single instance of performance.—If a man make a vow that “he will do such a thing,” and he should once do it, his vow is fulfilled, as he has not undertaken more than the commission of that act in one single instance unspecified, because such is to be understood from the words by which he binds himself, fulfilment is therefore established, upon his once performing a single instance of the act in question, whatever instance that may be, and whether such performance be voluntary or compulsive. In a case of this nature, moreover, the vower is never considered as forsworn, unless where he may be utterly excluded from a possibility of performing the act, which can only be by his death, or by the destruction of the subject of the act.

An oath imposed by a supreme magistrate continues in force only during the existence of that magistrate's authority.—If a sultan, or other supreme governor, or magistrate of a kingdom or province, should require an oath of a person that "he will inform him of the dwelling of every evil-doer, who shall enter that territory," and the person swear accordingly, such oath binds him to convey such information to the magistrate aforesaid, during the existence of his authority only, and no longer; because the intention of the magistrate, in imposing such an oath, is to repel the wickedness of evil-doers, or to prevent such wickedness in others by the punishment of those evil-doers; conveying this information, therefore, after the expiration of the magistrate's government and authority, is no manner of use; and the expiration of the magistrate's authority takes place either on his death, or his removal from office.

A vow of gift is fulfilled by the offer of the gift, although it be not accepted of.—If a master make a vow "that he will bestow such a slave upon such a person," and he should bestow that slave accordingly, and the person refuse such gift, yet the vow is fulfilled.—This is contrary to the doctrine of Ziffer, who considers gift to be the same as sale, as being equally a transfer of property; and as, if a man swear that "he will sell his slave to such a person," and that person refuse to buy the said slave, the vow remains unfulfilled, so in this case likewise.—The arguments of our doctors on this point are twofold:—FIRST, gift is a voluntary or gratuitous deed, and hence is executed on the part of the giver alone, independent of the receiver; thus we say, "such a person presented so-and-so to such a person," although the other may not have accepted it:—SECONDLY, the design of the swearer, in making such a vow as the above, is to exhibit his own generosity and liberality; and that is effected by means of the deed of gift; but a contract of sale is a mutual engagement, which can be executed only by the act of both the parties concerned in it.

Force in respect to odoriferous herbs or flowers have force according to the sense in which the denomination of them is generally taken.—If a man make a vow that "he will not smell Rechan," and he should afterwards smell to the rose or the jessamin, he is not forsworn, because Rechan is that species of flowers which have no stalk, and the rose and jessamin have stalks or branches from which they depend.

If a man were to make a vow, saying, that "he would not purchase violets," and have no particular intention therein, the vow is construed to mean oil of violets, from general custom, according to which, a person dealing in that article is termed a violet-seller; and as purchase is founded upon sale, a person purchasing oil of violets is termed a buyer of violets.—(Some doctors maintain that, with us, by the term violets, is understood the flower only, and not the oil.)—If the vower were to say that "he would not purchase flowers," by this is to be understood the leaves only, and not the oil, as such is the literal meaning of his expression; and custom also accords with this, because by flowers is usually understood the leaves of the flowers. In the case of violets custom has established it otherwise, as the word violets is commonly used to express oil of violets.

OF HOODOOD, OR PUNISHMENTS.*

Definition of Hidd.—HOODOOD is the plural of Hidd; and Hidd in its primitive sense signifies obstruction; whence a porter or gatekeeper is termed the Hiddad, or obstructor, from his office of prohibiting people from entering. In law it expresses the correction appointed and specified by the law on account of the right of God, and hence the extension of the term Hidd to retaliation is not approved, since retaliation is due as a right of man, and not as a right of God; and in the same manner, the extension of it to Tazeer (or discretionary chastisement) is not approved, as Tazeer is a species of correction not specified or determined by any fixed rules of law, but committed to the discretion of the Kazeer. The original design in the institution of Hidd is deterrent, that is, warning people from the commission of offensive actions; and the absolution of the person punished is not the original design of it, as is evident from its being awarded to Infidels in the same manner as to Mussulmans.

CHAPTER I.

OF ZINNA, OR WHOREDOM.

Whoredom may be established by proof or by confession.—WHOREDOM is established before the Kazee, in two different modes—by proof and by confession;—by proof, because that is a demonstration founded on the appearance of facts; and by confession, because probability is most in favour of the truth in such acknowledgment, especially where it is to be the occasion of suffering and shame to the person confessing; and whoredom being an act the nature of which most frequently excludes the possibility of positive proof, it is necessary that circumstantial evidence be admitted as sufficient to establish it, lest the door of correction might be shut.

To establish it upon proof four witnesses are required.—THE manner of giving evidence to whoredom is by four persons bearing witness against a man and a woman that they have committed whoredom together, because God has commanded in the Koran, saying, “PRODUCE FOUR WITNESSES FROM AMONG YOU AGAINST THEM;” and also, “IF ANY PERSON ADVANCE A CHARGE OF WHOREDOM AGAINST OTHERS OF CHASTE REPUTE, AND CANNOT PRODUCE FOUR WITNESSES IN SUPPORT OF HIS ACCUSATION, LET HIM BE PUNISHED WITH EIGHTY STRIPES.” Moreover, the prophet once said to a man who brought before him an accusation against his own wife, “Bring four men who may bear testimony to the truth of your allegation;” and this degree of proof is also required, because it is laudable to conceal and cover infirmity, and the contrary is prohibited; and by requiring no fewer than four witnesses to a charge of whoredom both these ends are obtained.

Who must be particularly examined in respect to all the circumstances of the fact.—

WHEN witnesses come forward to bear evidence in a case of whoredom, it is necessary that the Kazee examine them particularly concerning the nature of the offence; that is, that he ask of each witness respectively, “What is whoredom?” and “in what manner have the parties committed it?” and “where?” and “at what time?” and “with whom?”—because the prophet interrogated Maaz as to the manner of the fact, and the nature of the offence; and also, because examination in all these particulars is a necessary caution, since it is possible that the witnesses, by the term Zinna, may mean something not directly amounting to carnal conjunction (such as seeing and touching), Zinna being a phrase occasionally applied to these also. It is possible, moreover, that the whoredom may have been committed in a foreign country, and therefore that it is not cognizable; or it may have been committed at a distant period, prior to the charge, which is therefore inadmissible; it may happen, too, that the fact may have been committed under an erroneous conception of the parties with respect to its legality, such as would occasion remission of punishment, and such as neither the parties themselves, nor the evidences against them are aware of (as in a case where a man has connexion with the female slave of his son); it is therefore requisite that the judge examine the evidence minutely with respect to all these particulars, since some circumstance may appear, in the course of such investigation, sufficient to exempt from punishment.

Upon the evidence being duly given, sentence of punishment is passed.—AND when the witnesses shall thus have borne testimony completely, declaring that “they have seen the parties in the very act of carnal conjunction” (describing the same), and the integrity of such evidence is also known to the Kazee from both an open and a secret purgation, let him then pass sentence of punishment for whoredom, according to such evidence. The apparent probity of the witnesses does not suffice in the present case, but it is necessary that the magistrate ascertain their probity, both by an open and a secret purgation, in such a manner, that (possibly) some circumstance may appear sufficient to prevent the punishment, because the prophet has said, “Seek a pretext to prevent punishment according to your ability;” contrary to all other cases, in which the apparent integrity of the witnesses is (according to Haneefa) held sufficient. The mode of open and secret purgation is fully set forth under the head of Evidence.

MOHAMMED has said, in the Mabsoot, that the Kazee may imprison the accused, until he make a purgation of the witnesses, because the person against whom the testimony is given stands charged with whoredom upon the evidence of witnesses; and also, because the prophet once ordered a person charged with whoredom to be imprisoned: contrary to a case of debt, since a debtor cannot be imprisoned upon a charge of debt exhibited against him by witnesses, until their probity be fully proved. The nature of this distinction shall be treated of at large in another place.

Confession must be repeated four different times.—THE confession which establishes whoredom is made by a person of sound mind and mature age acknowledging himself (or herself) guilty of whoredom four times, at four different appearances, in the presence of the Kazee, he [the Kazee] declining to receive the confession, and sending the person away the first, second, and third time. The maturity and sanity of the person confessing are conditions, because the declaration of an infant or an idiot is not worthy of any credit, or because the acknowledgment of such is not sufficient to induce a sentence of punishment. The condition of the confession being made four times at four different appearances is agreeable to our doctors. According to Shafci, a single confession, in a case of whoredom, is sufficient, because he considers the law to be the same here as in all other cases, the confession or acknowledgment of any circumstance being the means of disclosing or discovering that which is so confessed or acknowledged; and a single confession is fully adequate to this purpose, a repetition being of no manner of use, since the disclosure or discovery is not in any degree increased or amplified by it: contrary to plurality of witnesses, as the abundance of witnesses is a means of removing all doubt with respect to their veracity, and of affording fuller satisfaction to the mind; whereas, by the repetition of the declaration of a single person (as in case of confession), no such additional satisfaction is obtained. The arguments of our doctors in opposition to what is here advanced by Shafci are twofold: FIRST, the case of Maaz, on whom the prophet would not decree any punishment until he should have made confession of his offence four different times at four different appearances, where it is to be concluded that if a single confession had sufficed, and it had been proper to proceed to punishment upon the force of it alone, the prophet would not have delayed to inflict it until the confession should be four times repeated as above;—SECONDLY, as in evidence to whoredom four witnesses are requisite, so also in the confession thereof four repetitions are requisite, and for the same reason, namely, that it is laudable to conceal infirmity; and this condition of the repetition of confession has a tendency to conceal infirmity. The reasons for establishing four appearances of the person confessing as a condition are twofold:—FIRST, the tradition of Maaz, as already related;—SECONDLY, a plurality of confessions is made a condition, and that cannot be obtained without a plurality of appearances on the part of the confessor, since one effect of an unity of place or appearance is to render the separate declaration of the same thing as one declaration; and hence four confessions, in a single appearance,* amount only to a single confession; and as confession relates only to the person confessing, the manner, or otherwise, of his appearance, is neglected, and not that of the Kazee's assembly.

“Thou art mad!” and such other words, the person, upon the Kazee thus repelling his confession, going forth, so as to be out of the Kazee's sight, and returning again, and repeating his confession:—and so on to the fourth time. This is recorded from Aboo Hanefia, on the authority of the conduct of the prophet in the instance of Maaz, whom he thus sent out of his sight three different times.

The person confessing must be particularly examined.—WHEN confession shall have been made in this manner four different times, the Kazee must then proceed to examine the person so confessing, asking him, “What is whoredom?”—and “where, and in what manner, and with whom—have you committed this whoredom?”—All which duly observed, the person confessing becomes then properly obnoxious to punishment, as the proof is complete. The advantages attending the examination of the confessing person have been already explained under the head of witnesses bearing evidence to whoredom; but it is to be observed that although it be directed there that the Kazee examine the witnesses with respect to the time of the perpetration of the fact, yet it is not requisite to put a similar question to a person who confesses, because that delay which would impeach the credibility of a witness does not in any respect impugn the credibility of a person who makes a voluntary confession: some, however, have said that if the Kazee interrogate such a person with respect to the time of the fact, it is lawful,

*The term Majlis, which, for the sake of perspicuity, is in this place translated appearance, literally signifies a seat or place of sitting; and it may admit of various explanations, according to the circumstance under which it is applied, or the person to whom it relates. When it is mentioned as the Majlis of the Kazee, it means the public assembly or court of that magistrate: when it applies solely to the parties who come to make any declaration before the Kazee, it may be rendered the appearance of that party in court. It also frequently refers to a private company, and sometimes merely to the posture of the party (as in the case of divorce left at the option of the wife). In short, to define the true and precise application of the term Majlis in the present case, regard must be had to the Mussulman usages, it being customary for the Kazee to admit people to deliver the substance of their testimony in a sitting posture, and hence every time the party arises and again resumes his seat may be rendered a new appearance of that party in court.

since it is possible that it may have been committed during infancy.

A person may retract from his confession.

—If the person confessing should deny the fact, and retract from his confession, either before or during the infliction of punishment, his retraction must be credited, and he must forthwith be released.—Shafei and Ibn Lailee have said that retraction after confession is not to be credited, but that the punishment must be inflicted, since as it has been already incurred by the confession, it cannot be done away in consequence of denial; as in a case where whoredom is established against a person upon the testimony of witnesses;—or as in a case of retaliation, or of punishment for slander;—that is to say, when retaliation or punishment for slander are once established upon the confession of the offender, they do not drop in consequence of his subsequent denial of the fact; and so in this case likewise. The argument of our doctors is that denial after confession is an intimation, which (like the confession) may be either false or true; and there is no person to disprove such denial; and hence, from the inconsistency between the confession and the denial, a doubt arises concerning the confession; and punishment drops in consequence of any doubt: contrary to intimations which involve the rights of individuals (such as retaliation, and punishment for slander), as the claimant of the right, in those cases, is the disprover of the person who has confessed, when he afterwards denies, which is not the case in any matter involving merely a right of the law.

It is laudable in the Kazeer, or Imam, before whom confession of whoredom may be made, to instruct the person confessing to deny it, by saying to him, "Perhaps you have only kissed or touched her," because the prophet spoke so to Maaz;—and Mohammed, in the Mahsoot, adds that the judge may also examine the confessing person with respect to such circumstances as, if made to appear, would tend to his entire exculpation, such as, "whether the fact confessed may not have been committed in marriage," or "under an erroneous misconception of its legality?"

Section.

Of the Manner of Punishment, and the Infliction thereof.

A married person convicted of whoredom is to be stoned.—WHEN a person is fully convicted of whoredom, if he be married, let him undergo the punishment of Rajim, that is, lapidation, or stoning to death, because the prophet condemned Maaz to be thus stoned to death, who was married; and he has also declared, "It is unlawful to spill the blood of a Mussulman, excepting only for three causes, namely, APOSTACY, WHOREDOM after marriage, and MURDER"—and in this all the companions likewise unite.

Mode of executing lapidation.—It is necessary, when a whoremonger is to be stoned to death, that he should be carried to some barren place, void of houses or cultivation; and it is requisite that the stoning be executed,—first by the witnesses, and after them by the Imam or Kazeer, and after those by the rest of the by-standers, because it is so recorded from Alee, and also, because in the circumstance of the execution being begun by the witness there is a precaution, since a person may be very bold in delivering his evidence against a criminal, but afterwards, when directed himself to commence the infliction of that punishment which is a consequence of it, may from compunction retract his testimony; thus causing the witnesses to begin the punishment may be a means of entirely preventing it. Shafei has said that the witnesses beginning the punishment is not a requisite, in a case of lapidation, any more than in a case of scourging. To this our doctors reply that reasoning upon a case of lapidation from a case of scourging is supposing an analogy between things which are essentially different, because all persons are not acquainted with the proper method of inflicting flagellation, and hence, if a witness thus ignorant were to attempt it, it might prove fatal to the sufferer, and he would die where death is not his due: contrary to a case of lapidation, as that is of a destructive nature, and what every person is equally capable of executing, wherefore if the witnesses shrink back from the commencement of lapidation, the punishment drops, because their reluctance argues their retraction. In the same manner punishment is remitted when the witnesses happen to die or to disappear, as in this case the condition, namely, the commencement of it by the witnesses, is defeated. This is when the whoredom is established upon the testimony of witnesses: but when it is established upon the confession of the offender, it is then requisite that the lapidation be executed, first by the Imam or the Kazeer, and after them by the rest of the multitude, because it is so recorded from Alee; moreover, the prophet threw a small stone like a bean at Ghamdeea, who had confessed whoredom. What is said on the subject is taken from the Zahir-Rowayet.

THE corpse of a person executed by lapidation for whoredom is entitled to the usual ablutions, and to all other funeral ceremonies, because of the declaration of the prophet with respect to Maaz, "Do by the body as ye do by those of other believers;"—and also, because the offender thus put to death is slain in vindication of the laws of God, wherefore ablution is not refused, as in the case of one put to death by a sentence of retaliation: moreover, the prophet allowed the prayers for the dead to Ghamdeea, after lapidation.

An unmarried free person is to be scourged with one hundred stripes.—If the person convicted of whoredom be free, but unmarried, the punishment with respect to him is one hundred stripes, according to what is said in the Koran, "THE WHORE AND WHOREMONGER SHALL YE SCOURGE WITH AN HUNDRED STRIPES;"—for although this text be cancelled with respect to married persons, yet in regard to all other than those who are married the law must be executed in conformity to it.

Mode of executing scourging.—OBSERVE that the hundred stripes inflicted by the decree of the magistrate must be administered with a rod which has no knots upon it; and that the stripes must be applied in moderation, that is to say, neither with severity, nor yet with too much lenity; because Alce, when he was about to inflict correction, used to smooth off from the rod any knots which might happen to be upon it; and as too much severity on the one hand tends to destruction, on the other hand too much lenity is inadequate to the design of correction. And when punishment is to be inflicted on any person, it is necessary that he be stripped naked; that is to say, that all the clothes be taken off except the girdle;—because Alce directed so in this matter; and also, because the punishment is in this way administered with the greatest effect: but as the removal of the girdle from the body would expose nakedness, it is therefore to be left.

The stripes must not all be given on one part of the body.—It is requisite that the hundred stripes be given, not all upon the same part or member* of the person upon whom punishment is inflicted, but upon different parts, as it might otherwise be attended with danger to life; and none of the stripes must be inflicted on the face, the head, or the privities, because the prophet once said to an executioner, "In inflicting the punishment, take care not to strike the FACE, the HEAD, or the PRIVITIES;" and also, because the first of those is the seat of expression and likewise of beauty; and the second is the central seat of the senses; and the third is a part which cannot be wounded without danger to life; and it is to be apprehended that in the first and second instance the appearance and the faculties might sustain material injury, and the injuring of those is a species of destruction to the man; and that in the last life might be endangered: it is unlawful therefore to strike on any of those parts, the design of correction being amendment and not destruction. Abou Yoosaf has said that one or two strokes may be given on the head, as Abou Bihr once said to an executioner, "Strike on the head, because there the devil resides:" in reply to this, however, we remark that Abou Bihr gave this direction with respect to an infidel alien, who had been used to seduce believers from the faith, and whose life of course had been forfeited.

* In the original, Azoo, a limb, which would make this species of correction more properly to apply to the bastinado.

Scourging must be inflicted upon a man standing, and upon a woman sitting.—WHEN a man is to be scourged for whoredom he is to receive his punishment in a standing posture, because Alce has said, "Correction is to be inflicted upon men standing, and upon women sitting;" and also, because the proper infliction of punishment depends upon its being open and public, which is best effected by its being received in a standing posture; but yet as a woman is nakedness,* in thus administering the correction to her there might be an apprehension of the exposure of nakedness. It is to be observed that in administering punishment it must not be inflicted in the way of Mid.† Concerning the meaning of the term Mid there are various opinions:—some say that it signifies laying a person on his face upon the ground, and stretching out his limbs;—some, that it signifies the executioner drawing the rod over his own head; others, that it signifies the executioner drawing back the rod, after giving the blow; but the correction must not be inflicted in the way of Mid, according to any of these acceptations, as it is more than what is due.

A slave to receive fifty stripes.—IF the person convicted of whoredom be a slave, male or female, the punishment of such is fifty stripes, because the Almighty has said [in the Koran], speaking of female slaves, "THEY SHALL BE SUBJECT TO HALF THE PUNISHMENT OF FREE MARRIED PEOPLE;"—and the term slave in the text extends to males as well as females. Moreover, as bondage occasions the participation of only half the blessings of life, it also occasions the suffering of only half the punishments, because an offence increases in magnitude in proportion to the magnitude of the blessings under the enjoyment of which it is committed.

A woman is not to be stripped.—THE punishment of whoredom is the same with respect to both sexes, as all the texts which occur in the sacred writings upon this subject extend equally to both; but yet a woman is not to be stripped, neither is her veil to be taken off, but only her robe, or other outward garment, as the removal of any other part of her dress would be offensive to modesty; but as the robe or outward garment would prevent the effect of the correction, and the removal of such is not indecent, she is to be stripped of these.

A woman is to receive her punishment in a sitting posture, according to the direction of Alce before recited, and also, because in this a regard is shown to decency, which it is incumbent to preserve; and for the same reason, where a woman is to be stoned, a hole or excavation should be dug to receive her, as deep as her waist, because the prophet ordered such a hole to be dug for Ghamdeea before mentioned, and Alee also ordered a hole to be dug for Shooraha Hamdeance: it is however immaterial whether a hole be dug or not, because the prophet did not issue any particular ordinance respecting this; and the nakedness of a woman is sufficiently covered by her garments; but yet it is laudable to dig a hole for her, as decency is thus most effectually preserved. There is no manner of necessity to dig a hole for a man, because the prophet did not so, in the case of Maaz. And observe it is not lawful to bind a person in order to execute punishment upon him in this case, unless it appear that it cannot otherwise be inflicted.

* "A woman is nakedness;" that is to say, every part of a woman's person is equally indecent to be seen.

† Literally length; it admits of various applications.

Slaves cannot be punished for whoredom but by authority.—A MASTER cannot inflict correction upon his male or female slave [for whoredom] but by permission of the Kazeer. Shafei has said that it belongs to a master to inflict correction upon his slave, in this as well as in any other case, because a man's authority over his slaves is general and absolute, even preferably to that of the Kazeer, as a master is empowered to perform acts with respect to his slaves in which the Kazeer is not empowered; this, therefore, is the same as Tazeer, or discretionary correction; that is to say, the master is at liberty to inflict stated punishment for whoredom upon his slaves in the same manner as discretionary correction. The arguments of our doctors are twofold:—FIRST, the prophet has declared that there are four things committed to magistrates, and that one of those is Hidd, or stated punishment, which is here treated of; SECONDLY, Hidd, or stated punishment, is a right of God, as the design of it is to purify the world from sin; and as it is a right of God, hence it cannot be done away by the act of any individual, wherefore this right is to be exacted by the prince, as the deputy of the law, or by the Kazeer, as the deputy of the prince: contrary to Tazeer, or discretionary correction, because that is a right of the individual, whence it is that infants are subject to Tazeer, although they be not liable to Hidd.

Definition of the state of marriage which subjects an adulterer to lapidation.—THE state of marriage necessary to induce lapidation requires that the whoremonger be of sound understanding and mature age, and a Mussulman, free, and who has consummated in a lawful marriage with a woman at a time when she also is sane, free, adult, and a Musslima. This is the definition of Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. According to Mohammed and Shafei the state of marriage in question requires simply that the whoremonger be free, and a Mussulman, and one who has consummated in a lawful marriage with a woman of the same description. It is to be considered, however, that sanity of intellect and maturity of age are conditional to the receiving of punishment, since, without these, men are incapable of reading or understanding the ordinances of the law; and the other requisites, besides these two, are made conditions in order that the sin may appear in its greatest magnitude, from the consideration of the magnitude of those blessings under which it is committed, as ingratitude for the blessings of Providence is greatest, and most atrocious, when those blessings are enjoyed in the highest degree; now the particulars aforesaid, namely, the Mussulman faith, and freedom, and the enjoyment of a woman in a lawful marriage, are among the greatest blessings of life, wherefore lapidation on account of whoredom is ordained in cases where all these circumstances exist; and hence lapidation is enjoined when these conditions exist: contrary to the superiority derived from the other gifts of nature or of fortune, such as family, learning, capacity, beauty, and wealth, which are not conditions, because the law has no regard to those circumstances, and also, because those which have been stated are alone sufficient to constitute the magnitude of the sin of whoredom, so as to subject the offender to lapidation, since, by virtue of freedom, a man is enabled to contract himself in a lawful marriage, and by virtue of a lawful marriage he is enabled lawfully to indulge his carnal appetite, and by such indulgence to allay his passions; and, by virtue of being a Mussulman, he is enabled to marry a Musslima, which fixes and confirms the belief of the prohibition of whoredom to him; all these things, therefore, particularly forbid and inhibit a man from the commission of whoredom; and a sin is great in proportion to the force of the inhibitions under which it is committed. The sect of Shafei differ from our doctors with respect to that part of the proposition which asserts that the profession of the Mussulman faith is a requisite condition; and there is also a record from Aboo Yoosaf to the same effect. Their argument is, that in the time of the prophet a Jew committed whoredom with a Jewess, and the prophet ordered them both to be stoned; but to this our doctors reply that the prophet passed that sentence in conformity to the Tawreet, or Jewish law, which has since been superseded by the Mussulman law; and the declaration of the prophet, "Whosoever is not a true believer shall not be regarded as married,"* is a confirmation of this. The consummation now mentioned as a condition is understood in the conjunction having taken place so far as to require the prescribed ablutions; and as it is a condition essential to such a marriage as induces lapidation, that the woman, at the time of consummation, be of the same description with the man, in the points of sanity, maturity, freedom, and profession of the faith, it follows that if a man were to consummate with a wife who is an idiot, an infant, a slave, or an infidel, he is not considered as married in this sense, since, on account of these circumstances, the advantages of the matrimonial enjoyment are incomplete, because a man has a natural aversion to consummate with a lunatic woman; and he can have but little gratification with one under age, where desire is not reciprocal; and, in the same manner, he has not a strong desire to consummate with a slave, as in that case his children are slave-born; and so also the enjoyment of a wife who is an infidel affords the less satisfaction, because of the difference of religious principles. In all these cases, therefore, the advantage of the carnal enjoyment is defective, whence the husband of such woman does not, by consummation, become a Mahsan, or married man, in that sense which induces lapidation. And the rule is the same where the husband is an idiot, an infant, a slave, or an infidel, and his wife sane, adult, and a Musslima. Abou Yoosaf has said that where the wife is an infidel, her husband, being a Mussulman, by consummating his marriage with her, becomes as a married man; but, in reply to this, besides what has been above advanced, it is to be remarked that the prophet has declared, "A MUSSULMAN is not rendered a married man by connexion with a CHRISTIAN, nor is a FREEMAN rendered married by connexion with a wife who is a SLAVE; nor a SLAVE by connexion with a wife who is FREE."

Stoning and scourging cannot be united.—It is not lawful to unite the punishments of stoning and scourging in the same person, because the prophet has left no precedent of the kind; and also, because if they were to be united, the scourging would be useless, since the design of correction is a warning from vice, and this warning is effected by lapidation in respect only to others than the person so punished; for a warning cannot be effected, with respect to the person punished, after his destruction.

Nor (with respect to a woman) scourging and banishment. If a woman guilty of whoredom be of mature age, in her punishment scourging and banishment cannot be united. According to Shafei, these two may be united with respect to her by way of punishment, that is, banishment may also be included in her punishment,—because the prophet has declared, "If a man, being unmarried, commit whoredom with a woman who is of age, the punishment of such is one hundred stripes; and he shall be excluded from the city for the space of one year, as by his banishment the door is shut against whoredom, because in an unsettled situation a man meets with few female companions to tempt him to commit it." The arguments of our doctors are twofold,—FIRST, God has declared, "THE WHORE AND THE WHOREMONGER SHALL YE SCOURGE WITH AN HUNDRED STRIPES," from which it is evident that the sole punishment of such is one hundred stripes, for if it were more it would be there mentioned, and one hundred stripes alone would not have been declared sufficient; SECONDLY, her banishment is opening the way to the further commission of her crime, because people are under less restraint when removed from the eye of their friends and relations, as those are the persons whose censures they are most in dread of; moreover, in an unsettled situation, and among strangers, the necessities of life are with difficulty procured, whence she might be induced voluntarily to prostitute herself for a supply, which of all kinds of whoredom is the most abominable; and the saying of Alee, that "Banishment is a means of seduction," is founded on this second reason. As to the saying of the prophet quoted by Shafei, it is superseded, as well as the remainder of that saying, "If a SIYEER (meaning a man who has consummated a marriage) afterwards commit adultery with a SIYEERA, their punishment is one hundred stripes and lapidation." The way in which this is superseded is explained in its proper place. In short, banishment, with respect to a loose woman, in the way of punishment, is not lawful; but yet if the magistrate should find it advisable, he may banish her for the space of one year, or less, but this banishment is in the way of Tazeer, or discretionary correction, as banishment may in some cases operate as a warning, wherefore it is committed to the Kazee or the Imam; and what is recorded concerning the companions, of their having banished people, is to be regarded in the way of Tazeer.

The execution of stoning is not suspended on account of sickness.—If a sick person, being one whose proper punishment is lapidation, commit whoredom, he is to be stoned, because his destruction is due, and is therefore not to be suspended on account of his illness; but if he be one whose punishment is scourging, the execution of it must be deferred until his recovery, lest life should be endangered, for the same reason: as the limb of a sick thief is not cut off until he be in a proper habit of body to endure the amputation without risk of life.

But it is so on account of pregnancy.—If a pregnant woman commit whoredom, and her punishment be lapidation, the execution must be delayed until her delivery, for if she were to be stoned whilst pregnant, the child would be destroyed in her womb, and its blood is not to be taken; and if her punishment be scourging, the execution must be deferred until she shall have recovered from her labour, as that is a species of sickness, wherefore a delay must be made until her health be perfectly restored: contrary to a case of stoning, where the punishment need not be delayed until a perfect recovery, since the delay in this case is only with a view to the preservation of the child in her womb, which is separated from her upon the instant of its birth. It is recorded from Haneefa that in stoning also the execution must be delayed until the child become independent of her care, in case there should be no other person to foster it in her stead, because by this delay the child is preserved from destruction; and it is moreover related that when Ghamdeea, after her delivery, came before the prophet, that he might execute punishment upon her, he said to her, "Go and remain until such time as your child is independent of you."

A pregnant woman, convicted upon evidence, must be imprisoned.—AND OBSERVE, —If a pregnant woman be convicted of whoredom upon evidence she must be confined in prison until she be delivered, lest she should abscond; contrary to a case where a pregnant woman is convicted upon her own confession; for in this case she is not to be confined, as her denial after confession must be credited (for which reason punishment is remitted in case of her denial), wherefore to imprison her would be useless.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE CARNAL CONJUNCTION WHICH OCCASIONS PUNISHMENT, AND OF THAT WHICH DOES NOT OCCASION IT.

Definition of the term Zinna.—THE carnal conjunction which occasions punishment is Zinna, or whoredom; and this, both in its primitive sense, and also in its legal acceptation, signifies the carnal conjunction of a man with a woman who is not his property, either by right of marriage or of bondage, and in whom he has no erroneous property, because Zinna is the denomination of an unlawful conjunction of the sexes, and this illegality is universally understood where such conjunction takes place devoid of property, either actual or erroneously supposed. What is here said is the definition of whoredom with respect to a man:—as to the whoredom of a woman, it simply signifies her admitting the man to commit the fact.

Definition of erroneous carnal conjunction.—ERROR in carnal conjunction is of two kinds,—the first error in respect to the act, which is termed Shoobha-Ishtibah, or error of misconception: the second, error in respect to the subject, which is termed Shoobha-Hookmee [error by effect], or Shaba-Milk [erroneous propriety].—The first of these distinctions of error is not established, nor understood, but with respect to a man who mistakes an illegal carnal conjunction for legal, because Ishtibah signifies the man having carnal intercourse with a woman, under the supposition of the same being lawful to him, in consequence of his supposing something other than that which is necessary to constitute legality as affording an argument of such legality; it is therefore necessary that this mistake should have operated in his mind in order to establish Ishtibah, or misconception; and hence this species of error is not understood, except in the case of a person who is under such misapprehension.—The second species of error is established, where the argument of the legality of carnal conjunction exists in itself, but yet practice cannot take place upon it, because of some obstacle; and this does not depend upon the apprehension or belief of the person who commits the unlawful act: whence this species of error is regarded in respect to all men, that is to say, men who so conceive, and also those who do not.—And punishment drops in consequence of the existence of either of these two species of error, on account of a well-known tradition.

Parentage is established in a case of error with respect to the subject, but not in a case of error with respect to the act.—IN a case of error of the second species, the parentage of the child is established in the man who has had such connexion, if he claim such child; but in a case of error of the first species, the parentage of the child is not to be established in the man, notwithstanding his claim,—because, in a case where the error is of the first species, the act of generation is positive whoredom, although punishment be not incurred, on account of a circumstance which has reference to the man committing such act (namely, that of the illegality of the act being misconceived by him, according to his apprehension of it); but the act of generation, in a case of error of the second species, is not positive whoredom.

ERROR in respect to the act exists in eight several situations; namely, with—

- I.—The female slave of a man's mother.
- II.—The female slave of his father.
- III.—The female slave of his wife.
- IV.—A wife repudiated by three divorces, who is in her Edit.
- V.—A wife completely divorced for a compensation, and, in her Edit.
- VI.—An Am-Walid, who is in her Edit after emancipation with respect to her master.
- VII.—The female slave of a master, with respect to his male slave.
- VIII.—A female slave, delivered as a pledge, with respect to the receiver of such pledge (according to the Rawayet-Saheeh in treating of punishment);—and it is to be observed, that a borrower, in this point, stands in the same predicament with the receiver of a pledge.

And there is no punishment in either case.—AND in all those situations the person who has carnal conjunction does not incur punishment, provided he declare—"I conceived that this woman was lawful to me;"—but if he should acknowledge his consciousness that the woman was unlawful to him, he incurs punishment.

ERROR in respect to the subject exists in six situations; namely, with—

- I.—The female slave of a man's son.
- II.—A wife completely repudiated by an implied divorce.
- III.—A female slave sold, with respect to the seller, before the delivery of her to the purchaser.
- IV.—A female slave Mamhoora—(that is, a slave stipulated to be given in dower to a wife)—with respect to the husband, before seisin of her being made by the wife.
- V.—A female slave held in partnership, with respect to any of the partners.
- VI.—A female slave delivered in pledge, with respect to the receiver of such pledge, according to the Book of Pawnage.

And in all those situations a person who has carnal connexion does not incur punishment, even though he should confess his consciousness of such woman being unlawful to him.

A contract of marriage prevents punishment, although avowedly illegal.—According to Haneefa, a contract of marriage is a sufficient ground of error, although the illegality of such marriage be universally allowed, and the man entering into such contract be sensible of this illegality. With our other Doctors, on the contrary, a contract of marriage is not admitted as a legal ground of error, if the man be sensible of the illegality. —The effect of this difference of opinion appears in a case where a man marries a woman related to him within the prohibited degrees, —hereafter explained.

Connexion with a wife thrice divorced (before the expiration of her Edit), occasions punishment.—If a man pronounce three divorces upon his wife, and afterwards have carnal connexion with her during her Edit, and acknowledge his consciousness of her being unlawful to him, punishment is incurred, because here possession by marriage, which legalizes generation, has been totally annihilated, and hence there can be no error, as the text in the Koran shows that legality is destroyed in this case; and all the doctors coincide in this opinion. But if he were to declare that “he conceived, or supposed, she was still lawful to him,” punishment is not incurred, because his apprehension is to be regarded, since the effects of marriage still remain, with respect to the establishment of the parentage of children, and the matrimonial restraint, and alimony (for if the woman should bear a child, at any period within two years from the date of divorce, the parentage of such child is established in the husband, and she remains under the restraint to which she is subject in marriage, and her alimony also remains incumbent upon her husband); his apprehension, as above pleaded, is therefore of force to prevent punishment, on account of error by misconception. And an Am-Walid, after, manumission, and a woman in a state of repudiation by Khoola, or one divorced for a compensation (who are in their Edit), stand in the same predicament with a woman repudiated by three divorces, as their illegality is universally admitted, and certain effects of marriage continue during their Edit, as well as in a case of a wife under three divorces.

Connexion with a wife divorced by implication does not induce punishment.—If a man divorce his wife by implication, saying, “You are divested,” or “you are at your own disposal,” and she choose divorce—and he afterwards have carnal knowledge of her within the term of her Edit, and should acknowledge that he knows her to be unlawful to him, yet punishment is not incurred; because concerning this case there is a difference among the companions; for Omar holds that the forms above mentioned are effective of only a single divorce reversible; and the same in all expressions of divorce by implication: he also holds the rule to be the same, where the husband intends three divorces, as he maintains that here likewise a single divorce reversible only takes place, and that the intention of three divorces is not regarded.

Nor that with the female slave of a son or a grandson.—PUNISHMENT is not incurred by a man having carnal connexion with the female slave of his son, or of his grandson, although he should acknowledge his consciousness of such female slave being unlawful to him, for in this case the error is by effect, since it proceeds from an argument founded upon the words of the prophet, who said to one with whom he was conversing, “THOU and THINE are thy FATHER’S,” and the grandfather is subject to the same rule with the father, as he is also a parent. The parentage also of the child begotten in such carnal conjunction is established in the father aforesaid, who remains responsible to his son for the value of the female slave.

Or of a father, mother, or wife (where misconception is pleaded).—If a person have carnal connexion with the female slave of his father, or his mother, or his wife, and plead his conception that such slave was lawful to him, he does not incur punishment; neither is his accuser liable to punishment—(but if he should acknowledge his consciousness of the illegality, punishment is to be inflicted upon him,—and the same rule obtains where a slave has connexion with the bondmaid of his master):—because between these there is a community of interests in the acquisition of profit; and hence the man who commits the act may in those cases have conceived, with respect to the enjoyment, that this species of usufruct is also lawful to him,—wherefore error by misconception is applicable to him; but nevertheless this is actual whoredom, for which reason punishment is not incurred by the accuser. The law is the same (according to the Zahir Rawayet), if the female slave, in either of those cases, were to plead her supposing that the act was lawful, without any such plea on the part of the man,—because the carnal conjunction of a man and a woman being one act, it follows that a plea of supposed legality, made by either party, establishes error with respect to both; and hence the punishment of both is abrogated.

Punishment is incurred by connexion with the slave of a brother.—If a man have carnal connexion with the bondmaid of his brother, or of his uncle, he incurs punishment, although he should plead that he had conceived her to be lawful to him, because between such relations no community of interest exists. And the law is the same with respect to the female slaves of all other relations within the prohibited degrees, excepting those who are related to the man within the parental degree (such as his father or his son), because between him and those prohibited relations no community of interest exists.

Connexion with a woman married by mistake does not occasion punishment.—If a man engage in a contract of marriage with a woman, and another woman be sent to him,* the female relations declaring her to be the woman married to him by such contract, and he have carnal communication with that woman, he does not incur any punishment; but yet he must pay the woman her dower, because Alee once passed a decree to this effect;—and he also subjoined, in his decree that the woman should observe an Edit:—moreover the man has proceeded upon apparent proof, namely, the information of the woman's female relations, with respect to the subject of his error, since men can have no personal knowledge of or acquaintance with their wives prior to the matrimonial engagement; and hence the man in this case is the same as a person acting under a deception. And the accuser of this person does not incur the punishment of slander, because possession by marriage, requisite to legalize generation, is in no respect established. There is an opinion recorded in Aboo Yoosaf, that the accuser is liable to punishment, because the carnal conjunction is to all appearance legal, with respect to the man, according to the information of the woman's female relations, and of course his accuser becomes liable to punishment, as a decree must be founded upon what is apparent.

If a man have carnal connexion with a woman whom he finds in his own bed, punishment is incurred by him, because there can be no error where he passes any length of time in the company of his wife, and thence his apprehension of this woman being his wife, from the circumstance of his finding her in bed, is not regarded, so as to prevent punishment:—the reason of this is that sometimes a relation of the wife, residing in the house with her, may sleep upon her bed. And the law is the same where the man is blind, because it is always in his power to ask and discover who the woman is; and he may also discover this by the sound of her voice. But yet if he invite the woman to the act, and she consent, signifying that “she is his wife,”—and he copulate with her, in this case he does not incur punishment, as he is deceived by the woman's declaration and behaviour.

Connexion with a woman under an unlawful marriage does not induce punishment.—If a man marry a woman whom it is not lawful for him to marry, and afterwards have carnal connexion with her, he does not incur punishment, according to Haneefa; but if he be at the time aware of illegality, he is to be corrected by a Tazeer, or discretionary correction. The two disciples and Shafei have said that he is liable to punishment, when he marries the woman, being aware of the illegality, because, as the contract has not been executed in regard to its proper subject, it is of course void; for here the woman is not a proper subject of marriage, because the proper subject of marriage, or of any other deed, is a thing which is a proper subject of the effects of such deed; now one of the effects of marriage is the legalizing of generation; but as the woman is among those who are prohibited to the man, the contract of marriage with her is consequently nugatory, in the same manner as a contract of marriage between man and man. The argument of Haneefa is that the contract has taken place in regard to its proper subject, as the woman is a proper subject of marriage, because the proper subject of any deed is a thing which admits of the ends intended being obtained from it; now the end of marriage is the procreation of children, and to this every daughter of Adam is competent; the case therefore admits of the contract being engaged in with respect to all its effects, and of all its effects being obtained from it; but on account of the prohibition in the sacred text, the legalization of generation is not obtained; and such being the case error is occasioned, as error is a thing which is the appearance of a proof, and not the substance of one; and as, in the present case, the man has perpetrated an offence for which the stated punishment, or Hidd, is not appointed, Tazeer, or discretionary correction, must be inflicted.

Acts of lasciviousness are to be corrected by Tazeer.—If a man commit any act of lasciviousness with a strange woman, such as Takhfeez,* he is to be corrected by Tazeer, since such acts are illegal and forbidden by

* It is almost unnecessary to remark that, from the nature of the Mussulman customs, a man can never be supposed to have seen his wife until after marriage,—the woman being utterly excluded from the sight of all men except her relations within the prohibited degrees.

 Penem fricens inter femora.

the word of God: but a stated punishment is not appointed for them; Tazeer must therefore be inflicted upon that person.

And so likewise sodomy, committed with a strange woman.—If a man copulate with a strange woman in ano—(that is, commit the act of sodomy with her), there is no stated punishment for him, according to Haneefa; but he is to be corrected by Tazeer. The Jama Sagheer directs an aggravation of the Tazeer or correction in this case, and says that the offender must be kept in a place of confinement until he declare his repentance. The two disciples have said that as this act resembles whoredom, the person committing it is subject to the stated punishment for whoredom; and there is one opinion of Shafei to this effect; but another opinion of his is that the parties should be put to death, of whatever description they may be—that is, whether they be married or not—because the prophet has said, “Slay both the ACTIVE and the PASSIVE” (or, according to another tradition, “Stone both the AGENT and the SUBJECT”).—The argument of the two disciples is that the act in question has the property of whoredom, as that is defined to be “an act of lust committed in that which is the object of the passion, completely, and under such circumstances as to be purely unlawful, and where the design is the injection of Semen.” Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that his conjunction is not actual whoredom, because the companions of the prophet have disagreed concerning their decrees upon it, for some of them have said that offenders of this kind should be burnt, some, that they should be buried alive, others, that they should be cast headlong from some high place, such as the top of a house, and then be stoned to death—and so forth: moreover, the conjunction in question has not the property of whoredom, as it is not the means of producing offspring, so as (like whoredom) to occasion any default in birth or confusion in genealogy;—besides, this species of carnal intercourse is of less frequent occurrence than whoredom, because the desire for it exists only on the part of the active and not of the passive, whereas in whoredom the desire exists equally on both sides. As to the tradition cited by Shafei, it probably relates to a case where an extraordinary and exemplary punishment is requisite; or where the perpetrator inculcates and insists upon the lawfulness of the act.

And bestiality.—If a man commit bestiality he does not incur Hidd, or stated punishment, as this act has not the properties of whoredom, for whoredom is a heinous offence, as being a complete act of lust, to which men feel a natural propensity: but this definition does not apply to copulation with beasts, which is abhorred by an unperverted mind (whence it is not held incumbent to cover or conceal the genitals of brutes); and men can have no reason for desiring carnal connexion with brutes, but from the most vitiated appetite, and the utmost depravity of sentiment:—Hidd therefore is not incurred by this person; but he is to be punished by a discretionary correction, for the reasons already specified. It is recorded, also, that the beast should be slain and burnt: this, however, is only where the animal is not of an eatable species; but if it be of the eatable species it is to be eaten (according to Aboo Haneefa), and not burnt. Aboo Yoosaf holds that it should be consumed with fire in both cases, the perpetrator (where it belongs to another person) remaining responsible to the owner for the value; but yet the burning of it is not absolutely incumbent; nor is it to be burnt for any other reason than as, by this means, all recollection of so vile a fact may be obliterated, and the perpetrator shielded from the disgrace which would attach to him in case of the animal remaining alive.

Punishment is not incurred by committing whoredom in a foreign country.—If a Mussulman be guilty of whoredom in a foreign country, or in the territory of the rebels, and afterwards return into a Mussulman state, punishment is not to be inflicted upon him, on the plea that a man, in embracing the Mussulman faith, binds himself to all the obligations thereof, wherever he may be. The arguments of our doctors on this occasion are twofold;—FIRST, the prophet has said, “punishment is not to be inflicted in a foreign land;”—SECONDLY, the design of the institution of punishment is that it may operate as a prevention or warning; now the Mussulman magistrate has no authority in a foreign country, wherefore if punishment were instituted upon a person committing whoredom in a foreign country, yet the institution would be useless; for the use of the institution is that punishment may be executed; and as the magistrate has no authority in a foreign country, the execution is impossible; whence it appears that the commission of whoredom in a foreign country does not occasion punishment there: and if this person should afterwards come from the foreign territory into a Mussulman state, punishment cannot be executed upon him, because as his whoredom did not occasion punishment at the time of its being committed, it will not afterwards occasion it.

Punishment may be inflicted by the chief magistrate within his camp.—THE person to whom the authority of inflicting punishment officially appertains (such as the Khalif, for the time being, or the governor of Egypt), when he carries forth his troops upon an expedition, is at liberty to inflict punishment upon any person who may be guilty of whoredom within his camp, since the perpetrator of the offence is under his immediate authority; but chiefs or commanders of an inferior degree are not at liberty to inflict punishment upon persons guilty of whoredom within their camp, because they are not invested with authority to inflict punishment.*

Case of whoredom committed between infidel subjects and aliens.—If an alien come into a Mussulman state under a protection, and there commit whoredom with a Zimmea, or female infidel subject; or if a Zimnee, or male infidel subject, so commit whoredom with a female alien, punishment is to be inflicted upon the infidel subject (according to Haneefa), but not upon the alien. This also is the opinion of Mohammed with respect to an infidel subject, where he is guilty of whoredom with a female alien; but if an alien be guilty of whoredom with a female infidel subject, in this case he holds that there is no punishment for either party. There is also an opinion recorded from Aboo Yoosaf to this effect; but he afterwards delivered another opinion, that punishment is incurred by all the parties concerned, both by the alien and the female infidel subject, and also by the male infidel subject, and the female alien, for he argues that an alien under protection, during the time that he continues in a Mussulman territory, subjects himself to all the ordinances of the temporal law, in the same manner as an infidel subject does for life, whence it is that punishment for slander may be inflicted on an alien under protection, and that he may also be put to death in retaliation: contrary to punishment for drinking wine, as in his belief the use of wine is allowable. The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that a protected alien does not come into a Mussulman state as a resident, but is only brought there occasionally, from some particular motive, such as commerce, and the like, and therefore is not to be considered as one of the inhabitants of a Mussulman country (whence it is that he is at liberty to return into the foreign country, and also that if a Mussulman or an infidel subject were to murder a protected alien, no retaliation would be exacted of them); now a protected alien subjects himself to such of the ordinances of the law only as he himself derives an advantage from; and those are all such as respect the rights of individuals; for where he is desirous of obtaining justice for himself from others, he also subjects himself to justice being exacted on him in behalf of others; and retaliation† and punishment for slander are among the rights of individuals, but punishment for whoredom is a right of the law. The argument of Mohammed is that in whoredom the man is the principal, and the woman only the accessory, according to what was before stated; now the prevention of punishment in respect to the principal occasions the prevention of it in respect to the accessory, but the prevention of punishment with respect to the accessory does not occasion the prevention of it with respect to the principal; as in a case, therefore, where a protected alien commits whoredom with a female infidel subject, there is no punishment for the alien, so neither is there any for the infidel subject; but where an infidel subject commits whoredom with a female protected alien, punishment is to be inflicted on the subject, but not upon the alien; and the remission of punishment in respect to the alien does not occasion its remission with respect to the infidel subject, because the woman is only an accessory. Correspondent to this is the case of a man committing whoredom with a girl who is an infant, or with a woman who is insane, where punishment is inflicted upon the man, but not upon the infant or the lunatic; whereas, if a woman admit a boy or an idiot to commit whoredom with her, neither of the parties is liable to punishment. The argument of Haneefa is that the act of the protected alien is whoredom, because he is equally with Mussulmans called to the observance of certain commands and prohibitions, on account of the torments and chastisements of a future state (according to the Moozhab-Saheeh), although he be not called to the religious observances of the Law; but the woman's admitting him to commit the fact is the occasion of punishment to her: contrary to the case of the boy or the idiot, for they are not called, nor under any constraint. A difference similar to this obtains in the case of a man, who being possessed, or under the influence of magic, commits adultery with a woman not under such influence; that is to say, according to Haneefa, punishment is inflicted; but according to Mohammed it is not inflicted on either of the parties.

Whoredom committed by an infant or an idiot does not induce punishment.—If a boy or an idiot commit whoredom with a woman who, is of mature age and sound judgment, she consenting thereto, in this case there is no punishment, neither to the boy, to the idiot, nor to the woman. Ziffer and Shafei maintain that in this case the woman incurs punishment; and there is also one tradition of Aboo Yoosaf to the same effect. But if a man who is of mature age and sound judgment commit whoredom with a girl who is an idiot or an infant, capable of copulation, in such case punishment is incurred by the man alone, according to all the doctors. The argument of Ziffer is that a plea on the part of the woman does not occasion the remission of punishment with respect to the man; and in the same manner, a plea on the part of the man does not occasion punishment to be remitted with respect to the woman; because each party is responsible only for their own act. The argument of our doctors is that the act of whoredom proceeds from the man, the woman being no more than merely the subject of it, and hence it is that the man is denominated by the active term in copulation or whoredom and the woman by the passive.*

* Meaning Hidd, which being a right of the law, is a thing of too much importance to be committed to inferior persons: but every person who acts as a commander or magistrate is entitled to inflict Tazeer, or discretionary correction.

† This is an apparent contradiction, as it is said above that there is no retaliation for the murder of an alien: it is to be considered, however, that although a Mussulman, or an infidel subject, be not liable to retaliation for the murder of an alien, yet the alien would be so for the murder of a Mussulman, or an infidel subject.

OBJECTION.—The woman is also termed Zancea,† as appears in the Koran.

REPLY.—The woman is termed Zancea by a metonymical figure, which sometimes uses the active participle for the passive: or it may on this occasion be employed because the woman is the primary cause of the act of whoredom, by her admitting the man to the commission of it. Punishment, with respect to a woman, therefore, depends upon the circumstance of her admitting a man to commit the act of whoredom with her; but the act of a boy is not whoredom, as whoredom is an act proceeding from a person who has been called upon to refrain from it, and the perpetrator of which is an offender, by his commission of it; and as the act of a boy is not of this nature, it follows that punishment is not incurred by his act.

Whoredom committed upon compulsion does not subject to punishment.—If a sovereign prince should compel a man to commit whoredom, there is no punishment incurred by that man. Aboo Haneefa had held a prior opinion, that the man is liable to punishment (and such is the doctrine of Ziffer)—because a man cannot commit the act of whoredom unless the virile member be properly distended, which distension is a token of desire on his part: compulsion, therefore, cannot be proved with respect to him. The reason for the more recent opinion is that the means of compulsion (namely, the power of the sovereign), exists both actually and apparently; and the distension of the virile member is no certain proof of desire, since it sometimes occurs independent of any operation of the mind, as in sleep, for instance; this circumstance, therefore, is of no weight in competition with a fact which admits of actual proof, namely, the compulsion. But if any other person than the sovereign should compel a man to commit whoredom, the man thereby incurs punishment according to Haneefa. The two disciples have said that no punishment is incurred in this case, because the compulsion, which is the obstruction to the punishment in the former cases may also proceed from others than the sovereign: but Haneefa argues that this species of compulsion cannot be supposed to proceed from any except the sovereign; because no other person is possessed of the means of such compulsion, since the sovereign is enabled to repel it in all inferior persons, as the sovereign authority is instituted by the law for the purpose of repelling tyranny; and also, because all others stand in awe of the sovereign, and hence no such compulsion can proceed from them. It is to be remarked that the learned in the law impute this difference of opinion between Haneefa and the two disciples to the difference of the times in which they lived; for in the time of Haneefa, others than the sovereign were not possessed of any power which it was not in the sovereign's power to repel; but in the time of the two disciples every petty ruler possessed a power independent of the sovereign, and hence the compulsion of others than the sovereign afforded (in those times) a ground of doubt sufficient to prevent punishment.

Case of one of the parties confessing whoredom, and the other pleading marriage.—If a man make a confession four times, at four different appearances [before the Kazeer], "that he has committed whoredom with such a woman," and the woman should thereupon declare, "that he had married her,"—or, if a woman should thus make confession that "such a man had committed whoredom with her," and the man should plead that "he had been already married to her,"—in this case no punishment falls upon either party, because the plea of marriage is possibly true, and therefore occasions a demur; but the man owes the woman a dower, since the enjoyment of the woman's person cannot be admitted gratuitously, as a woman's person is an object of respect.

Case of whoredom with the female slave of another, who dies in consequence.—If a man commit whoredom with the female slave of another, to such a degree as that the said female slave dies, the man incurs two penalties,—one, the punishment of whoredom, and the other, the payment of the value of such slave to her owner,—because he has here committed two offences, whoredom and murder, and hence the law is to be carried into execution with respect to both. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that punishment is not incurred by the man, because the obligation of responsibility, which lies upon him, is a cause of his property in the slave; and the occurrence of a cause of property, before punishment has taken place, prevents the infliction of it (as where a thief, for instance, purchases the property stolen of the proprietor before his hand is struck off), and is the same as if a man were first to commit whoredom with a female slave, and then to purchase her of her master, in which case he incurs punishment, according to Haneefa, but not according to Aboo Yoosaf, and so in this case likewise. Haneefa and

* [In the original] "The man is denominated the Watee, or Zanee, and the woman the Mowtoo, or Moozneea." The two first are the active participles meaning the copulator, and the whoremonger; the two second are these terms expressed in the feminine participle passive. It is not easy to convey the full force and meaning of such passages in any translation.

† The fem. act. part. from Zinna.

Mohammed say that the responsibility, in this case, is a responsibility for murder (in the manner of the Deeyat, or fine of blood), which does not occasion a right of property [over the slain].

Or who goes blind.—If a man commit whoredom with the female slave of another, to such a degree that she loses her sight, he owes the price of the said slave to her owner and punishment drops, because the slave, by the man being thus responsible for her value, becomes his property, and she is still actually existing, wherefore the circumstance of his thus obtaining a property in her occasions a demur sufficient to prevent the punishment.

The sovereign is not punishable, but is responsible for property, and liable to retaliation.

If a supreme ruler (such as the Khalif, for the time being) commit any offence punishable by law, such as whoredom, theft, or drunkenness, he is not subject to any punishment (but yet if he commit murder he is subject to the law of retaliation, and he is also accountable in matters of property),—because punishment is a right of God, the infliction of which is committed to the Khalif [or other supreme magistrate], and to none else; and he cannot inflict punishment upon himself, as in this there is no advantage, because the good proposed in punishment is that it may operate as a warning to deter mankind from sin, and this is not obtained by a person's inflicting punishment upon himself: contrary to the rights of the individual, such as the laws of retaliation, and of property, the penalties of which may be exacted of the Khalif, as the claimant of right may obtain satisfaction either by the Khalif empowering him to exact his right from himself, or by the claimant appealing for assistance to the collective body of the Mussulmans. And punishment for slander, (although it be in some shape a right of the individual), is subject to the same rule with other punishments which are a right of God, as the learned have declared that in the punishment for slander the right of God is chiefly considered.

CHAPTER III.

OF EVIDENCE IN WHOREDOM, AND OF RETRACTION THEREFROM.

Delay in giving evidence destroys the validity of it, except in cases of slander.—If witnesses bear evidence at a distant period * [after the perpetration of the alleged offence], where there had existed no obstruction (such as their distance from the magistrate, and so forth), their testimony is not to be credited, except in a case of slander. It is recorded in the Jama Sagheer,—“If witnesses bear evidence against any person, with respect to theft, or wine-drinking, or whoredom, after a certain period of time shall have elapsed, such testimony is not to be received; but yet the person so accused of theft is responsible for the value of the goods alleged to have been stolen.” The principle upon which this case proceeds is, that all evidence, with respect to such punishments as are purely a right of God, is vitiated and rendered void by such a delay in the production of it amounts to Takadim: but with Shafei it is not rendered void, for he considers those punishments as a right of the individual, and supposes evidence under the circumstance to be the same as confession inducing punishment; that is to say, as distance of time [Takadim] does not affect the validity of confession, inducing a distant punishment, so in the same manner distance of time does not forbid the reception of evidence respecting the rights of the individual, because it is apparent that the evidences speak truly: and the same reason holds in such punishments as are purely a right of God.—The argument of our doctors is that a witness in a penal cause has two things at his option, both equally laudable; the first, evidence to an offence committed against the laws; the second, the veiling and concealment of infirmity:—now if it be admitted that the delay in giving in the evidence arose from the charitable motive last mentioned, it follows that any subsequent evidence could only arise from motives of malice, or of private interest, exciting the witness thereto, in which case the witness incurs a suspicion destructive of the validity of his evidence: if, on the other hand, the delay should not have arisen from a wish to cover infirmity, the person giving evidence after such delay must be held unworthy of attention, as having for so long a time neglected that which was incumbent upon him, namely, the giving of evidence;—from all which it follows that, after such a lapse of time as amounts to Takadim, the witnesses are clearly liable to suspicion, either from their falsity, or their unworthiness; and this suspicion impugns the credibility of their testimony. This case is contrary to a case of confession, as men do not bear malice against themselves; and punishment for whoredom, or wine-drinking, or theft, are purely a right of God, whence the retraction of a person who makes a confession inducing such punishments is approved; and for this reason, distance of time in those instances forbids the reception of evidence: but punishment for slander is a right of the individual, as by it the scandal is removed from the person accused by the slanderer; (whence the retraction of a person acknowledging his having slandered another is not admitted);—and distance of time, in a case which regards the rights of the individual, does not impugn the credibility of the evidence, as the witnesses here do not fall under any suspicion of sinister motives from delay in their testimony, since the claim of the plaintiff is conditional to the admission of evidence concerning the rights of the individual, and therefore their delay in giving evidence is to be attributed to the plaintiff not having called for it. All this is contrary to a case of punishment for theft, in which the evidence of witnesses is invalidated by delay, because the witnesses, by their delay in bearing testimony, become subject to suspicion of sinister motives, as here the claim is not a condition of punishment, since the punishment is purely a right of God, the claim being a condition only in matters of property; and also, because theft is chiefly committed during the night, at a time when the owner of the property is asleep and unwatchful, wherefore it is incumbent upon the witnesses to apprise the proprietor of the theft, and to bear testimony to it; but as, in a case of distance of time, or Takadim, they have not so borne evidence, they become criminal and unworthy of credit from their neglect.

* Arab. Mootkadim: this is the participle from Takadim; by which is understood such a distance of time as suffices to prevent punishment. It operates in a way somewhat similar to our statutory limitations.

Delay also prevents punishment, after the Kazee's decree of it.—TAKADIM, or distance of time, as it prohibits the admission of evidence in the first instance, so it prohibits (according to our doctors) the infliction of punishment after the decree of the Kazee: if, therefore, the convicted person were to abscond, after having received a part of his punishment, and, after the lapse of a period sufficient to constitute Takadim, be taken and brought back, the remainder of the correction cannot then be inflicted upon him,—because the infliction of the whole punishment is included in the Kazee's decree; and a part of it stands in the same predicament with the whole; and as the Kazee, because of distance of time, could not decree punishment, so neither can he, in the same circumstance, decree the infliction of the remainder of the punishment.

Limitation of the delay in question.—THERE are various opinions among the learned respecting the limitation of the Takadim, or distance of time, now under consideration. In the Jama Sagheer the limitation of it appears to be six months; and the same is mentioned by Tahavee. Haneefa does not prescribe any limitation, but leaves it to the discretion of the magistrate, to be determined according to the customs of each respective age or country. It is recorded from Mohammed that he fixed the limitation of it to one month, as any less space of time falls within the description of Ajil* (and there is a record from Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf to the same effect); and this last is the most approved doctrine, where the witnesses are not at the distance of a month's journey from the Kazee; but where there is a distance of a month's journey between them, their testimony must be credited, because there appears on this occasion an obstruction to their giving evidence, namely, their distance from the Kazee; and hence they are not in such a case liable to suspicion. The limitation of Takadim, in respect to the punishment of wine-drinking, is also the same, according to Mohammed. According to the two Elders the limitation of it is confined to the going off of the smell of the liquor, as shall be hereafter demonstrated.

The evidence of the witnesses is valid against one of the parties, although the others be absent.—If witnesses bear evidence against a person "that he has committed whoredom with a certain woman," and the woman be absent, yet punishment must be inflicted on the man: but if witnesses bear evidence against a man that he has committed theft, and the owner of the property stolen be absent, the hand of the accused cannot be cut off. The difference between these two cases is that in theft the previous claim of the plaintiff is a necessary condition to the admission of evidence, but not in whoredom; and the owner of the property stolen being absent, no claim can be instituted.

—It would appear that, in the case of whoredom also, punishment ought not to be inflicted on the man, because it is possible that if the woman were present she might advance some plea productive of a demur.

Y.—This is a conclusion founded on mere conjecture, and therefore of no weight.

Unless the other be unknown.—If witnesses give evidence against a man "that he has committed whoredom with a woman whom they do not know," punishment is not to be inflicted upon the man, because it is possible that the woman may be his wife, or his slave, and this, with respect to a Mussulman, is most probable. But if a man make confession that "he has committed whoredom with a woman unknown," punishment must be inflicted on him, since, if the woman with whom he committed the fact had been either his wife or his slave, she could not have been unknown to him.

Case of a contradiction in the evidence.—If two witnesses give evidence against a man, that "he has committed whoredom with such a woman, and forced her thereto," and two other witnesses give evidence to the same fact, but, with this variation, that "the woman was consenting."—In this case (according to Haneefa and Ziffer), punishment drops with respect to both the parties; and such also is the opinion of Shafei.—The two disciples say that punishment is in this case to be inflicted on the man alone; because the varying witnesses

* By Ajil is meant a space of time so short as not to admit of its taking the description of delay.—Thus the payment of a debt is termed Moajil [prompt] where it takes place at any time within a month after it is due.

do yet agree in this that the man has committed whoredom, which is the occasion of punishment to him; for the only difference between the witnesses is that one party of them testifies to an additional offence (namely, his having forced the woman), which does not occasion the remission of punishment with respect to him: contrary to the case of a woman, with respect to whom punishment drops, because her consent is the condition on which her being liable to punishment depends, and this consent is not proved, because of the contradiction among the witnesses. The arguments of Haneefa on this point are twofold;—FIRST, the evidence is contradictory with respect to the man, because whoredom is one act, committed by two persons, the man and the woman,—and as the evidence is contradictory with respect to the woman, it must be held so with regard to the man likewise;—SECONDLY, the two witnesses who bore testimony to the consent of the woman are slanderers, and consequently their testimony is unworthy of any credit.

OBJECTION.—From this it would appear that punishment for slander is incurred by them, whereas it is not so.

REPLY.—Punishment for slander cannot be inflicted on them, on account of the evidence of the other two witnesses, who have deposed to force having been used by the man; for the woman can no longer be considered as married, in the sense which induces punishment for slander, since the description of married (in this sense) is not applicable to a woman after she has been enjoyed unlawfully, although she be forced.

Contradiction among the witnesses, in regard to the place, prevents punishment.—If two witnesses bear evidence against a man, that “he has committed whoredom with such a woman in Koofa,” and two others, “that he had committed such whoredom with that woman in Basra,” in this case punishment drops with respect to both the man and the woman, because the circumstance alleged is the act of whoredom, and that is contradicted by the contradiction with respect to the place. The evidence to the fact is here in both instances defective, but yet the witnesses are not liable to punishment for slander, because of a demur, as the fact of whoredom, to which they bear testimony, is one single whoredom with respect to the perpetration of it, since the whoremonger is the same person, and the whore is also the same person, in the evidence of the contradictory witnesses on both sides, and there is no difference except with respect to the place in which the fact was committed. But if witnesses contradict each other, by two persons bearing evidence that such a man has committed whoredom with such a woman in such a spot of such a house, and by two other persons giving evidence that the man had committed the whoredom with that woman in another spot of the house, in this case punishment is to be inflicted upon that man. This is upon a favourable construction.* Analogy would suggest that punishment is not incurred, since there is also in this case a positive contradiction with respect to the place in which the fact was committed. But the reason for a more favourable construction is that a coincidence between the testimonies may be conceived, by supposing the act to have been begun in one corner of the house, and completed in another corner, in consequence of the motions of the parties; and it is also possible that the act may have been committed in the middle of the house, and a person seeing it from the front may conceive it to be performed in the fore part of the house, and another viewing it from the back part may conceive it to be performed in the back part of the house; and each bears evidence according to his own conception.

Evidence, agreeing in point of time, but contradictory in point of place, does not occasion punishment.—If four witnesses bear evidence against a man “that he has been guilty of whoredom with such a woman at sunrise in Hind” (a place near Koofa, which is also called the place of Abdal-Rihman), and four other witnesses give evidence against the man that “he has been guilty of whoredom with such a woman at sunrise in Nooklila” (which is also a place near Koofa), in this case neither the man nor the woman are liable to punishment for whoredom, nor are their accusers liable to punishment for slander. The accused are not liable to punishment for whoredom, because the testimony of the contradicting witnesses must, on one part, be false, although it be impossible to ascertain on which side of the evidence the falsehood lies; and the accusers are not liable to punishment for slander, because it is possible that the evidence on one side may be true; and as this possibility applies equally to both parties, punishment for slander cannot be inflicted upon either.

Evidence against a woman who is afterwards proved to be a virgin is void.—If four witnesses bear testimony against a woman, that “she has committed whoredom with such a man,” and it should appear, upon examination made by females employed for that purpose, that the woman is still a virgin, in such case neither of the persons thus accused are liable to punishment for whoredom; nor are the accusers liable to punishment for slander, because the evidence of the females employed to examine the woman accused is a proof which suffices to prevent the infliction of punishment for whoredom upon the parties accused; but it is not a proof sufficient to subject the accusers to punishment for slander;* punishment for whoredom, therefore, is not inflicted on the accused; nor are the accusers liable to punishment for slander.

Incompetent witnesses, by bearing testimony to whoredom, incur punishment for slander.—If four witnesses give evidence against a man that “he has committed whoredom with such a woman,” and it should happen that these witnesses are blind, or have ever been punished for slander; or that one of them is a slave, or has been punished for slander; in this case the witnesses are all liable to punishment for slander; but the accused does not incur punishment for whoredom; because, as a matter of property cannot be determined by the evidence of such witnesses, it is impossible that punishment should be established by it; and the witnesses, where they are all blind, or have all before suffered punishment for slander, are incapable of bearing evidence; and where one of them is a slave, he is totally incapable of bearing evidence; and so also of one of them who has before suffered punishment for slander. By their evidence, therefore, even a doubtful whoredom is not established; and hence their testimony becomes converted into slander; wherefore they are slanderers, and punishment for slander is consequently incurred upon them.

The evidence of reprobate persons is neither attended with punishment for whoredom to the accused, nor with punishment for slander to the accusers.—If four witnesses bear evidence to whoredom at a time when they are reprobate;† or if this character should be affixed upon them by competent proof after they have given evidence, they are not liable to punishment for slander; because, although the evidence of a reprobate person be defective, from his veracity being liable to suspicion on account of the badness of his character, yet he is a competent witness, inasmuch that if a Kazei issue a decree upon the evidence of a reprobate person, his decree is valid, according to our doctors. The evidence of reprobate persons, therefore, goes to establish a doubtful whoredom, and they are consequently not exposed to punishment for slander; and since, moreover, from the defect in their testimony, on account of their being reprobate, a doubt appears that whoredom has not been committed, the accused are therefore not liable to punishment for whoredom. Shafei dis-sents from our opinion concerning this case, as he holds a reprobate person to be incapable of being an evidence, and, consequently, that he stands in the same predicament as a slave.

Witnesses defective in point of number incur punishment for slander.—If fewer than four persons bear evidence to whoredom, punishment for slander is applicable to them. This effect is induced because, although their testimony be good, yet testimony to whoredom is so accounted only where it amounts to evidence; and the testimony of fewer than four persons, in a case of whoredom, is not evidence so as to be accounted good; wherefore it is slander.

And so also, of the complete number of witnesses, where one of them afterwards proves incompetent; but no fine is due in this case, except the accused suffer lapidation, when a deyit is due from the public treasury.—If four persons bear evidence against a man, that “he has been guilty of whoredom,” and the Kazei should inflict punishment for whoredom upon the parties accordingly, and it should afterwards appear that one of the witnesses is a slave, or has at any time been punished for slander, punishment is incurred by all the witnesses, as the witnesses are on this occasion only three in number. Observe, however, that in this case no Arish, or fine of damage, is due on account of such flagellation, either from the witnesses or from the public treasury; but if, in consequence of the evidence, the person accused should have been stoned to death by a sentence of lapidation, the Deyit, or fine of blood, is due from the public treasury. This is the doctrine of Haneeffa. The two disciples say that the fine of damage is also due from the public treasury in the former case. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this difference of opinion obtains where the accused happens to be cut by the stripes he has received. The two disciples also hold that if the accused should chance to die in consequence of the correction by scourging, the fine of blood is due from the public treasury—in opposition to Haneeffa; and likewise, that if the witnesses should retract from their evidence after the accused has been cut by scourging, or died in consequence thereof, they [the witnesses] become responsible for the fine of damage in the first instance, or the fine of blood in the second. The argument of the two disciples is that, in consequence of the testimony of the witnesses, stripes are to be inflicted generally,* whether they be of a cutting nature or otherwise, since to avoid cutting is not always in the executioner's power; the scourging, therefore, which is due in consequence of the testimony of the witnesses, comprehends both cutting stripes and also stripes which do not cut, and consequently the cutting is to be referred to the testimony of the evidences, whence they are responsible for the same, where they retract from their testimony. But where the witnesses do not retract (that is, where their evidence is set at nought, not by retraction, but by one of them being afterwards discovered to be incompetent), the fine of blood is due from the public treasury, because the act of the executioner is to be referred to the Kazeé, and the Kazeé acts on behalf of the community of Mussulmans, wherefore the atonement for the act falls upon that which is the property of all the Mussulmans, namely, the public treasury, in the same manner as in a case of wounds or retaliation. The argument of Haneefa is, that as nothing is due in consequence of the testimony of the witnesses, further than punishment (by which is understood such a scourging as excites pain, but such as evidently cannot prove destructive, except through the fault of the flagellator, proceeding from his carelessness or incapacity), the cutting, therefore, is to be referred to him alone, and not to the testimony of the witnesses; but yet (according to the Kawayet-Saheeh) the scourger is not made responsible, lest men should be deterred from the infliction of punishment, by an apprehension of being made answerable for the consequences of it.

* Because it is, notwithstanding, possible that the act may have been performed upon the woman, although not to such a degree as to destroy the appearances of virginity.

† Arab. Fasik. It is elsewhere rendered unjust; but the term here adopted approaches, perhaps, nearer to the real meaning. Fasik signifies a person who neglects decorum in his dress and behaviour, and whose evidence, therefore, is not held to be admissible.

* That is, not restricted to any particular description of stripes.

The testimony of secondary witnesses invalidates that of primary witnesses.—If four witnesses bear testimony to an evidence given by four other witnesses, against a man, of his having committed whoredom, punishment is not to be inflicted upon the person so accused, because evidence in support of evidence introduces an increase of doubt, since wherever, in the recital of a fact, the channels of communication are multiplied, the doubt of its truth increases in proportion; and there is in this case no necessity for considering the secondary witnesses in the light of original witnesses. And if the four original witnesses should afterwards come and bear testimony of themselves to the whoredom, in the place where the secondary witnesses had before given their evidence, here also no punishment is to be inflicted on the accused, because their testimony has already been rejected in one shape, in consequence of the rejection of the testimony of the secondary witnesses, respecting the same fact, as the secondary witnesses are the substitutes of the primary witnesses, from the circumstance of those having directed them, and thrown the matter upon them. But here punishment for slander is not to be inflicted on either the original or the secondary witnesses, because both are complete in point of number, although punishment for whoredom be not inflicted, on account of a doubt, which is such as suffices in bar of punishment for whoredom, but is not sufficient to subject the witnesses to punishment for slander.

One of four witnesses retracting, after lapidation upon the accused, incurs punishment for slander, and is responsible for one-fourth of the fine of blood.—If four witnesses give evidence against a man, that he has committed whoredom, and he suffer lapidation, and one of the witnesses afterwards retract, punishment for slander is to be inflicted upon him alone, and he is also responsible for one-fourth of the fine of blood. The reason for one-fourth only of the fine of blood being due from him is that three-fourths of the veracity of the evidence remain, in consequence of the evidence of the three remaining witnesses still continuing; by the evidence, therefore, of the witness who retracts, only one-fourth of the veracity is affected.—(Shaefi says that the death of the retracting witness is incurred, and not a fine upon his property, according to his tenets concerning witnesses in retaliation, as shall be hereafter shown in treating of Deyit.)—That punishment for slander is incurred by the witness is the opinion of our three doctors. Ziffer says that punishment for slander is not due, because, if the slanderer be considered as the slanderer of a living person, his slander is rendered void by the death of that person; or, if he be considered as the slanderer of a defunct, the said defunct has suffered lapidation under a sentence of the Kazeé, whence originates a demur respecting the propriety of punishment for slander. The argument of our doctors is that evidence to whoredom does not become slander, in consequence of retraction, on any other account than as the evidence is thereby cancelled; the evidence, therefore, at the time of retraction, is rendered slander with respect to the dead; and a person who slanders a married person defunct is liable to punishment for slander. With respect to what Ziffer advances (that the defunct has suffered lapidation under a sentence of the Kazeé, which gives rise to a demur respecting the propriety of punishment for slander), we reply; that upon the evidence, which is the proof, being cancelled by retraction, the decree of the Kazeé, sentencing lapidation, does not give rise to any demur in bar of punishment for slander; wherefore punishment for slander is to be inflicted upon him who retracts from his testimony: contrary to what would be the case if any other than the retracting person were to slander him who had suffered lapidation, as the latter is not a Mahsan in respect to any other person, since the sentence of the Kazeé against the deceased is, with regard to that other, proper and just.

But if he retract before lapidation, all the witnesses are liable to punishment.—What is now advanced regards a case where one of the witnesses retracts, after lapidation: but if one of them were to retract before the execution of lapidation, after sentence has been passed by the Kazeé, in this case punishment for slander is to be inflicted on all the witnesses; and the punishment of the accused is remitted. This is the doctrine of the two Elders. Mohammed says that, in this case also, punishment for slander is to be inflicted on the retracting witness alone, because the evidence of the witnesses has been corroborated by the Kazee's sentence, and therefore is not cancelled except with respect to the retractor alone,—in the same manner as where the witness retracts after the execution of the sentence.—The argument of the two Elders is, that the infliction of punishment is only a supplement to the sentence of the Kazee; the retraction in the present instance, therefore, is the same in effect as if one of the witnesses were to retract before the sentence had been passed (for which reason punishment drops with respect to the accused); and if one of the witnesses were to retract previous to the Kazee's sentence of lapidation, punishment for slander would be inflicted upon all of them. Ziffer says that in this case also punishment for slander would be inflicted on the retracting witness alone, because his retraction is not of account with regard to any except himself. The argument of our doctors is that the declaration of the witnesses is radically slander, and does not become evidence until it be so rendered by a sentence of the Kazee, passed in conformity to it; and where this sentence has not been passed, such declaration continues to be slander, as it radically was; wherefore punishment for slander is to be inflicted upon all of them.

One of five witnesses retracting, does not incur either punishment or fine.—If five persons bear evidence [to whoredom], and one of the five retract after lapidation, no penalty whatsoever is incurred by the witness so retracting—because, four witnesses still remaining, the evidence remains complete. But if, afterwards, one of the remaining four witnesses should retract, punishment for slander is then due upon both retractors, and each is indebted in one-fourth of the fine of blood. Punishment for slander is due upon them, because evidence to whoredom is rendered slander by subsequent retraction, as before explained; and they are each indebted one-fourth of the fine of blood, because, by the three persevering witnesses still remaining, three-fourths of the validity of the body of evidence continues unimpaired, as the perseverance of those who remain is regarded, and not the retraction of those who draw back (according to what is said upon that head in its proper place); and as only one-fourth of the veracity is destroyed by the retraction of these two witnesses, it follows that they remain responsible for one-fourth only of the fine of blood.

Where justified witnesses prove afterwards defective, the fine of blood is due from the purgators of these witnesses.—If four witnesses give evidence of whoredom against a man, and these witnesses be justified by

Tazkeat,* and the accused suffer lapidation, and it should afterwards appear that those witnesses were idolaters, or slaves (by the purgators retracting their evidence of justification, and declaring them to be slaves, or idolaters), in this case the fine of blood is due from the purgators, according to Haneefa. The two disciples say that in this case the fine of blood falls upon the public treasury. Some hold that this difference exists only where the purgators, in their retraction, declare that their justification of the witnesses had been according to the best of their knowledge and belief at that time. The argument of the two disciples is that the purgators have done nothing more than merely speaking in commendation of the witnesses, in the same manner as if they were to speak in commendation of the accused, by testifying to his being within the description of Insan,† in which case nothing is due from them, and so here likewise. The argument of Haneefa is, that testimony of the witnesses is not proof, nor worthy of any regard, but through the justification of the purgators; wherefore the justification is, in reality, the efficient cause of the sentence; whence the sentence must be referred and attributed thereto: contrary to their bearing testimony to the Insan of the accused, as that state is conditional to a person being considered a Mahsan,—that is, married; under such circumstances as (in case of whoredom) subject him to lapidation. It is also to be remarked that, whether the before-mentioned justifier should pronounce the justification in the proper and formal terms of evidence,—(thus, “We testify that . . . witnesses are freemen and believers”) or not in the formal terms of evidence,—(as thus, “These are freemen and believers,”) the effect is in both cases the same, and there is no difference whatever between them; this, however, holds only where the purgators restrict their justification to the freedom or faith of the evidences, as above; but if they should say, “These witnesses are ‘adils,”‡ and it should afterwards appear that they are slaves, in this case the purgators are not responsible for the fine of blood; because slaves are, in some instances, of the descriptions of adils:—neither are the witnesses, in this case, responsible for the fine of blood, as their declaration does not amount to evidence; * nor are they subject to punishment for slander, because their accusation was made against a living person, but that person is now dead, and his heirs cannot procure punishment for slander to be inflicted on them, as it is not inheritable. If the purgators persevere in their justification, or have unknowingly borne testimony therein, and it should afterwards appear that the witnesses are of an incompetent description, nothing whatever falls on the purgators:—but in this case the fine of blood falls upon the public treasury.

* That is, by a certain number of other witnesses bearing testimony to the competency, &c. of witnesses who are giving evidence in any cause, the former being denominated the Moozkees, or purgators; the nature of this mode of justification is exhibited at large in treating of Evidence.

† That is, by testifying that the accused is married, under such circumstances as freedom, and so forth, as (in case of whoredom) subjects a person to lapidation.

Case in which the fine of blood falls upon the slayer.—If four persons bear testimony of whoredom against a man, and the Kazeé sentence him to be stoned, and any person should slay him, and it should afterwards appear that the above witnesses were incompetent, in such case the fine of blood falls upon the slayer, according to a favourable construction of the law.—Analogy would suggest, in this case, that retaliation is incurred, as the slayer has killed an innocent person without cause: but the reasons for a more favourable construction of the law are twofold: First, the Kazeé's sentence of lapidation was, in appearance, regular and valid, at the period of slaying, and hence was established an erroneous admissibility of slaughter: contrary to a case in which the accused is slain before the Kazeé issues his decree of lapidation, as the testimony of the witness is not proof until then.—SECONDLY, the slayer has acted under a conception that the slaying of that man became allowable, he having a confidence in the argument of such permission, namely, the Kazeé's sentence of lapidation; and hence it is the same as where a person slays another, supposing him, from former circumstances, to be an enemy, in which case the fine of blood is incumbent upon that person, and so here likewise.—It is to be observed that the fine of blood thus incurred is a charge upon the estate of the slayer, and does not fall upon his tribe, because it is wilful homicide, for which the tribe is not responsible: and this fine of blood must be discharged within three years [after the perpetration of the fact], as being due on account of homicide. But if no person were in this manner to slay the accused, and he suffer lapidation by the sentence of the Kazeé, and it should afterwards appear that the witnesses were incompetent, the fine of blood in this case falls upon the public treasury, because the persons who stone the accused act in conformity with the order of the Kazeé, and hence their act must be referred to the Kazeé; and as, if the Kazeé were to execute the sentence upon the accused with his own hands, the fine of blood would fall upon the public treasury, so also it falls upon the same, where any other person executes such sentence under the Kazeé's authority. This case is evidently contrary to one where the Kazeé passes a sentence of lapidation, and another person slays the accused in a different manner, and not by stoning; for in so doing he has not acted in conformity to the order of the magistrate.

Evidence to whoredom is valid, although the knowledge of the fact be unlawfully obtained.

—If witnesses bear evidence of whoredom against a man, declaring that "they had come to the knowledge of it by wilfully looking into the person's private apartment at the time of the fact," yet such evidence is to be credited, nor is it to be rejected on account of the manner in which the knowledge of the witnesses was obtained, as their looking was allowable, in order that they might be enabled to bear evidence; they are therefore the same as physicians or midwives.*

The accused's plea of celibacy, if unfounded, does not prevent lapidation.—If four witnesses bear evidence of whoredom against a man, and the accused should plead that "he is not a married man," and it should happen that he has a wife who has brought forth a child to him—(in other words, should deny the consummation of his marriage, after the establishment of all the conditions of it), he is to be stoned, because the effect of the establishment of the child's parentage† is a consequence of his having had carnal communication with his wife (whence it is that if he were to pronounce a divorce upon her, a divorce reversible takes place);—and his being a married man is established, on account of the aforesaid effect: and if the wife should not have borne a child, yet if one man and two women, as witnesses, bear testimony to the marriage of the accused, in this case lapidation is to be inflicted upon him. Shaféi says that the accused, in this case, does not suffer lapidation; and this his opinion is founded on his doctrine in the laws of evidence, that "the testimony of women is not admissible, excepting in cases of perty."—Ziffer remarks that the circumstance of the accused being a married man, although it appear to be only the condition of the sentence, yet is in reality the cause, as rendering the offence more atrocious; wherefore the sentence must be referred to that circumstance; and this condition being, in reality, the occasion thereof, the evidence of women cannot be admitted in it, any more than with respect to the original offence, namely, the whoredom. Thus it is the same as where two infidel subjects of the Mussulman government testify concerning a Mussulman

* Because they afterwards appear (from the retraction of the purgators) to be incompetent evidences.

* To explain this it may be proper to remark that a person's looking into the private apartment of another is an unlawful act, which, if it was not justified by the motive, would invalidate his testimony.

† Established in him in virtue of his marriage.

slave, who has committed whoredom, that "his master had emancipated him before the perpetration of the fact," which testimony would not be admitted, because the Ihsan of the slave [that is, his being a free married man] is so far a condition of the sentence as to be, in reality, a cause of it. The argument of our doctors is that marriage in a state of freedom is an honourable state, and is repugnant to the commission of whoredom (as was already stated), wherefore this circumstance cannot be, in reality, a cause of the sentence. The testimony, therefore, of the witnesses to the Ihsan of the accused is the same as their testimony in any other case than whoredom; and as their testimony to his Ihsan would in other cases be credited, so also in a case of whoredom: contrary to the case of the two infidel subjects and the slave, as cited by Ziffer, because there the freedom of the slave is proved by the testimony of those two witnesses: but it is not thereby proved that the date of the slave's freedom was antecedent to the commission of whoredom, either because a Mussulman denies such date, or because that circumstance would be injurious to a Mussulman. If the witnesses who testify to Ihsan retract, yet they are not responsible for the fine of blood: contrary to the doctrine of Ziffer, according to what was before observed.

CHAPTER IV.

OF HIDD SHIRKUB, OR THE PUNISHMENT FOR DRINKING WINE.

General rule.—If a Mussulman drink wine and be seized whilst his breath yet smells of the wine, or he brought before the Kazee whilst he is yet intoxicated therewith, and witnesses give evidence, that "he has drunk wine," punishment for wine-drinking is to be inflicted upon him; and in the same manner, punishment is incurred by him when he makes confession of having drunk wine, whilst his breath yet retains the smell; because the offence of wine-drinking is proved upon him, and Takadim, or distance of time,* does not appear, since the flavour of the wine still remains. This doctrine is originally founded upon a precept of the prophet, "Whoever drinks of wine, let him suffer correction by scourging, as often as he drinks thereof."

Punishment is not inflicted in a case of confession or accusation, made after the smell is gone off.—If a man make confession of having drunk wine, after the smell has ceased, in this case punishment is not to be inflicted upon him, according to the two Elders. Imam Mohammed maintains that it is to be inflicted. The same difference of opinion obtains in a case where witnesses bear evidence against a man that "he has drank wine" after the smell has ceased. The reason of this diversity of opinion is that Takadim, or lapse of time, forbids the reception of evidence in a case of wine-drinking, according to all the doctors: but Mohammed fixes the limitation of Takadim, in wine-drinking, to a certain time, namely, one month (according to the most approved authorities), he conceiving an analogy between this, and a case of whoredom, because delay is established by lapse of time, and not by the ceasing of a smell; and the existence or non-existence of smell is of no weight, as there are other things the flavour of which resembles that of wine. According to the two Elders, on the contrary, Takadim is established by the non-existence or departure of the smell, for two reasons: FIRST, a decree of Abdoola Ibn Massaod, who, when certain persons brought before him a man charged with drinking wine, directed that "they should examine his breath, and that, if any flavour of wine were discovered, punishment should then be inflicted upon him;" SECONDLY, the existence of the effect (namely the smell), is an irrefragable proof of wine having been lately drunk. And as to what Mohammed advances, that "there are other things the flavour of which resembles that of wine," it may be replied that the difference between the smell of wine, and other articles, may be easily distinguished by one who is possessed of judgment and discernment, nor can any but ignorant persons be doubtful concerning it. Thus, according to Mohammed, CONFESSION of wine-drinking is not rendered ineffectual by distance of time, in the same manner as (according to him) confession of whoredom is not rendered ineffectual by distance of time, agreeably to what was before advanced:—with the two Elders, on the contrary, punishment for wine-drinking is not to be inflicted but on the condition that the smell still remain, because Ibn Massaod stipulated that condition, as before stated.

Unless this be owing to an unavoidable delay in bringing the accused to the seat of justice.—If witnesses seize a drinker of wine* at a time when he is intoxicated, or whilst he still retains the smell of the liquor, and carry him to a city where there is a Kazee, and in the mean time the flavour or the intoxication should cease, before they arrive at the seat of justice, yet in this case punishment for wine-drinking is to be inflicted upon that person, according to all our doctors, because there is an excuse for the delay, analogous to that which is created by distance of place in a charge of whoredom; and the witnesses are not suspected where such excuse exists.

Punishment is incurred by drinking Nabeez.
a person be intoxicated by drinking

* This case supposes his being seized in some remote place, at a distance from the seat of justice.

* See the preceding Chapter; p. 188.

Nabeez,* punishment is incurred by him, because it is related of Omar that he decreed punishment for wine-drinking upon a wild Arab, who was intoxicated by drinking that liquor.—(The punishment for drunkenness, and the degree of scourging in the punishment for wine-drinking, shall be hereafter explained.)

*The smell alone does not suffice for conviction, without evidence;—*If the smell of wine be discovered upon a person, or he should vomit wine, yet if witnesses have not actually seen him drinking it, punishment is not incurred, because the smell alone leads but to a very uncertain conclusion, as this appearance may proceed either from the person having drank wine, or from his having sat among wine-drinkers, from whom he may have contracted the smell;—and it is also possible that wine may have been administered to him by force, or menaces, in which case no punishment is incurred.

Nor intoxication, unless it be known to proceed from wine.—PUNISHMENT for wine-drinking is not incurred by intoxication alone, unless it be known that the person has been intoxicated by the voluntary drinking of wine, or of Nabeez, because men are sometimes inebriated by the use of articles which are permitted, such as the juice of Henbane, or mare's milk; and men may also be sometimes compelled to drink wine, which is not a punishable offence, when thus committed by compulsion.

Punishment not to be inflicted during intoxication.—PUNISHMENT is not to be inflicted upon a wine-drinker, whilst he is intoxicated, nor until his intoxication shall have ceased, in order that the end thereof (namely determent) may be obtained.

Punishment for wine-drinking to a free person is eighty stripes.—THE punishment of a free person, for drinking wine or other intoxicating liquor, is eighty stripes, on the authority of all the companions; and those eighty stripes are to be inflicted in every respect under the same rules and restrictions as in the case of whoredom, according to what is mentioned under that head: and (according to the Rawayet Mashhoor), the wine-drinker must be stripped naked to receive his punishment. It is recorded from Mohammed that the offender must not be stripped, as nothing concerning the punishment for wine-drinking occurs in the sacred writings, wherefore it is expedient, for the sake of lenity, that a wine-drinker be not stripped to receive correction. The reason for what is recorded in the Rawayet Mashhoor is that one kind of lenity is already shown in the number of stripes prescribed, those in whoredom being one hundred, whereas in wine-drinking there are only eighty; hence it is not requisite that a second sort of lenity be shown in the mode of infliction.

* A fermented liquor made by steeping dates, raisins, &c., in hot water. It is described particularly in another place.

And, to a slave, forty stripes.—If the drinker of wine be a slave, male or female, the punishment for wine-drinking, with respect to such, is forty stripes only, because the state of bondage induces only half punishment, as has been repeatedly mentioned.

Confession may be retracted.—If a person make confession to the drinking of wine, or any other intoxicating liquor, and afterwards retract from such confession, punishment is not to be inflicted upon him, as the punishment of wine-drinking is purely a right of God.

The offence is proved by two witnesses, or, by one confession.—WINE-DRINKING is proved on the testimony of two witnesses; and also by confession once made. It is recorded from Abou Yoosaf, that two confessions are requisite. But it is to be observed that the evidence of women against men is not admissible in wine-drinking, because the evidence of females is liable to variation, and they may be also suspected of absence of mind, or forgetfulness.

Degree of intoxication required to induce punishment.—THE degree of intoxication which occasions punishment amounts to this, —that the person so intoxicated be not able to distinguish what is said to him in any shape;—nor to know a man from a woman. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that this is the doctrine of Hancefa. The two disciples have said that the degree of drunkenness which induces punishment is sufficiently found in the intoxicated person speaking confusedly and indistinctly, as it is from this that drunkenness is generally understood. Many doctors agree with the two disciples in this point. The argument of Hancefa is that the drinking of wine is among the causes of punishment, wherefore it is to be noticed only in the excess; for in acts which are causes of punishment the excess of them only is regarded, on account of seeking a pretext for the purpose of averting punishment; and excess of drunkenness appears in the intoxication so far overpowering the reason as not to leave the person a capacity of distinguishing one object from another.—(In ascertaining the illegality of intoxication produced by drinking any other liquor than wine, regard is had to what the two disciples maintain concerning the punishment for drunkenness produced by wine-drinking.)—Shafei, in the punishment for drunkenness, has regard to the appearance of the effect produced by the wine, in the intoxicated person's walking, or other actions, by his staggering or turning giddy when he attempts to walk; but our doctors say that such effect may proceed from different causes, as they sometimes do not attend drunkenness, and sometimes occur in other cases (such as weakness for instance), wherefore this species of effect is not regarded.

Confession of any offence, made during intoxication, is not regarded.—If a person, during a fit of intoxication, should make confession of anything which occasions punishment (such as whoredom for instance), no punishment is to be inflicted upon him, as in such a confession, there is apprehension of falsehood, and this apprehension is to be regarded so far as to avert punishment, since punishment [Hidd] is purely a right of God:—it is otherwise, however, in punishment for slander; for if a man in a state of intoxication were to make confession of slander, punishment for slander must be decreed upon him, because this is not purely a right of God, but is also a right of the individual, and therefore a state of drunkenness is here the same as a state of sobriety, for the sake of inflicting a penalty, in the same manner as in all other matters, such as divorce, manumission, and so forth.

Nor apostacy.—If a man, during intoxication, should apostatize from the faith, his wife is not thereby divorced from him, because infidelity depends upon what may be a person's belief, and that cannot be ascertained during drunkenness.

CHAPTER V.

OF HIDD KAZAF, OR THE PUNISHMENT FOR SLANDER.

Definition of Kazaf.—KAZAF, in its primitive sense, simply means accusation. By Kazaf, in the language of the law, is understood a man insinuating a charge of whoredom against a married man or woman; the person so acting being termed the Kazif, or slanderer; and the man or woman so scandalized the Makzooif, or slandered.

Punishment for slander to be ordered by the magistrate.—If any person expressly accuse of whoredom a man or woman who is married,* in such case, if the accused require the magistrate to pass sentence of punishment for slander upon that person, the magistrate is bound to order its infliction.

The punishment, to a freeman, is eighty stripes.—THE punishment for slander is eighty stripes, if the slandered be free, because God has so commanded in the Koran, saying,—“BUT AS TO THOSE WHO ACCUSE MARRIED PERSONS OF WHOREDOM, AND PRODUCE NOT FOUR WITNESSES, THEM SHALL YE SCOURGE WITH FOURSORE STRIPES.” And the conditions upon which this punishment is to be inflicted are twofold:—FIRST, That the accused make requisition thereof, because of his right being involved in it, inasmuch as scandal is by that means removed from him;—SECONDLY, That the accused be a married man, this being particularly specified in the text already quoted.

It is necessary that the eighty stripes [or strokes] be inflicted on different parts [or limbs] of the offender, in conformity to what has been already advanced upon that subject with respect to the punishment for whoredom: but it is to be observed that the person suffering this correction is not to be stripped naked, because the occasion of the punishment is not absolutely certified, since it is possible that the accuser may have spoken truly, for which reason it must not be inflicted with severity, as in punishment for whoredom. The outer garment or robe, however, together with any clothes which are stuffed or quilted, must be removed, because such a covering would prevent a person from feeling his punishment.

And to a slave forty stripes.—If the accuser be a slave, the punishment for slander with respect to him is forty stripes; as bondage induces only half punishment,—according to what has been before repeatedly observed upon that head.

Description of a person the slandering of whom induces punishment.—THE state of marriage of the slandered person [which is a requisite condition of punishment to the slanderer] requires that he or she be free, of sound judgment, of mature age, and a Mussulman; and also of chaste repute; that is to say,—free from any suspicion of adultery: there are, therefore, five conditions required in it; FIRST,—The freedom of the accused, because the word of God says, “UPON THEM” (that is upon female slaves) “IS DUE HALF THE PUNISHMENT THAT IS DUE UPON MAHSANAS,”—Where the word Mahsanas, by the context, implies free women, in opposition to slaves, whence it appears that the term married [Mahsan] here applies only to free people;—SECONDLY, Sanity of intellect, and, THIRDLY, Maturity of age,—because infants and idiots are not liable to be scandalized, as whoredom cannot be proved upon such;—FOURTHLY, Islam, because the prophet declared, “A Polytheist is not a Mahsan:” and FIFTHLY,—Chastity, because no scandal attaches to any other persons than those who are of chaste repute, and the accuser of an unchaste person, moreover, speaks truly.

Cases which constitute slander.—If a person deny another's parentage, as if he were to say to him, “Thou art not the son of thy [reputed] father!” such person thereby incurs punishment for slander: this, however, is only where the mother of the person thus addressed is a married woman, because such denial is a positive accusation with respect to the mother of that person, since the legitimacy of a child cannot be denied unless it be begotten in whoredom.

If one person, in the heat of passion, say to another, “Thou art not the son of such-a-one,” and the person mentioned be his father, and his descent be established as from him, in this case the person so speaking incurs punishment for slander. But if these words be spoken in any other circumstance than the heat of passion, punishment for slander is not incurred by the speaker, because such words, if spoken in wrath, imply malicious and wanton abuse, whereas, if uttered in a calm and deliberate moment, they may mean no more than an upbraiding, by denying any likeness between the person spoken to and his father, in point of goodness of disposition, such as benevolence and so forth.

* Without producing the number of witnesses requisite to prove the charge. •

If a man say to another, "Thou art not the son of such-a-one," and it should happen that the person named is the grandfather of him who is thus addressed, the speaker does not incur punishment for slander, because his assertion is literally true. And, in the same manner, if a man should declare another to be the son of one who is his grandfather, he does not thereby incur punishment for slander, because the child's child is metaphorically referred to the grandfather, and is called his child.

Case of a claim of punishment for slandering a defunct.—If a man call another "a son of a whore," and it should happen that the mother of him who is thus addressed is dead, and had been a married woman, in such case, if he [the son] require punishment for slander to be inflicted upon the speaker, the same must be inflicted accordingly, because the speaker has slandered a married woman after her death. It is to be observed, however, that a right to demand punishment for slander, in behalf of a deceased person, belongs only to one in whose parentage a flaw is created by the imputation, and this is either the parent or the child, because scandal attaches to the child of the accused, and hence the slander applies to the child also in effect. According to Shafei, any heir may demand punishment for slander in behalf of a person deceased, because punishment for slander is held by him to be a matter of inheritance, as shall be hereafter demonstrated. According to our doctors, on the other hand, the power of demanding punishment for slander in behalf of a person deceased is not in the way of an inheritance, but for a reason already intimated, that the scandal arising from the slander attaches to the deceased;—whence it is that the right to demand punishment for slander on behalf of a defunct appertains to one who may be excluded from inheritance by the murder of the person from whom he inherits; and that it also appertains to the child of the daughter, in the same manner as to the child of the son (contrary to the opinion of Mohammed); and also, that it appertains to the child's child during the lifetime of the former (contrary to the opinion of Ziffer);—and so also, that if the deceased person who was slandered were married, it is lawful for that person's child to demand the punishment for slander, although such child should be an infidel, or a slave. This last is also contrary to the opinion of Ziffer, who argues that if the right of demanding punishment for slander, in behalf of a defunct, were to rest with the child, being an infidel, it must so appertain, either in the manner of an inheritance, or on account of his being a party, because of the slander extending to him by effect (since the scandal arising from it attaches to him); and both these inferences are unsupported; the first, because punishment for slander is not a matter of inheritance; and the second, because, as an express accusation of whoredom made against the child does not induce punishment for slander (since an infidel cannot be a married person in the sense which subjects the accuser to punishment), so, in a case where the slander is established with respect to him by effect only, it does not induce punishment a fortiori. —Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that, in the case in question, the slanderer, by accusing a married person, has fixed a stain upon the child, for which he will seek satisfaction by punishment for slander:—the principle upon which this proceeds is that the circumstance of the accused being a married person is made a condition [of punishment upon a slanderer], in order that, in the charge of whoredom, the imputation of a stain upon him may be completely established, after which such imputation of a stain descends to his child; and such is the case in the present instance: and although the child be an infidel, yet infidelity does not prevent a claim of right: contrary to a case where an express accusation is advanced against the child himself; for in this case punishment for slander is not incurred, because here the imputation of a stain does not completely exist, as marriage (in the sense which would induce punishment for slander), does not exist with respect to the accused, on account of his being an infidel.

A slave cannot demand punishment upon his master; nor a son upon his father.—A SLAVE is not permitted to demand punishment for slander upon his master,—where the latter has slandered his mother, being a married woman;—neither does it belong to a son to demand punishment for slander upon his father,—where the latter has slandered his mother, being a married woman;—because a master is not liable to any chastisement on account of his slave, nor a father on account of his son; whence it is that retaliation is not executed upon a father on account of his son, nor upon a master on account of his slave. But if the mother should have another son by another father, that son may demand punishment for slander to be inflicted, on behalf of his mother, upon the father aforesaid, because the occasion for punishment (namely, slander) is in that case fully established, and the obstacle to the demand of it does not exist in the person who demands it.

The decease of the slandered party prevents punishment.—If any person accuse another of whoredom, and the person so slandered die, punishment for slander is not incurred. Shafei maintains that punishment is not to be remitted. And in the same manner, if the slandered person should die after the infliction of a part of the punishment upon the slanderer, the remaining part thereof ceases, according to our doctors.—Shafei alleges that it does not cease. This difference of opinion obtains because punishment for slander is a matter of inheritance, according to Shafei, whereas according to our doctors it is not so. It is to be observed that there is no difference of opinion concerning the punishment for slander being a right of God, and also a right of the INDIVIDUAL;—because the punishment for slander has been ordained by the LAW for the purpose of removing scandal from the person slandered, and the advantage results solely to the slandered, on which account, punishment for slander is a right of the individual;—and it has also been ordained for the purpose of determent (whence punishment for slander is termed *Hidd), and the design of the institution is to purify the world from sin, and this demonstrates that punishment for slander is a right of God:—some of the rules in it, moreover, prove punishment for slander to be a right of the individual, such as that “it cannot be decreed but where some person sues for it,” which is a right of an individual;—and, on the other hand, some of its rules prove punishment for slander to be a right of God, such as, that “the exaction of it is committed to the magistrate, and not to the person slandered.”—In short, in the punishment for slander there are two contending principles; and such being the case, Shafei gives the first principle the preference, namely, the right of the individual, considering that as superior to the right of God, the right of the individual being preferable, because of his being necessitous, whereas God is not necessitous: our doctors, on the other hand, give the second principle the preference, and hold it to be the superior, because in whatever degree the right of the creature may be concerned, the Creator is the surety, and the guarantee thereof; and hence the conversation of the rights of the individual is therein obtained: but the case is not the same in the reverse of this proposition, because there is no authority to exact the right of God, but in the way of a vicarious delegation. These different tenets, as held by each party, are notorious; and from them proceeds a contradiction of opinion respecting a variety of cases in punishment for slander. Thus, according to Shafei, punishment for slander is an inheritance; but in the opinion of our doctors it is not so, as inheritance obtains only in the rights of the individual, and not in the rights of God.—Again, the remission of it is not approved by our doctors; but, according to Shafei, it is approved: and again, it is not lawful to accept of anything in lieu of punishment, according to our doctors; but, according to Shafei, this is lawful. It is recorded that the opinion of Abou Yoosaf respecting remission is the same with that of Shafei.

Confession of slander cannot be retracted.

—If a person make confession of slander, and afterwards retract from such confession,

* See the definition of Hidd in the beginning of this book.

his retraction is not to be credited, because, as the right of the slandered person is therein concerned, it is to be supposed that he will falsify the retraction:—contrary to such punishments as are purely a right of God, where the retraction must be admitted, as there is no person concerned to oppose the veracity of it.

A term of abuse does not constitute slander.

—If a man were to call an Arab a Nabathean,* punishment for slander is not incurred by him, because he is here supposed only to speak comparatively,—implying merely that the person he addresses is a Nabathean in badness of disposition, or in want of virtue: and in the same manner, if a man were to say to an Arab “Thou art not an Arab,” no punishment would follow for the same reason.

If a man say to another, “O son of the rain,” he is not a slanderer, because these words may be considered as implying purity and softness of manners, as rain is distinguished by the qualities of purity and softness. •

If a man, in speaking to another, should declare him to be the son of any of his parental relations other than his father, such as his maternal or paternal uncle, or his stepfather, he is not a slanderer, because it is common to bestow the appellation of father upon each of these relations, in the same manner as upon the natural parent.

Equivocal accusation of whoredom incurs punishment for slander:—

If a man, being in anger, say to another Zinte-fecal-Jiblee,† and should plead that he thereby meant “you climbed up the hill,” yet punishment for slander is to be inflicted on him, according to the two Elders. Mohammed maintains that punishment is not to be inflicted on him, because the word Zinte means ascending, in its literal sense, and the mention of a mountain proves that such is intended by it. The argument of the two Elders is that Zinte is used to express whoredom also; and the circumstance of anger proves that by the word Zinte whoredom is intended; wherefore punishment is to be inflicted, in the same manner as if the term Zinte had been used without any mention of a mountain, and he were to say that by Zinte he meant ascent.

If one man were to say to another Zinte ali-al Jiblee,‡ according to some doctors

* The Nabatheans are a tribe upon the confines of Joak, remarkable for the barbarity and ferocity of their manners.

† This may be either translated “you committed whoredom in the mountain,” or “you ascended the mountain,” as the term Zinta signifies not only whoredom, but also “climbing, or ascending.”

‡ Literally, “You ascended upon the mountain,” or, “You have committed whoredom upon the mountain.” The word Alee [upon] is the only difference between this and the preceding case.

punishment for slander is not incurred by him, because the mention of a mountain, in this place, demonstrates that by Zinte he meant ascending; but according to others, punishment for slander is incurred, because a situation of passion and abuse proves the meaning of the speaker to be whoredom.

And so also mutual recrimination.—If one man should say to another “Thou art a whoremonger,” and the other should answer “Nay, but thou,”—they both incur punishment for slander, as attempting each to fix an imputation of whoredom upon the other.

Recrimination between a husband and wife induces punishment for slander upon the wife.—If a man should say to his wife “Thou adulteress!” and she should answer, saying, “Nay, but thou!” punishment for slander is incurred by the woman: and there is no Laan in this case; because the husband and wife are both equally accusers; but the accusation advanced by a husband against his wife induces Laan; and that by a wife against her husband induces punishment for slander; and punishment for slander is here first inflicted upon the woman in order to prevent Laan, as a person who has suffered punishment for slander is incapable of making Laan; for if this arrangement were reversed (that is to say, if the Laan were previously required of the woman), neither the Laan nor the punishment would drop: the punishment, therefore, is to be first inflicted, in order that Laan may be prevented; for it is laudable to seek a remedy by which Laan may be avoided, because that is also punishment in effect.* But if the wife, in the example here recited, were to reply to her husband, “I have committed adultery with you,” in this case there is neither punishment for slander, nor Laan; for there is a doubt concerning both punishment and Laan, as it is possible that the woman may allude to a fact of whoredom committed before marriage, in which case punishment for whoredom would be incurred by the woman, and not Laan, she having, by her reply, confirmed the assertion of her husband, in thus imputing whoredom to him; but by the husband nothing would be incurred, as he does not confirm her assertion: and, on the other hand, it is also possible that she may allude to carnal connexion after marriage, as if she were to say [in explanation],—“My adultery consisted in your having connexion with me, after our marriage, against my will” (and this, in such a situation,* is the most probable meaning of her words), in which case Laan would be incumbent upon the woman, and punishment for slander would not be incurred by her, as the accusation is made by the husband, and not by the wife: and in consequence of these two contradictory possibilities, a doubt exists equally with respect to Laan and punishment for slander; wherefore neither is to be insisted on.

Case of acknowledgment of a child, and subsequent denial.—If a man should have acknowledged a child born of his wife, and should afterwards deny it, in this case Laan is incumbent, because the parentage of the child has been established in him by his previous acknowledgment, and by his subsequent denial an accusation is implied with respect to his wife, who is the mother of the child; he must therefore make Laan. But if he should first deny the child, and afterwards acknowledge it, in this case punishment for slander is to be inflicted upon him, because when he thus falsifies, Laan is prevented, as Laan is a sort of punishment imposed from the necessity of the case, owing to a mutual falsification,† in which punishment for slander is the original thing, and hence, in a case where the mutual falsification is done away,‡ that which is the original must be put in force. The parentage also of the child is established in this man, in both these cases, since he has acknowledged it, whether such acknowledgment be made before denial, as in the former instance, or after denial, as in the latter.

OBJECTION.—In the former instance, upon Laan becoming incumbent, it should follow that the parentage of the child is not established.

REPLY.—Bastardy is not a necessary consequence of Laan, for Laan may be imposed without bastardizing the child, in the same manner as where a man denies a child after a long lapse of time from the period of the birth, in which case Laan is incumbent, and the child is not bastardized, but its parentage remains established;—as, on the contrary, a child may be bastardized in a case in which Laan is not incumbent; as where a husband denies a child born of his wife, who is a slave, in which case the child is bastardized, but Laan is not incumbent.§

If a man were to say to his wife “This is neither my child, nor yet yours,” in this case Laan is not incumbent, nor is punishment for slander due, as the husband here merely denies the child being born of his wife, and

* And if the wife were first required to make Laan, and the punishment for slander (which the Laan would not prevent), were afterwards inflicted on both parties,* she would (by this mode of proceeding) suffer, in effect, two punishments, which is unlawful. To understand this rightly it is necessary to remark that the imposition of an oath is considered as a violence or hardship amounting to punishment.

* Of recrimination and scolding.

† Where the wife denies the husband's assertion, and the husband denies the chastity of his wife.

‡ By one of the parties confessing the other to be in the right; as the husband here does, by acknowledging the child after having denied it.

§ Owing to the wife being a slave.

a husband is not a slanderer by such denial.

Accusation of a woman who has children destitute of any acknowledged father is not slander.—If a man accuse of whoredom a woman who has children, the father of whom is unknown, or if he should so accuse a woman who has made Laan, in consequence of any of her children having been denied [by her husband], whether such children be living or not,—in neither of these cases is punishment for slander incurred, because the signs of whoredom are found with the woman, namely, her children, who are without any acknowledged father: the reputation of this woman is therefore questionable, on account of these signs; and perfect chastity of repute in the accused is one condition of punishment for slander being incurred by the accuser. But if a man were to accuse of whoredom a woman who has made Laan in consequence of an imputation of adultery made against her by her husband, and not on account of his denial of her children, in this case punishment for slander is to be inflicted upon the accuser, since here no signs of whoredom are found with the woman.

Accusation against a person who has unlawful commerce with a woman is not slander.—If a man have unlawful commerce with a woman in whom he has no right of cohabitation,* punishment for slander is not to be inflicted upon his accuser, because chastity of repute is not applicable to the accused (and this is conditional to his being married, in the sense which induces punishment for slander upon the accuser), and also, because the accuser in this instance speaks truly.

Under certain restrictions.—It is to be observed as a rule, that punishment for slander is not incurred by the accusation of any person guilty of such a carnal conjunction as is in its own nature unlawful, because the term whoredom [Zinna] signifies a carnal conjunction of this description: but where a person forms such a carnal connexion as is unlawful on some other account, punishment for slander is incurred by the accusation of him, as a carnal conjunction of this description is not whoredom. The connexion of a man with a woman who is not his property in any shape whatever (such as a strange woman), or with one in whom he has no property in some one shape (as in a partnership slave, for instance), is unlawful in its own nature; so also is his connexion with a woman who is his slave, but who is one with whom cohabitation is unlawful to him by a perpetual illegality (such as his foster-sister); but his connexion with a slave with whom cohabitation is unlawful to him by such an illegality as is not of a perpetual nature (as in the case of one with whose sister he cohabits, either as his wife, or as his slave), is unlawful, on another account.* Abou Haneefa (in the case of illegal cohabitation under a perpetual illegality) makes it a condition† that the perpetual illegality be universally admitted and established upon the authority of the most generally accepted traditions, so as to be determined and known beyond all doubt or dispute: for example, if a man were to accuse another, who had carnal connexion with a partnership female slave, in this case punishment for slander is not to be inflicted upon the accuser, because the accused appears to have committed the act with one who is his property in one shape, but not in another. But if a man were to accuse a person who has cohabited with his female slave, being a Pagan, or with his own wife during her courses, or with his Mokatiba, punishment for slander is incurred by the accuser, because here the illegality (supposing the existence of the right of property) is merely of a temporary nature, continuing only until the removal of those obstacles (namely, Paganism, or the courses, or the contract of Kitabat); this illegality, therefore, is illegality on another account, and hence the act is not whoredom. It is recorded from Abou Yoosaf that the carnal conjunction of a man with his Mokatiba occasions the destruction of Ihsan in him; and such is also the opinion of Ziffer, because a Mokatiba is not her owner's property in respect to carnal enjoyment (whence it is that if a master commit that act with his Mokatiba, he becomes responsible for her Akir‡): our doctors, on the other hand, observe that the person of the Mokatiba is the property of her master, but that the enjoyment thereof (with respect to the master) is illegal on another account,§ since it is an illegality which continues only until such time as the Mokatiba appears unable to pay her ransom, or the contract of Kitabat be broken. If a man accuse a person who has had carnal connexion with his female slave, being his foster-sister, punishment for slander is not due upon the accuser, because carnal connexion with this slave is prohibited to the master by a perpetual illegality; and this is approved doctrine.

* That is to say, although it be not unlawful in its own nature, yet it is made so by circumstances: but this is not a perpetual illegality, as the prohibition (in the instance here cited) would be removed by the death or other means of removal of the sister: contrary to perpetual illegality, which, existing in the subject herself, can by no means be removed.

† Of the act amounting to whoredom.

‡ Meaning the portion which is to be paid to her in the manner of a dower.

§ That is, not in its own nature, but occasioned by circumstances.

* There are many cases of this description which do not amount to whoredom, as may be seen under the head of Erroneous Connexion, &c.

Punishment is not due for slandering a deceased Mokatib.—If a person accuse a deceased Mokatib who may have left effects sufficient to discharge his ransom, yet punishment for slander is not due upon the accuser, because here is a doubt with respect to the perfect freedom of the Mokatib, the companions differing in opinion upon this point.

Or a convert (before his conversion).—If a person accuse a Mussulman convert, who, whilst yet a Pagan, had married his mother, punishment for slander is to be inflicted upon the accuser, according to Haneefa; but the two disciples allege that it is not due. The foundation of this difference of opinion is that the marriage of a Pagan with his own mother is approved among the Pagans, according to Haneefa; but the disciples hold that it is not approved, as was explained at large in the book of Marriage.

Punishment is incurred by an Infidel who slanders a Mussulman.—If an Infidel, residing under protection in a Mussulman state, should accuse a Mussulman, punishment for slander is incurred by him, because, in punishment for slander, the rights of the individual are concerned, and the protected Infidel has undertaken to pay a due observance to the rights of individuals, since, as he himself desires to be screened from injury, it follows that he undertakes that he will not offer injury to others; and also, that he subjects himself to the consequence, if he should do so.

A Mussulman suffering punishment for slander, is incapacitated from being a witness.—If punishment for slander be inflicted upon a Mussulman, his evidence cannot afterwards be received, although he should repent. Shafei alleges that, in case of repentance, the credibility of his evidence is restored. This point will be further explained in treating of Evidence.

And an infidel also (with respect to Zimmees).—If an infidel suffer punishment for slander, his evidence becomes inadmissible, not only with respect to Mussulmans, but also with respect to Zimmees, because competency in evidence appertained to him with respect to all of his own description (namely, Zimmees), but his evidence is thenceforth to be rejected,—rejection of evidence being one of the consequences of punishment for slander. But if this infidel should be afterwards converted to the faith, his evidence then becomes admissible with respect to both classes (that is, both Mussulmans and Zimmees), because, upon his embracing the faith, he obtains, de novo, a competency in evidence which did not before exist,* and the rejection of which, therefore, is not a consequence of the punishment for slander: contrary to where a slave suffers punishment for slander, and is afterwards emancipated; for here his evidence still continues inadmissible, since, as he was not competent to appear at all as a witness, during his slavery, so as that the rejection* of his evidence might be the consequence of his having suffered punishment for slander, this circumstance will operate to that effect after his emancipation.

Case of an infidel embracing the faith during infliction of punishment.—If a single stroke be inflicted on an infidel on account of slander, and he should then embrace the faith, and the remainder of the punishment be afterwards inflicted, in such case his evidence is admissible, because the rejection of evidence is the means of rendering punishment entire and complete, and is therefore a manner of punishment; but as the degree of punishment inflicted after his having embraced the faith is only a partial correction, and not what can be properly termed punishment, the rejection of evidence is not to be considered as a manner of it.†—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that his evidence must for the future be rejected, because the degree of punishment inflicted subsequent to his conversion is the greater proportion of it, and the smaller is a dependent of the greater. But the former is the more approved doctrine.

A single punishment answers to all the previous repetitions of whoredom or wine-drinking.—If a man commit whoredom at several different times, or repeatedly drink wine, and the punishment for either be afterwards inflicted, the single punishment, in either instance, is considered as answering to all the repetitions of offence; and so also, if a person were repeatedly guilty of slander, and punishment for slander be afterwards inflicted on him. The ground of this, in the case of whoredom and wine-drinking, is that the punishment in both these instances is purely a right of God, and the design, in the infliction of it, is to deter people from the perpetration of such offences; and a probability of this end being obtained is established by a single infliction of punishment, wherefore the obtaining of it by another infliction of punishment is dubious;‡ and hence punishment cannot be inflicted a second time, because of this doubt: contrary to where a person commits whoredom, and is also guilty of slander, and of wine-drinking, for in this case a punishment is to be inflicted separately for every distinct species of offence, because each of these acts is of a nature different from either of the other two, and the design of each of them is different, wherefore, in the punishment of such acts there cannot be any coalescence.

* Meaning the inadmissibility.

† This strange sophistry turns entirely upon the meaning of the term Hidd, which is defined to be a certain stated correction completely executed, any thing short of this not being Hidd [punishment], but only chastisement.

‡ Because having been, probably, already obtained, it is (in that case) impossible that it should be obtained a second time.

* Namely, with respect to Mussulmans.

Oreslander.—AND with respect to slander, in the punishment of it the right of God is held by our doctors to be predominant, whence the same arguments apply to it as to whoredom and wine-drinking. Shafei maintains that, in the case of repetition of slander, if the slandered person be different (as if the first person slandered were Zeyd and the second Amar), or, if the person with whom the slanderer is accused be different (as if a man were to accuse Zeyd of whoredom first with one woman and afterwards with another), in this case there is no coalescence of punishment, but for each slander a separate punishment must be inflicted; for according to Shafei, in the punishment for slander, the right of the individual is predominant.

CHAPTER VI.

OF TAZEER OR CHASTISEMENT.*

Definition of the term.—TAZEER, in its primitive sense, means prohibition, and also instruction; in law it signifies an infliction undetermined in its degree by the LAW, on account of the right either of God, or of the individual; and the occasion of it is any offence for which Hidd (or stated punishment) has not been appointed; whether that offence consist in word or deed.

Chastisement is ordained by the law.—CHASTISEMENT is ordained by the LAW, the institution of it being established on the authority of the Koran, where God enjoins men to chastise their wives, for the purpose of correction and amendment; and the same also occurs in the traditions. It is moreover recorded that the prophet chastised a person who had called another perjured; and all the companions agree concerning this. Reason and analogy moreover both evince that chastisement ought to be inflicted for acts of an offensive nature,† in such a manner that men may not become habituated to the commission of such acts; for if they were, they might by degrees be led into the perpetration of others more atrocious. It is also written in the Fatavee Timoor-Tashee of Imam Sirukhsh, that in Tazeer, or chastisement, nothing is fixed or determined, but that the degree of it is left to the discretion of the Kazee, because the design of it is correction, and the dispositions of men with respect to it are different, some being sufficiently corrected by reprimands, whilst others, more obstinate, require confinement, and even blows.

And is of four orders, or degrees.—IN the Fatavee Shafee it is said that there are four orders or degrees of chastisement;—FIRST, the chastisement proper to the most noble of the noble (or, in other words, princes, and men of learning), which consists merely in admonition, as if the Kazee were to say to one of them, “I understand that you have done thus, or thus,” so as to make him ashamed;—SECONDLY, the chastisement proper to the noble (namely, commanders of armies, and chiefs of districts), which may be performed in two ways, either by admonition (as above), or by Jirr, that is by dragging the offender to the door and exposing him to scorn;—THIRDLY, the chastisement proper to the middle order (consisting of merchants and shopkeepers), which may be performed by Jirr (as above), and also by imprisonment; and FOURTHLY, the chastisement proper to the lowest order in the community, which may be performed by Jirr, or by imprisonment, and also by blows.

Chastisement may be inflicted by the imposition of a fine.—It is recorded from Abou Yoosaf that the sultan may inflict chastisement by means of property,—that is, by the exaction of a small sum in the manner of a fine, proportioned to the offence; but this doctrine is rejected by many of the learned.

Chastisement may be inflicted by any person.—IMAM-TIMOOR-TASHEE says that chastisement, where it is incurred purely as the right of God,* may be inflicted by any person whatever; for Abou Jafr Hindooanee, being asked whether a man, finding another in the act of adultery with his wife, might slay him, replied, “If the husband know that expostulation and beating will be sufficient to deter the adulterer from a future repetition of his offence, he must not slay him; but if he see reason to suppose that nothing but death will prevent a repetition of the offence, in such case it is allowed to the husband to slay that man: and if the woman were consenting to his act, it is allowed to her husband to slay her also;”—from which it appears that any man is empowered to chastise another by blows, even though there be no magistrate present. He has demonstrated this fully in the Moon-tashee; and the reason of it is that the chastisement in question is of the class of the removal of evil with the hand, and the prophet has authorized every person to remove evil with the hand, as he has said, “Whosoever among ye see the evil, let him remedy it with his own hands; but if he be unable so to do, let him forbid it with his tongue.”—(to the end of the speech).—Chastisement, therefore, is evidently contrary to punishment, since authority to inflict the latter does not appertain to any but a magistrate or a judge.—This species of chastisement is also contrary to the chastisement which is incurred on account of the right of the individual (such as in cases of slander, and so forth), since that depends upon the complaint of the injured party, whence no person can inflict it but the magistrate, even under a private arbitration, where the plaintiff and defendant may have referred the decision of the matter to any third person.

* It is difficult to separate the ideas of chastisement and punishment.—The LAW, however, considers them as being essentially distinct, since the degree of Hidd (or punishment) is specified by the LAW itself, whereas, Tazeer (which for distinction's sake we render chastisement) is committed to the discretion of the magistrate, and for this reason it is elsewhere rendered discretionary correction.

† Meaning petty offences.

* That is, where it is incurred by an offence committed merely against the LAW, and not affecting an individual.

It is to be inflicted wherever it is authorized.—CHASTISEMENT, in any instance in which it is authorized by the LAW, is to be inflicted where the Imam sees it advisable.

Chastisement is due for slandering a slave or an infidel.—If a person accuse of whoredom a male or female slave, an Am-Walid, or an infidel, he is to be chastised, because this accusation is an offensive accusation, and punishment for slander is not incurred by it, as the condition, namely, Ihsan (or marriage in the sense which induces punishment for slander), is not attached to the accused: chastisement therefore is to be inflicted. And in the same manner, if any person accuse a Mussulman of any other thing than whoredom (that is, abuse him, by calling him a reprobate, or a villain, or an infidel, or a thief), chastisement is incurred, because he injures a Mussulman, and defames him; and punishment [Hidd] cannot be considered as due from analogy, since analogy has no concern with the necessity of punishment: chastisement therefore is to be inflicted. Where the aggrieved party is a slave, or so forth, the chastisement must be inflicted to the extremity of it: but in the case of abuse of a Mussulman, the measure of the chastisement is left to the discretion of the magistrate, be it more or less; and whatever he sees proper let him inflict.

It is not incurred by calling a Mussulman an ass, or a hog.—If a person abuse a Mussulman, by calling him an ass, or a hog, in this case chastisement is not incurred, because these expressions are in no respect defamatory of the person towards whom they are used, it being evident that he is neither an ass nor a hog. Some allege that, in our times, chastisement is inflicted, since, in the modern acceptance, calling a man an ass or a hog is held to be abuse.—Others again allege that it is esteemed such only where the person towards whom such expressions are used happens to be of dignified rank (such as a prince, or a man of letters), in which case chastisement must be inflicted upon the abuser, as by so speaking he exposes that person of rank to contempt; but if he be only a common person, chastisement is not incurred: and our author remarks that this is the most approved doctrine.

The degree of it is from three stripes to thirty-nine.—The greatest number of stripes, in chastisement, is thirty-nine; and the smallest number is three. This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Abou Yoosaf says that the greatest number of stripes, in chastisement, is seventy-five. The restriction to thirty-five stripes is founded on a saying of the prophet, "The man who shall inflict scourging to the amount of PUNISHMENT, in a case where PUNISHMENT is not established, shall be accounted an AGGRAVATOR" (meaning, a wanton aggravator of punishment), from which saying it is to be inferred that the infliction of a number of stripes, in chastisement, to the same amount as in punishment, is unlawful; and this being admitted, Haneefa and Mohammed, in order to determine the utmost extent of chastisement, consider what is the smallest punishment: and this is punishment for slander with respect to a slave, which is forty stripes; they therefore deduct therefrom one stripe, and establish thirty-nine as the greatest number to be inflicted in chastisement. Abou Yoosaf, on the other hand, has regard to the smallest punishment with respect to freemen (as freedom is the original state of man), which is eighty stripes; he therefore deducts five, and establishes seventy-five as the greatest number to be inflicted in chastisement as aforesaid, because the same is recorded of Alee, whose example Abou Yoosaf follows in this instance. It is in one place recorded of Abou Yoosaf that he deducted only one stripe, and declared the utmost number of stripes, in chastisement, to be seventy-nine. Such, also, is the opinion of Ziffer; and this is agreeable to analogy.*—Mohammed, in his book,† has determined the smallest number of stripes in chastisement to three, because in fewer there is no chastisement. Our modern doctors assert that the smallest degree of chastisement must be left to the judgment of the Imam, or Kazeer, who is to inflict whatever he may deem sufficient for chastisement, which is different with respect to different men. It is recorded of Abou Yoosaf that he has alleged that the degree thereof is in proportion to the degree of the offence; and it is also recorded from him that the chastisement for petty offences should be inflicted to a degree approaching to the punishment allotted for offences of a similar nature; thus the chastisement for libidinous acts (such as kissing and touching), is to be inflicted to a degree approaching to punishment for whoredom; and the chastisement for abusive language, to a degree approaching to punishment for slander.

Imprisonment may be added to scourging.—If the Kazeer deem it fit, in chastisement, to unite imprisonment with scourging, it is lawful for him to do both, since imprisonment is of itself capable of constituting chas-

* Because, in all other cases the deduction of one from the whole number is sufficient to reduce the thing from a higher to a lower class.

† Meaning the Mabsoot.

tisement, and has been so employed, for the prophet once imprisoned a person by way of chastising him. But as imprisonment is thus capable of constituting chastisement, in offences where chastisement is incurred by their being established, imprisonment is not • lawful before the offence be proved, merely upon suspicion, since imprisonment is in itself a chastisement: contrary to offences which induce punishment, for there the accused may be lawfully imprisoned upon suspicion, as chastisement is short of punishment (whence the sufficiency of imprisonment alone in chastisement); and such being the case, it is lawful to unite imprisonment with blows.

The blows or stripes may be inflicted from the most lenient to the severest degree.—THE severest blows or stripes may be used in chastisement, because, as regard is had to lenity with respect to the number of the stripes, lenity is not to be regarded with respect to the nature of them, for otherwise the design would be defeated; and hence, lenity is not shown, in chastisement, by inflicting the blows or stripes upon different parts or members of the body. And next to chastisement, the severest blows or stripes are to be inflicted in punishment for whoredom, as that is instituted by the word of God in the Koran. Whoredom, moreover, is a deadly sin, inasmuch that lapidation for it has been ordained by the LAW. And next to punishment for whoredom, the severest blows or stripes are to be inflicted in punishment for wine-drinking, as the occasion of punishment is there fully certified: and next to punishment for wine-drinking, the severity of the blows or stripes is to be attended to in punishment for slander, because there is a doubt in respect to the occasion of the punishment (namely, the accusation), as an accusation may be either false or true; and also, because severity is here observed, in disqualifying the slanderer from appearing as an evidence: wherefore severity is not also to be observed in the nature of the blows or stripes.

If a person die in consequence of chastisement there is no fine.—If the magistrate inflict either punishment or chastisement upon a person, and the sufferer should die in consequence of such punishment or chastisement, his blood is Hiddir; that is to say, nothing whatever is due upon it; because the magistrate is authorized therein, and what he does is done by decree of the LAW; and an act which is decreed is not restricted to the condition of safety. This is analogous to a case of phlebotomy; that is to say, if any person desire to be let blood, and should die, the operator is in no respect responsible for his death; and so here also. It is contrary, however, to the case of a husband inflicting chastisement upon his wife; for his act is restricted to safety, as it is only allowed to a husband to chastise his wife; and an act which is only allowed is restricted to the condition of safety, like walking upon the highway. Shafai maintains that, in this case, the fine of blood is due from the public treasury; because, although where chastisement or punishment prove destructive, it is Kattl Khota, or homicide by misadventure (as the intention is not the destruction, but the amendment of the sufferer), yet a fine is due from the public treasury, since the advantage of the act of the magistrate extends to the public at large, wherefore the atonement is due from their property, namely, from the public treasury. Our doctors, on the other hand, say that whenever the magistrate inflicts a right of God upon any person, by the decree of God, and that person dies, it is the same as if he had died by the visitation of God, without any visible cause; wherefore there is no responsibility for it.

BOOK X.

OF THE LAWS RESPECTING LAKEETS, OR FOUNDLINGS.

Definition of Lakeet.—LAKEET, in its primitive sense, signifies any thing lifted from the ground:—the term is chiefly used to denote an infant abandoned by some person in the highway:—in the language of the LAW it signifies a child abandoned by those to whom it properly belongs, from a fear of poverty, or in order to avoid detection in whoredom.—The child is termed Lakeet, for this reason, that it is eventually lifted from the ground, wherefore this term is figuratively applied, even to the property which may happen to be found upon it. The person who takes up the foundling is termed the Mooltakit, or taker-up.

The taking up of a foundling is laudable, and (in some cases) incumbent.—THE taking up of a foundling is laudable and generous, as it may tend to preserve his life. This is where the finder sees no immediate reason to suppose that if the child be not taken up it may perish;—but where he sees reason to apprehend that it may otherwise perish, the taking of it up is incumbent.

A foundling is free.—A FOUNDLING is free; because freedom is a quality originally inherent in MAN; and the Mussulman territory, in which the infant is found, is a territory of freemen, whence it is also free: moreover, freemen, in a Mussulman territory, abound more than slaves, whence the foundling is free, as the smaller number is a dependant of the greater.

And is maintained by the State.—THE maintenance of a foundling is to be defrayed from the public treasury; because it is so recorded from Omar; and also, because, where the foundling dies without heirs, his estate goes to the public treasury; and as that is the property of the Mussulman community, his maintenance must be furnished from this property, since as the advantage results to the community, the loss also falls upon the community;—whence it is that the Deyit, or fine of blood, is due from the public treasury, where a foundling commits manslaughter.

A foundling owes nothing to his Mooltakit for subsistence unless he furnish it by order of the magistrate.—THE Mooltakit is not to exact any return from the foundling, on account of his maintenance, since in maintaining him he acts gratuitously, as he has no authority over him:—he therefore cannot exact any return from the foundling,—except where he has furnished him maintenance by order of the magistrate, in which case this maintenance is a debt upon the foundling, because, the magistrate's authority being absolute, he is empowered to exact the return from the foundling.

No person can take a foundling from his Mooltakit but by virtue of a claim of parentage.—If any person take up a foundling, no other person is at liberty to take the foundling from him, because the right of charge of the foundling is established in him, as he first laid hands upon it.—If, however, any person claim the foundling, saying, "This is my child," the claimant's declaration is credited on a principle of benevolence. This is where the Mooltakit does not advance any claim of parentage: but if the Mooltakit also make a claim, saying, "This is my child," he has the preference, because both parties are upon an equal footing with respect to their claim; but one of them, namely, the Mooltakit, is in immediate possession, and is therefore preferred to the other. Analogy would require that the declaration of the claimant be not credited, because in consequence of it the right of the Mooltakit is destroyed: but the reason for a more favourable construction of the law in this particular is that the claim of the plaintiff is a declaration upon a point which is advantageous to the infant, as he thereby obtains the honour of an avowed parentage, and the disgrace of a want of parentage is by the claim removed from him. Some have asserted that the declaration in question is valid only with respect to the establishment of parentage, but not with respect to the destruction of the Mooltakit's right of possession;—and some, again, say that upon the parentage being established, the Mooltakit's right of possession is destroyed, because one consequence of an establishment of parentage is that the father has a preference, in the charge of his child, over all others.

A Mooltakit's claim of parentage with respect to his foundling is admitted.—If a Mooltakit declare his foundling to be his own child, after having already declared it to be a foundling, some say that his declaration is valid, both from analogy, and also on a principle of benevolence, because his claim respects a thing already in his hands, and is uncontroverted,—nor is any other person's right thereby destroyed. The better opinion, however, is that his claim is valid only on a principle of benevolence, and not from analogy, because the Mooltakit contradicts himself, as he at first declared the child to be a foundling, and afterwards avers it to be his own child;—and the reason for a more favourable construction is that the contradiction respects a thing of a concealed nature, since it is possible that this child may have been born to his wife, without his knowledge, and that he afterwards comes to a knowledge of the circumstance.

Case of a claim of parentage made by two persons.—If two persons advance a claim together, each asserting—"the foundling in the hands of such a person is my child," and one of them point out a particular mark upon the foundling's body, and not the other, the foundling is adjudged to him, because apparent circumstances bear testimony in his favour, as the mark corresponds with his declaration. But if neither of them point out any particular mark, the foundling is adjudged to both of them, because they are both upon a footing with respect to the ground of their claim. If one of them, however, lay his claim first [that is, before the other], the foundling is adjudged to him because his right is established at a time when no person controverted it;—except where the other brings evidence, as evidence is more powerful than a simple claim.

A foundling discovered by a Zimnee in a Mussulman territory is a Mussulman.—If a foundling be taken up in a Mussulman city or village, and a Zimnee claim it as his child, the parentage is established in the Zimnee, but the child is a Mussulman. This proceeds upon a favourable construction; because the claim of the Zimnee involves two points, I. a declaration of parentage, which is advantageous to the child,—II. a destruction of the Islamism established from the circumstance of the child being found in a Mussulman territory, which is injurious to the child; and his claim is admitted so far as it is advantageous to the child, but not so far as to be injurious to him.

And if in a Zimnee territory, he is a Zimnee.—If, however, the child be found in a city or village of the Zimnees, or in a church or synagogue, it is a Zimnee. This last opinion is universal (that is to say, is unanimously admitted) where the foundling is taken up, in those places, by a Zimnee;—but if a foundling be taken up in any of those places by a Mussulman, or if a Zimnee take up a foundling in any Mussulman place, there is a difference of opinion; for it is said in the Mabsoot, treating of foundlings, that in this case the place is regarded, and not the Mooltakit or taker-up of the foundling;—that is, if it be found in a Mussulman place, the foundling is a Mussulman, and if not, it is a Zimnee, whether it be taken up by a Mussulman or an infidel: and the reason is this, that the foundling has been first discovered in that place. In some copies of the book of claims from the Mabsoot it is said that in this case regard is had to the Mooltakit;—that is, if a Mussulman have taken up the foundling, it is a Mussulman, and if a Zimnee have taken it up it is a Zimnee—(and the same is mentioned by Ibn Simaia from Mohammed): and the reason is this, that possession is more powerful than place; because, if parents were brought as captives, with their infant child from a foreign country into the Mussulman territory, the infant is an infidel in conformity with the state of the parents, from which it is evident that possession is more powerful than place. In other copies of the book of claims it is said that, out of tenderness to the child, regard must be invariably had to Islam;—in other words, if the child be found in a place belonging to Zimnees, and be there taken up by a Mussulman, it is a Mussulman; and if it be taken up by a Zimnee in a Mussulman place, it is in this case also a Mussulman.

A foundling cannot be claimed as a slave.—If any person lay claim to a foundling, as being his slave, his claim is not admitted, because as it is apparent that the foundling is free, it cannot be supposed a slave unless the claimant produce evidence to prove that it belongs to him as such.

A slave's claim of parentage with respect to a foundling is admitted; but the foundling is free.—OBSERVE, also, that if a slave were to claim a foundling, saying, "this is my child," the parentage is established in him, because this is advantageous: the foundling, however, is free, because the child of a man who is a slave is free when born of a free woman, and it is a slave when born of a woman who is a slave; concerning the child being a slave, therefore, there is a doubt; and hence its freedom, which is shown by apparent circumstances, cannot be destroyed because of the doubt. A freeman, in claiming a foundling, has preference to a slave, and a Mussulman has preference to a Zimnee, because the claim of a freeman or of a Mussulman is most advantageous to the infant.

The property discovered upon a foundling is his; and may be applied to his use upon the authority of the Kazeer.—If there be any property upon a foundling (such as bracelets, and so forth), such property belongs to the foundling, because apparent circumstances argue this: and in the same manner, and for the same reason, if there be any property fastened on the animal upon which a foundling is exposed, such property also belongs to the foundling. The Mooltakit, moreover, must expend this property in supplying the wants of his foundling, upon an order from the Kazeer, because no person is known as proprietor of it, and the Kazeer has authority to expend property of this nature upon such an object. Some say that the Mooltakit is at liberty to expend the property in supplying the wants of his foundling, without any order from the Kazeer, because it appears that the property in question belongs to the foundling; and a Mooltakit is authorized to provide subsistence for his foundling, and to purchase such articles as are requisite and necessary for him, such as victuals and clothing.

A Mooltakit cannot contract his foundling in marriage.—It is not lawful for a Mooltakit to contract his foundling in marriage, because he has no authority for so doing, since the reason for such authority (namely, relationship, proprietorship, or sovereignty), do not exist in him.

Nor perform any acts in respect to his property (without authority).—In the same manner, it is not lawful for a Mooltakit to perform any acts respecting the property of his foundling, analogous to the restriction upon a mother;—that is, a mother has a right to the charge of her infant child, but yet is not at liberty to perform any acts respecting his property; and a Mooltakit stands in the same predicament. The principle upon which this proceeds is that authority to act with respect to the property of an infant is established with a view to the increase of that property; and this is assured only by two circumstances, perfect discretion, and complete affection: now in each of the persons in question, only one of these qualities exists; for a mother, although she entertain a complete affection for her child, is deficient in point of discretion; and a Mooltakit, although he be possessed of perfect discretion, is deficient in affection.

But he may take possession of gifts.—It is lawful for a Mooltakit to take possession of any thing presented to his foundling as a gift, because this is of singular advantage to the foundling: and for this reason it is that an infant is at liberty to take possession of a gift, where he has attained discretion; and in the same manner the mother of an infant, or her executor, are at liberty to take possession of any gift presented to the infant.

And send him to school.—A MOOLTAKIT is at liberty to send his foundling to school for the purpose of education, because this comes under the head of tuition and instruction and attention to his welfare.

He cannot let him out to hire.—A MOOLTAKIT is at liberty to hire out his foundling. Our author remarks that this is recorded by Kadooree in his compendium. In the Jama Sagheer it is said that it is not lawful for Mooltakit to hire out his foundling;—and this is approved. The ground upon which the report of Kadooree proceeds is that letting out to hire is one mode of instruction. The reason for the opposite doctrine, as stated in the Jama Sagheer, is that a Mooltakit is not at liberty to turn the faculties of his foundling to his own advantage; he is therefore in the same situation as an uncle contrary to the case of a mother, since she is at liberty to turn the faculties of her child to her own advantage, as shall be hereafter demonstrated in treating of Abominations.

BOOK XI.

OF LOOKTAS, OR TROVES.

Definition of Lookta.—LOOKTA signifies property which a person finds lying upon the ground, and takes away for the purpose of reserving it, in the manner of a trust. It is proper to observe that the terms Lakeet and Lookta have an affinity with respect to their sense, the difference between them being merely this, that Lakeet is used with regard to the human species, and Lookta with regard to any thing else.

A trove property is as a trust in the hands of the finder.—A LOOKTA, or Trove property, is considered as a trust in the hands of the Mooltakit or finder, where he has called persons to witness that “he takes such property in order to preserve it, and that he will restore it to the proprietor,”—because this mode of taking it is authorized by the Law, and is even the most eligible conduct,* according to many of our doctors. This is where there is no apprehension of the property being damaged or destroyed:†—but where that is to be apprehended, the taking of it up is incumbent, according to what the learned in the law have remarked upon this point.

Who is not responsible for any damage it may sustain in his hands.—Now such being the case, the property is not a subject of responsibility: that is, indemnification for the trove property is not incumbent upon the finder, where it happens to perish in his hands: and in the same manner, the finder is not responsible in a case where himself and the proprietor both agree that he had taken the property avowedly “for the owner;” because their agreement in this point is a proof with respect to both; and hence the declaration of the proprietor that he [the finder] had taken them from owner,” amounts to the same as if the finder were to produce evidence that he had taken them for the owner.

Unless he avow that he took the property with a view to convert it to his own use.—If, however, the finder declare, “I took them for myself,” responsibility is incumbent upon him according to all authorities, because he here appears to have taken the property of another without that other’s consent, and without the permission of the Law.

The finder is responsible for the trove, if he have not witnesses to testify that he took it for the owner.—If the finder should not have called any person to witness, at the time of his taking the property, that “he took it for the owner,” and he and the owner afterwards differ upon this point, the finder saying, "I took it for the owner,"—and the owner denying this,—indemnification is due, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf says that indemnification is not due, and that the finder's declaration is to be credited, as appearances testify in his behalf, because it is probable that his intention was virtuous, and not criminal. The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the finder has already acknowledged the fact which occasions responsibility (namely, his taking the property of another), and afterwards pleads a circumstance in consequence of which he is discharged from responsibility, by declaring that he had taken the property for the owner; but as this is a doubtful plea, he is not discharged from responsibility: and with respect to what is urged by Aboo Yoosaf, that "appearances testify in the finder's behalf," they reply that in the same manner as appearances argue that the finder took the property for the owner, so do they likewise argue that he has taken them for himself, as it is probable that a person who performs acts with respect to property does so for himself, and not for another; and hence, as appearances on both sides lead to opposite conclusions, they are on both sides dropped.

The trove is sufficiently witnessed by the finder's notification of it to the bystanders.—In calling people to witness it suffices that the finder say to the bystanders "If ye hear of any one seeking for this trove property, direct him to me;"—and this, whether the trove property consist of a single article, or of numerous articles, because, as the term Lookta is a generic noun, it applies either to a single article, or to several different articles.

A trove, under ten dirms must be advertised for some days, and one above ten dirms, for a year.—If the trove property be of less value than ten dirms, it behoves the finder to advertise it for some days—(that is, for so long as he deems expedient),—but if it exceeded ten dirms in value, he must advertise it for the space of a year. The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this is one opinion from Haneefa. Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, maintains that the finder should advertise it for the space of a year, whether the value be great or small (and such is also the opinion of Shafei), as the prophet has said "the person who takes up a trove property must advertise it for a year,"—without making any distinction between a small property and a great property. The reason for the former opinion is that the fixing it at the space of a year occurred respecting a trove property of the value of one hundred denars, which are equal to a thousand dirms; now ten dirms, or anything above that sum, are the same as a thousand dirms with respect to the amputation of a thief's hand, or the legalizing of generation,* whence it is enjoined to advertise a trove property for a year, out of caution; but anything short of ten dirms does not resemble a thousand dirms with respect to any of those particulars, whence this point is left to the discretion of the finder of a property of that value. Some allege that the approved opinion is that there is no particular space of time, this being left entirely to the discretion of the finder, who must advertise the trove property until he see reason to conclude that it will never be called for by the owner, and must then bestow it in alms. All that is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition that the trove property is of a lasting and unperishable nature: but if it be of a perishable nature, and unfit to keep, it must be advertised until it is in danger of perishing, and must then be bestowed in alms. It is proper to remark that the finder must make advertisement of the trove property in the place where he found it, and also in other places of public resort, as by advertising it in such places it is most probable that the owner may recover it.

A trove of an insignificant nature may be converted by the finder to his own use.—If the trove property be of such a nature as that it is known that the owner will not call for it (such as date-stones, or pomegranate skins), it is the same as if the owner had thrown it away, inasmuch that it is lawful to use it without advertisement: but yet it still continues the property of the owner,* as transfer to a person unknown is not valid.

If the owner do not in due time appear, the finder may either bestow the property in alms, or keep it for the owner.—If the finder duly advertise the trove property, and discover the proprietor, it is well:—but if he cannot discover him, he has two things at his option;—if he choose, he may bestow it in alms, because it is incumbent to restore the property to the owner as far as may be possible, and this is to be effected either by giving the actual property to the owner, where he is discovered, or by bestowing it in alms, so as that a return for it (namely, the merit) may reach the owner, as he will assent, upon hearing of its having been so bestowed: or if the finder choose, he may continue to keep the property, in hopes of discovering the owner and restoring it to him.

Where the trove has been bestowed in alms, the owner may either ratify the alms-gift.—If the finder of a trove property discover the owner, after having bestowed it in alms, the owner has two things at his option:—if he choose, he may approve of and confirm the charity, in which case he has the merit of it; because, although the finder has bestowed it in alms by permission of the LAW, yet as the owner has not consented to his so doing, the alms-gift remains suspended upon his consent to it: as the pauper, however, becomes endowed with the property in question previous to his consent, it does not remain suspended upon the continuance of the subject* (contrary to a case of sale by an unauthorized person; in other words, if an unauthorized person execute a sale, the validity of it depends upon the continuance of the subject,† that is, of the article sold, because the purchaser does not become endowed with it until after consent):

* That is to say, although it be lawful for the finder to use it, yet the owner has a claim upon him for the value.

Or take indemnification from the finder.—OR, if the owner choose, he may take an indemnification from the finder, because he has bestowed a property upon the poor without consent of the proprietor.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that indemnification is not incumbent upon the finder, as he has bestowed the property in alms, with the consent of the LAW.

REPLY.—His bestowing it in alms, with the consent of the LAW, does not oppose the obligation of responsibility, in behalf of the right of the owner; in the same manner as where a person eats the property of another when perishing with famine; for in this case he owes indemnification, although he be permitted by the LAW to eat another's property in such a situation; and so also in the case in question.

Or from the pauper upon whom it has been so bestowed.—OR, if the owner choose, he may take indemnification from the pauper, where the trove property has perished in his hands,—because he has taken possession of the property of another person without his consent;—

Or, if still existing, may claim restitution of it.—OR, if the property be remaining in the hands of the pauper, the owner may take it from him, as he thus recovers his actual property.

OBJECTION.—It has been already stated that the pauper becomes endowed with the property previous to the owner's consent; whence it would appear that the owner has no right to restitution.

REPLY.—Establishment of property does not oppose a right to restitution; in the same manner as a donor is at liberty to resume his gift, although the donee have become proprietor upon taking possession of it.

Stray animals ought to be secured and taken care of for the owner.—It is laudable to secure and take care of strayed cattle; such as oxen, goats, or camels. Malik and Shafei maintain that where a person finds strayed camels or oxen in the desert,‡ it is most eligible to leave them, the seizing of them being abominable:—and concerning the securing of strayed horses there is the same difference of opinion. The argument of Malik and Shafei is that illegality is originally connected with taking the property of another, which is not allowable except where there is apprehension of its perishing if it be not taken: but where a trove property is of such a nature as to be capable of repelling beasts of prey (such as oxen, who may repel them with their horns, or camels and horses, who may repel them with their hoofs or their teeth), there is little apprehension of its perishing: it is still however to be suspected that it will perish, and hence it is declared abominable to secure it, and most laudable to leave it.* The argument of our doctors is that the animals in question are trove property, and there is reason to apprehend their perishing, whence it is laudable to secure and advertise them, in order that the property may be preserved, in the same manner as the securing of strayed goats is laudable according to all.

But he is not responsible to the finder for the subsistence, unless it be furnished by order of the magistrate.—IF, moreover, the finder give subsistence to troves of this description without authority from the magistrate, it is a gratuitous act, because of his not possessing any authority: but if he give subsistence by order of the magistrate, it is a debt upon the owner, because the magistrate is endowed with authority over the property of an absentee, for the purpose of enabling him to act with kindness† to the absentee; and the giving of subsistence is a kindness on some occasions, as shall be demonstrated elsewhere.

Who, if they be fit for hire, must direct them to be hired out for that purpose.—IF the question respecting the subsistence of the troves be brought before the magistrate, he must inquire into the particulars; and if the troves be capable of hire (such as horses, camels, or oxen), he must order them to be hired out, and subsisted from their hire, because in this case the animals continue the property of the owner without subjecting him to any debt (and a similar judgment must be passed with respect to fugitive slaves):

Or, if unfit, to be sold, and the price retained for the owner.—BUT if the troves be unfit for hire (such as goats or sheep), and it be apprehended that, if the finder were to subsist them, the subsistence would equal their value, the magistrate must direct them to be sold, and the price to be kept, in such a manner that the troves may be virtually preserved, in their value, because the preservation of them in substance is impracticable.

* This is strange reasoning: it may perhaps have some reference to predestination; i.e. as those animals seem DESTINED to perish, it is impious to attempt to prevent this destiny.

Unless he think fit to order them a subsistence, which is in that case a debt upon the owner.—If, however, the magistrate deem it fit to give subsistence, he must adjudge subsistence to be given, making the same a debt upon the owner of the animals,—because the magistrate is appointed for the purpose of exercising humanity and kindness; and the giving of subsistence is a kindness both to the owner and to the finder;—to the owner, because his property is thus preserved to him in substance; and to the finder, because the subsistence he furnishes is thus made a debt upon the owner.

But subsistence must not be ordered for more than a few days.—THE learned in the law, however, have said that the magistrate is to issue the order for subsistence only for the term of two or three days, in hopes that the owner may appear; and that if the owner do not appear, he must then order the troves to be sold, because to afford subsistence to them for a continuance would be to eradicate the property, whence there would be no kindness in affording them subsistence for a long term (that is, for a term beyond three days).

Nor unless the finder produce evidence in proof of the trove.—It is observed, in the Mabsoot, that the production of evidence is requisite,—that is, the magistrate is not to give an order for subsisting the animal, except where the finder produces evidence to prove that “such an animal is a trove;” and this is approved, because it is possible that he may have obtained possession of the animal by usurpation, and in a case of usurpation the magistrate does not give an order for subsistence, but directs the thing usurped to be restored to the owner, except in a case of deposit, which cannot be proved without evidence; the production of evidence, therefore, is essentially requisite, in order that the actual state of the case may be ascertained.

OBJECTION.—Evidence is not admissible without an adversary; and in the case in question there is no adversary;—how, therefore, can evidence be admitted?

REPLY.—The evidence, in the present case, is not required for the purpose of a judicial decree, so as to make the existence of an adversary a necessary condition.

If the finder have no evidence, the order for subsistence must be conditioned upon the veracity of his declaration.—If the finder say, “I have no evidence of the animal being with me as a trove,” still as it is apparent that it is a trove, the magistrate must say, “Subsist this animal, provided your declaration be true!” and then, if the finder’s declaration be true, he will have a claim upon the owner for the subsistence, but not if he be an usurper.

The finder has no claim upon the owner for the subsistence, unless the magistrate expressly declare, in his order, that the owner is responsible for the same;—It is here necessary to remark that what is advanced above, that “the magistrate must adjudge subsistence to be given, making the same a debt upon the owner of the animals,” plainly implies that the finder will have no claim upon the owner for such subsistence, upon his appearing at a time when the trove has not yet been sold, unless the magistrate, in his decree, direct that “he shall have such a claim upon him;”—but if the magistrate should not thus have rendered the subsistence a debt upon the owner, the finder would have no claim upon him for it:—this is approved doctrine. Some say that the finder has a claim upon the owner for the subsistence, where he furnishes it by order of the magistrate, whether the magistrate may have explicitly declared the same to be a debt upon the owner or not.

*But he may detain the trove from the owner until he be paid for the subsistence;—*UPON the owner appearing, the finder is at liberty to detain the trove, until he pay him for the subsistence; because the finder has preserved the trove, and kept it alive, by subsisting it. The case is therefore the same as if the owner had obtained his right of property through the finder; and consequently the trove resembles an article of sale; that is, in the same manner as the seller is entitled to detain the article sold until the purchaser produce the price, so also, the finder is entitled to detain the trove until the owner produce an equivalent for the subsistence. The finder, moreover, resembles a person who apprehends and brings back a fugitive slave, that is, in the same manner as that person is entitled to detain the slave on account of a recompense (since it may be said that he has preserved him), so also, the finder is at liberty to detain the trove on account of the subsistence to be afforded to it, since he has thus preserved it alive.

If, however, the trove perish in the finder’s possession, after detention, he has no claim.—It is to be observed that the debt for subsistence is not extinguished by the circumstance of the trove perishing in the hands of the finder, before his detention of it: but it is extinguished by the trove perishing in his hands after detention, because by detention it is placed in the same state as a pledge, and as debt is extinguished by the destruction of the pledge, so in the same manner the debt for subsistence is extinguished by the trove perishing after detention.

Troves of unlawful articles are to be advertised and disposed of in the same manner as those of lawful articles.—TROVES of lawful articles and of unlawful are the same, in this respect, that the finder is to advertise them for a year. Shafei contends that an unlawful article is to be advertised until the owner appear, because the prophet has declared “A trove of a FORBIDDEN thing is not lawful to any but the MOONSHED” (that is, the claimant or the owner): and it thus appearing that the trove is unlawful to any except the owner, it is indispensable that the finder advertise it until the owner appear, and he restore it to him; for it must not be bestowed in alms. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold:—FIRST, the prophet has said, “Advertise the trove by its marks,* and then continue to advertise it for a year,” in which no distinction is made between a lawful article and an unlawful:—SECONDLY, the unlawful article in question is a trove; and if, after the expiration of the term of advertisement, it be bestowed in alms, the owner’s right of property in it still continues in force;† and such being the case, the finder may bestow it in alms, after the expiration of the term aforesaid, in the same manner as any other troves.—With respect to the saying quoted by Shafei, the explanation of it is, that a trove of a forbidden thing is lawful only to the Moonshid (that is, to the advertiser, or person who makes notification of it), and that it is not lawful for any person to take it for his own use.‡ A trove of a forbidden thing is particularly adverted to in this saying, because such a trove must be advertised, although it appear to be the property of strangers (who are continually passing through the country), and if it were not for such an injunction, people might apprehend that, as being the property of strangers who will probably never return to demand it, the advertising is useless.

The claimant of a trove must prove his right by evidence; but it may be delivered to him upon his describing the tokens of it: in this case, however, the magistrate cannot compel a surrender.—If a person appear, and lay claim to a trove, it is not to be given to him until he produce evidence. If, however, the claimant describe the tokens of the trove, by mentioning the weight of the dirms (for instance), or the purse in which they are contained, and its tying, it may be lawfully given to him: but the magistrate is not to use any compulsion upon this point. Malik and Shafei allege that the magistrate may compel the finder to give up the trove; because he merely disputes with the claimant the possession of the trove, and not the right of property in it; and such being the case, a description of the tokens is made a condition as the parties dispute concerning the possession, but the production of evidence is not made a condition, as they do not dispute concerning the right of property.

* Literally, “advertise the BAG or PURSE containing the trove, and its tying, and then advertise the TROVE for a YEAR.”

† As he still has a claim of restitution, (See p. 210).

‡ The difference here turns solely upon the sense in which the term Moonshid is to be taken. Moonshid literally signifies a person who points to the place where any thing is lost,—a description which applies equally to the loser or the finder. Shafei takes it in the former sense, and Haneefa in the latter.

The argument of our doctors is that possession or seisin is a right which may be desirable, in the same manner as actual property in a thing, wherefore no person is entitled to claim the possession of it but through proof, that is, through evidence, in the same manner as no one is entitled to claim the property in it, but through evidence;—but yet it is lawful for the finder to surrender the trove to the claimant, upon his describing the tokens, because the prophet has said, “If the owner appear, and describe the thing which contains the trove, and the quantity of the contents, let the finder surrender it to him;”—that is, it is allowable to surrender it to him; for the ordinance here is merely of a permissive nature, since it appears, in the Hadees Mashhoor, that the claimant must produce evidence, and the defendant must swear,—which evinces that the command contained in this saying is of a permissive and not of an injunctive nature, otherwise it would not be incumbent upon the claimant to produce evidence.

The finder surrendering a trove upon description of the tokens, without evidence, must take security from the claimant.—

WHEN the claimant describes the tokens of the trove, without producing evidence, and the finder surrenders it to him, it is incumbent on the finder to take security from him out of caution;* and concerning this point there is no difference of opinion (according to the Rawayet Saheeh) because here the finder requires the security for himself.† This is contrary to the case of security required in behalf of an absentee heir;—that is, where the Kazee distributes the effects of a person deceased among such of his heirs as are present,—in this case there is a difference of opinion concerning his requiring security of the present heirs, in behalf of an absentee heir, provided such should hereafter appear;—for, according to Haneefa, security is not required in behalf of the absentee heir, but according to the two disciples security is so required.

The finder is not to be compelled to surrender the trove, although he acknowledge the right of the claimant.—If any person claim a trove, and the finder verify his claim, yet some say that the Kazee must not compel him to surrender the trove;—similar to the case of an agent empowered to take possession of a deposit; in other words, if any person plead that “he is an agent empowered to take possession of a deposit from such a person,” and the trustee verify his declaration, yet he is not compelled to surrender the deposit to the agent; and so here likewise. Some, on the contrary, say that compulsion

* Lest another person should afterward appear, and prove the trove to belong to him, by evidence.

† He takes the security in his own behalf and not in behalf of any future possible claimant, who, if he should appear, has recourse to him for restitution.

may be used, because in the case in question, the owner is a person unknown, whereas, in the case of a deposit, the owner of the deposit is a person who is known, whence the possessor cannot be compelled to surrender it to the agent, he not being the owner.

A trove cannot be bestowed in alms upon a rich person.—THE finder must not bestow the trove in alms upon a rich person, because the prophet has said, "If no owner of a trove property appear, BESTOW IT IN ALMS;"—and it is not lawful to bestow alms upon an opulent person; a trove, therefore, resembles Zakat.

Nor can the finder (if rich) lawfully convert it to his own use.—If the finder be in opulent circumstances, it is not lawful for him to derive any advantage from the trove. Shafei affirms that this is lawful, because the prophet said to Yewabee, who had found an hundred denars, "If the owner come, surrender the trove to him; but if not, make use of it;"—and yet Yewabee was in opulent circumstances. Moreover, the use of the trove is allowed to the finder, where he happens to be in indigent circumstances, only in order that this permission may be a motive to him to take up the trove, in such a manner that it may be preserved; in other own use by permission of the Imam; and the use of a trove, by permission of the Imam, is lawful.

The finder, if poor, may convert the trove to his own use, or, if rich, may bestow it upon his poor relation.—If the finder of a trove be poor, he need not hesitate to make use of the trove,* since in such a disposal of it a kindness is performed both to the owner and to the finder.† Upon the same principle, also, it is lawful to bestow it upon any other poor person: thus if the finder be rich, and his parents, children, or wives poor, he may bestow the trove in alms upon them, for the reason above alleged.

it will thus be preserved from perishing. Now, the poor and the rich are both alike in this particular; and consequently, the finder who is rich may lawfully convert it to his own use, in the same manner as one who is poor. The argument of our doctors is that a trove is the property of another, and hence it is not allowable to derive an advantage from it without his permission, because the passages in the sacred writings which prohibit the enjoyment of another's property are generally expressed.—The use, moreover, is permitted to the poor (contrary to what analogy would suggest), in consequence of the saying of the prophet already mentioned, and of the opinion of all the doctors; and therefore, any others than those remain under the original predicament, which is an inhibition of the use.—With respect to what Shafei urges (that "the use of the trove is allowed to the finder where he happens to be in indigent circumstances, only in order that this permission may be a motive to him to take up the trove, so that it may be preserved, in which particular the rich and the poor are both alike)," we reply that this reasoning is not admitted; because a rich person may sometimes take up a trove from the ground under the idea that he may himself possibly become a pauper within the term prescribed for advertising; and a poor person, on the other hand, may sometimes neglect to take up a trove, under the idea that he may, possibly, become rich within that term; what Shafei urges, therefore, under this idea, is no ground of argument. With respect to the instance adduced of Yewabee, it is to be considered that he converted the trove to his

Definition of Mafkood.—MAFKOOD, in its literal sense, means lost and sought after. In the language of the LAW it signifies a person who disappears, and of whom it is not known whether he be living or dead, or where he resides.

When a person disappears, the Kazeer must appoint a trustee to manage his affairs.—If a person disappear, and it be not known whether he be dead or alive, or where he resides, the Kazeer must appoint some person to look after his property, and to manage his affairs, and maintain his rights; because the Kazeer is appointed for the purpose of attending to the interests of all such as are unable to attend to their own concerns; and as a missing person is of this description (whence he stands in the same predicament with an infant or an idiot), it is for his interest to appoint a person to look after his property and manage his affairs.

Who is empowered to take possession of all acquisitions arising to him.—By what is above stated, that "the person appointed by the Kazeer shall maintain the rights of the missing person," is meant that this person shall take possession of all acquisitions arising to the missing person from his tenements, lands, or effects, and also of such debts as are acknowledged by his debtors;—and that he shall also prosecute for debts owing in consequence of contracts entered into by himself* and which are disputed by the debtor, as the rights of the contract appertain to him, he being the contractor.

But cannot prosecute for disputed debts, or deposits.—BUT he is not to prosecute on account of debts owing in consequence of any contract entered into by the missing person, and which are disputed by the debtors; nor can he prosecute for the missing person's share in lands or effects, in the hands of a third person, who disputes the same; because he is neither the principal, nor the deputy of the principal, being no more than merely an agent for seisin on the part of the Kazee, who is not empowered to prosecute, according to the united opinion of our three doctors;—for their only difference of opinion is with respect to an agent for seisin appointed by the proprietor himself, in a case of debt, whom Haneefa holds to be empowered to prosecute, whereas the two disciples deny him this power.—The reason of this is that if it were lawful for the Kazee's agent for seisin to prosecute, and he were to prosecute accordingly, and the debtor to produce evidence proving that the missing person had already received the debt, or discharged it, the Kazee must necessarily pass a decree accordingly, and this would be a decree against an absentee, which is unlawful.—It is not lawful for him, therefore, to prosecute, except where the Kazee is of opinion (with the sect of Shafei), that it is lawful to pass a decree against an absentee, and he directs accordingly, in which case it is lawful, because a decree is of force where it is passed in any case concerning which there is a difference of opinion.†

OBJECTION.—The point upon which the difference of opinion rests, on the present occasion, is the decree itself; and hence the case requires that the validity of the decree be suspended upon the warranty of another Kazee.‡

REPLY.—The decree itself is not what the difference of opinion rests upon in the present instance, but the cause of the decree, namely, the evidence, the point of difference being, merely, whether evidence, where there is no actual prosecutor, amounts to proof?—and where the Kazee is of opinion that the evidence amounts to proof, and directs accordingly, his decree is legal and valid.

The missing person's perishable effects must be sold.—It is to be observed that, if there be, among the effects of the missing person, articles of a perishable nature (such as fruit, and so forth) the Kazee must sell them; because, as the preservation of them both in substance and in effect is impracticable, they are to be preserved in effect.

But not those which are unperishable.—BUT he is not to sell any articles not liable to perish, either on account of subsistence, or for any other purpose; because the Kazee is invested with authority, with respect to an absentee, for the conservation of his property, and hence it is incumbent upon him to preserve it in substance where that is practicable.

Subsistence must be afforded, out of the effects, to the parents and children of the missing person; and to all others who, without a decree, were entitled to it during his presence.—THE Kazee is to give subsistence to the wife and children of a missing person out of his property. This rule is not restricted to his immediate children, but extends to all related to him in the line of paternity, such as the father, the grandfather, the son's son, and so forth; for it is a rule that every person entitled to a subsistence from the property of the missing person whilst he was present, independent of an order from the Kazee (such as his infant children, and adult daughters, or adult sons who are disabled) must in his absence be furnished with a subsistence, out of his property, by the Kazee:—but to those who, whilst the missing person was present, had no right to subsistence independent of an order from the Kazee (such as brothers, sisters, or maternal uncles or aunts), no subsistence is, in his absence, to be furnished by the Kazee, because these are entitled to a subsistence only through a decree, and a decree against an absentee is illegal. By the property of the missing person, as here mentioned, is meant money, because the right of the above persons is meat and clothing, and where those are not to be found among the missing person's effects, there is a necessity for the Kazee to decree the value; and the value consists of cash. Bullion (that is, uncoined gold and silver) is in this respect subject to the same rule with cash, since that also admits of being given as value, in the same manner as cash. This is where the Kazee has money in his hands.

Where there are no effects in the Kazee's hands, he may furnish the subsistence from debts, or deposits, the property of the missing person.—IF, however, there be no money in his hands, but there happen to be some in trust, in the hands of another person,—or a debt owing from some other person, the Kazee is in that case to provide the subsistence from such deposit or debt, where the trustee or debtor acknowledges the deposit or debt, and also the marriage or parentage. This acknowledgment, however, is necessary only where these points are not fully known to the Kaze; for if they be fully known to him, the acknowledgment is not requisite.—If, on the other hand, some of these points be known (such as the debt and the deposit), and others unknown (such as the marriage or the parentage), or vice versa, in this case the acknowledgment is requisite with respect to that which is unknown: this is approved. If the trustee or debtor furnish the subsistence without an order from the Kaze, the trustee is responsible for such disbursement, and the debtor is not discharged from his debt, because in so doing they have not paid anything either to the owner or to his representative: contrary to where they furnish subsistence by order of the Kaze, because he appears as representative of the owner.

† That is, where the Kazee may happen to dissent in opinion from the Haneefite doctors. The Arabic copy simply says "in which case it is lawful, because the KAZEE is a person supposed to be possessed of judgment and learned in the LAW." What is here advanced affords a striking instance of the power of a Kazee, and the latitude allowed to him in passing his decrees.

‡ Because this Kazee being himself a representative of the Mafkood, or missing person, and consequently a party concerned in the decree, cannot carry it into effect, without such authority.

If the trustee or debtor deny the deposit or debt, together with the marriage and parentage, or if they deny the marriage and parentage only, in this case the persons entitled to subsistence cannot be admitted, as plaintiffs, to prove and establish those points which the trustee or debtor denies; because a claim is not admitted, unless it be laid against either the principal, or his representative; and the principal, in the present instance, is absent; and the debtor or trustee are not either actually or virtually his representatives:—they evidently are not actually so, because he has not constituted any person his agent; nor are they virtually so, because, in the prosecution of the plaintiff's claim against the absentee, the specification of the occasion* of the claim is no good plea for the establishment of his right (namely, subsistence from the property in the debtor's or trustee's hands),—since, in the same manner as subsistence is due from that property, it is also due from any other property belonging to the missing person:—the debtor or trustee are therefore not virtually the missing person's representatives.

The Kaze cannot effect a separation between a missing person and his wife.—THE Kaze is not empowered to effect a separation between a missing person and his wife. Malik maintains that, at the expiration of four years, the Kaze may pronounce a separation, after which the wife is to observe an edit of four months and ten days, such being the edit of widowhood, —and she may then marry whoever she pleases; because Omar thus decreed with respect to a person who disappeared from Medina; and also, because a missing person, by his absence, obstructs the woman's right:—the Kaze, therefore must pronounce a separation between the parties after the lapse of a certain time, because of the analogy this case bears to that of Aila, or of impotence;—that is to say, in the same manner as, in a case of Aila, an irreversible divorce takes place at the end of four months,* on account of the husband, by Aila, obstructing his wife's right,—and in the same manner also as, in a case of impotence, the Kaze pronounces a separation† at the end of the year, on account of the husband thus obstructing his wife's right,—so likewise, in the case in question, the Kaze must pronounce a separation, for the same reason:—and the case of absence being equally analogous to a case of Aila and of impotence, the length of the term is adjusted with a regard to both, by adopting the number four from Aila, and the term year from impotence, so as to make practice in this particular accord in the same manner with the other two. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—FIRST, the PROPHET once declared, with respect to the wife of a missing person, "She is his wife until such time as his DEATH or DIVORCE shall appear:†" and Alee also said, with respect to the wife of a Mafkood, "She is a mourner, wherefore she must be patient, until she be perfectly informed of his death, or of his having divorced her."—SECONDLY, the existence of the marriage is notorious; and as the mere disappearance of the husband is not a sufficient cause of separation, and his death be a matter of uncertainty, it follows that the marriage cannot be dissolved, because of the doubt. With respect to the authority of Omar, as cited by Malik, we reply that he afterwards adopted the opinion of Alee.—As to what he farther urges respecting the analogy between the case in question, and a case of Aila, it is not admitted; because Aila, in times of ignorance, was an immediate divorce, but the law afterwards constituted it a deliberate divorce,‡ and hence it is that Aila occasions a separation.§—In the same manner also, the analogy urged by him between the case in question and a case of impotence is not admitted; because where a husband disappears, it is possible that he may reappear, whereas it is not possible that an impotent person should recover his virility, after his impotence has continued for above a year.

*The missing person is to be declared a defunct;—WHEN one hundred and twenty years shall have elapsed, from the day of the missing person's birth, he is to be declared defunct.—The compiler of Hedaya remarks that Hassan has related this as an opinion of Haneefa. According to the Zahir Rawayet, this point is to be determined by the decease of the co-evals of the missing person, or of his equals—that is, those who are known to resemble him in health and habits of body. It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf that the term is one hundred years.—Some of the learned, again, fix it at ninety years. Analogy requires that the term should not be fixed at any particular period, such as one hundred years, or ninety years, since to fix a time merely from judgment or opinion is illegal: but yet it is requisite that it be fixed by some specific standard, such as the demise of the missing person's co-evals, because, if no criterion whatever were established, his decease could never be declared.

At the end of ninety years from his birth.—THE benevolence of the law, however, suggests that the term be fixed at ninety years, as this is the shortest fixed term mentioned,† and it is difficult to ascertain anything respecting the circumstances of the missing person's co-evals or equals.

When his wife is to observe an edit of widowhood.—UPON the death of the missing person being duly declared, his wife must observe her edit for four months and ten days from the date of the declaration, such being the edit of widowhood:

And his property is divided among his living heirs.—AND his property is to be divided among such of his heirs as are then living: the case, therefore, is the same as if he had actually died upon the instant of the declaration, and hence any person who died previous to the declaration does not inherit of him.

A missing person's right of inheritance from a relation cannot be established during his disappearance.—IF the relation of a missing person die during his disappearance, the missing person is not an heir, because his existence at the time is established merely from circumstances, as having been once known, and consequently accounted to continue so long as nothing appears to the contrary. Now mere circumstantial evidence is but weak, and therefore incapable of constituting proof to a claim (that is, to the establishment of a thing as yet unestablished), although it constitute proof sufficient for repulsion (that is to say, to prove the continuance of a thing already established).

But his portion is held in suspense.—WITH respect to the expression "the missing person is not an heir," it means that, whatever may be his portion of inheritance, he does not obtain a property in it, but it is held in suspense; because his being in life is doubtful; and this is a sufficient cause of suspense.

And, at the end of ninety years (if he do not appear in the interim), is divided among the other heirs.—IF, therefore, he afterwards appear to be living, it goes to him; but if there be no evidence of his being in life when ninety years have elapsed, his portion, which has been so suspended, is then to be distributed among those who were heirs to the original proprietor at the period of his demise, as in the case of embryos in the womb. In the same manner, also, if a person make a bequest to a missing person, and the testator die, the bequest does not take place, but is held in suspense, because bequest stands upon a similar footing with inheritance.

Disposal of inheritance in case of a co-heir.—IT is a rule that if there be another heir beside the missing person, who is not entirely precluded by the missing person, but whose right is diminished by his intervention, this heir is to receive that which is the least of the two portions of inheritance, and the remainder is held in suspense. If, on the other hand, there be another heir, who is entirely precluded by the missing person, no part of the inheritance is to be paid to him, but the whole portion of inheritance must be held in suspense. An example, in illustration of this case, is as follows:—A person dies, leaving two daughters, and a son who has disappeared; and also a son's son, and a son's daughter; and his estate is in the hands of a stranger; and the above heirs, and the stranger, all agree that the son of the deceased is a missing person; and the two daughters demand their inheritance; in which case they are paid their moiety out of the deceased's estate, as this is their undoubted share: but the other moiety, which is the portion of the missing person, is held in suspense, and no part of it paid to the son's children, because they are entirely precluded by the missing person if he be living, and are therefore not entitled to receive the inheritance, because of the doubt; and this remaining moiety is not to be taken out of the hands of the stranger, unless he be discovered in some dishonest practices.—Apposite to the example of the missing person is the case of a fœtus in the womb, for whom a child's inheritance is reserved, according to an opinion upon which decrees are passed. If, also, there be another heir beside the fœtus, who is not in any circumstance precluded, nor his portion altered by the intervention of the fœtus, his complete portion is paid to him: but if this heir be such as is entirely precluded by the intervention of the fœtus, nothing whatever is paid to him. Thus, if a man die, leaving a maternal sister and a pregnant wife, nothing whatever is paid to the sister, as she is entirely precluded from inheritance by the intervention of a child, whether male or female. If, on the other hand, the heir be one whose share is altered by the intervention of the fœtus, in this case the smaller of the two portions is paid to him, as this smaller share is his undoubted right, in the same manner as in the case of a missing person. For instance, a man dies, and leaves a pregnant wife, and a mother who acknowledges the pregnancy, in which case the wife is paid an eighth and the mother a sixth; because, if the fœtus be born alive, the wife would receive an eighth, and the mother a sixth; but if it be not born alive, the wife would receive a fourth, and the mother a third. A sixth and an eighth are therefore paid immediately, as these are their portions at all events.

* This is the rule in the Sonna. The compiler of the Hedaya, however, has fixed it at ninety years, as appears a little below.

OF SHIRKAT, OR PARTNERSHIP.

Definition of Shirkat.—SHIRKAT, in its primitive sense, signifies the conjunction of two or more estates, in such a manner, that one of them is not distinguishable from the other. The term Shirkat, however, is extended to contracts, although there be no actual conjunction of estates, because a contract is the cause of such conjunction. In the language of the LAW it signifies the union of two or more persons in one concern.

Partnership is lawful;—PARTNERSHIP is lawful, because in the time of the prophet men were accustomed to have transactions in partnership, and the prophet confirmed them therein.

And of two kinds; by right of property, and by contract.—PARTNERSHIP is of two kinds, Shirkat Milk, or partnership by the right of property, and Shirkat Akid, or partnership by contract.

Partnership by right of property is either optional, or compulsive; and does not admit of either partner acting with respect to the other's share.—SHIRKAT MILK applies where two or more persons are proprietors of one thing;—and it is of two different natures, optional and compulsive—optional, where two persons make a joint purchase of one specific article; or where it is presented to them as a gift, and they accept of it; or where it is left to them, jointly, by bequest, and they accept of it;—or where they both obtain possession, by conquest, of one specific article in an enemy's country;—or where they unite their respective properties in such a way as that one is not distinguishable from the other (such as the mixture of wheat with wheat),—or where it may be difficult to distinguish them (as in a mixture of wheat with barley);—and compulsive, where the properties of two persons become united without their act, under such circumstances as render it difficult or impossible to distinguish between them; or, where two persons inherit one property. In this species of partnership, therefore, it is not lawful for one partner to perform any act with respect to the other's share, without his permission, each being as a stranger with respect to the other's share. It is, however, lawful for either partner to sell his own share to the other partner, in all the cases here stated:—and he may also sell his share to others, without his partner's consent, excepting only in cases of association or admixture of property, for in both these instances one partner cannot lawfully sell the share of the other to a third person without his partner's permission. The distinctions upon this point are related in the Kafayat-al-Moon-tihee.

Partnership by contract.—SHIRKAT AKID, or partnership by contract, is effected by proposal and consent,—(that is, by one person saying to another, "I have made you my partner in such a property," &c. and the other replying "I consent:"); and it is a condition of the contract that the concern respecting which it is made be of such a nature as to admit of delegation, in order that the acquisition arising from it may be participated in by both parties, and that thus the effect or design may be established,—in other words, that the acquisition may become equally the property of both.

Is of four descriptions, by reciprocity, in traffic, in arts, and upon personal credit.—PARTNERSHIP by compact is of four kinds; viz.:

I.—Shirkat-Mofawizat, or partnership by reciprocity.

II.—Shirkat-Aiman, or partnership in traffic.*

III.—Shirkat-Sinnaia, or partnership in arts.

IV.—Shirkat-Woodjooh, or partnership upon personal credit.

Description of partnership by reciprocity.

Shirkat-Mofawizat, or partnership by reciprocity, is where two men, being the equals of each other, in point of property, privileges, and religious persuasion, enter into a contract of co-partnership;—because this species of partnership is a universal partnership in all transactions, where each partner reciprocally commits the business of the partnership to the other, without limitation or restriction; for the term Mofawizat, in its literal sense, means equality.

It requires equality in point of capital;—It is therefore indispensable that a perfect equality exist throughout, in the property, that is, in the partnership capital, such as dirms and deenars.—(No regard, however, is paid to an excess in anything beyond the partnership capital, such as goods or effects, lands, or debts.)

And of privileges;—In the same manner, it is indispensable that an equality exist with respect to privileges;* because, if either partner were endowed with privileges not vested in the other, there could be no perfect equality.

* The commentators define it partnership in purchase and sale. The term does not admit of any literal translation.

And similarity of religion and of sect.—In the same manner also, equality is indispensable in point of religion and of sect, as shall be hereafter demonstrated. Partnership by reciprocity is lawful, upon a favourable construction;—but, according to analogy, it is unlawful. This, also, is one opinion of Shafei. Malik says, “I know not what Mofawizat is!”—Analogy would suggest that a partnership of this description is unlawful,—because it includes a power of agency with respect to an unknown subject, and also an obligation of security with respect to a thing undefined; and as each of these, individually, is illegal, it follows that, when united, they are illegal a fortiori. The reason for a more favourable construction upon this point is that the prophet has said, “Enter into partnerships by reciprocity, for in that there is great advantage.” In this manner, also, men had transactions together, no person forbidding them. Analogy, therefore, is abandoned. Ignorance, moreover, in the contract in question, is lawful as a dependant of another circumstance,—that is, as a dependant of equality;—in the same manner as in a contract of Mozaribat, where the contract comprehends a commission of agency for the purchase and sale of articles unknown, which commission is in itself illegal, but is nevertheless legal in a contract of Mozaribat, as a dependant of the contract; and so also in the case in question.

The term reciprocity must also be expressed in the contract.—A CONTRACT of reciprocity is not complete unless reciprocity be expressly mentioned in it, by the parties declaring “we are partners, in a partnership by reciprocity,”—because the conditions of it cannot otherwise be known. If, however, in entering into such a contract, they declare all the conditions of it, the contract is lawful, although the term reciprocity be not particularly expressed in it, because regard is had to the sense, and not to the letter.

It is lawful between free adults, whether Mussulmans or Zimmee.—A CONTRACT of reciprocity is lawful between two adults who are free, whether they be both Mussulmans, or both Zimmee, since, in either case, an equality exists between the parties. If one of them, also, be a scriptural Zimmee,† and the other a Pagan, the contract is lawful, because infidelity is one general description with respect to faith, and hence equality in point of religion exists in this instance.

It is not lawful between a slave and a freeman, or an infant and an adult.—A CONTRACT of reciprocity is not lawful between a slave and a freeman, or between an infant and an adult; because equality does not exist in those instances;—as an adult freeman is competent to transact business, and to give bail, whereas a slave is not competent in either of those points, but by consent of his master; and an infant is not at all competent to give bail, nor to transact business, but by permission of his guardian.

Or a Mussulman and an infidel.—A CONTRACT of reciprocity is not lawful between a Mussulman and an infidel, according to Haneefa and Mohammed. Abou Yoosaf alleges that it is lawful, because equality exists between those in point of agency and bail, since in the same manner as it is lawful for a Mussulman to be an agent or a surety, so is it also for an infidel: and with respect to those particular transactions which are lawful to one of these, and not to the other (such, for instance, as dealings in wine or pork), they are not regarded, in the same manner as a similar difference is not regarded where a Haneefite enters into a contract of reciprocity with a follower of Shafei, for here the contract is lawful, notwithstanding the different tenets of those sects respecting wilful dealings in the offspring of Tasmees,* which are held to be lawful by the followers of Shafei; but which are deemed illegal by the Haneefites, as being (according to them) forbidden. Such a contract, however, between a Mussulman and a Zimmee is nevertheless abominable (according to Abou Yoosaf); as Zimmee frequently enter into engagements of an unlawful nature, in consequence of which a Mussulman might fall into what is prohibited. The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed is that the two persons in question are not upon an equality in point of power of action,—because, if a Zimmee purchase wine or pork with the capital stock, the purchase is valid, whereas, if a Mussulman were to purchase these articles it is invalid: hence the parties are not upon an equal footing in point of transaction.

Nor between two slaves, two infants, or two Mokatibs.—A CONTRACT of reciprocity is not valid between two slaves, two infants, or two Mokatibs; because a contract of reciprocity is founded upon each party being surety for the other, and the bail of such persons is invalid. It is to be observed, however, that on all occasions where a contract of reciprocity proves invalid from the non-existence of some of its conditions, and those conditions are not requisite in Anan (or partnership in traffic), the contract of reciprocity becomes a contract of partnership in traffic because of the existence of all the conditions requisite in such a contract.

It comprehends both agency and bail.—A CONTRACT of reciprocity comprehends the * Arab. Tissirraf; that is, power of action.

† A Jewish or Christian subject of the Mussulman government.

* Tasmees are camels turned loose and suffered to pasture at large without a herdsman, as being dedicated to God.

properties both of agency and bail. It comprehends the property of agency, because if each of the contracting parties were not the agent of the other, the end (namely, a mutual participation of property), would be defeated. It also comprehends the property of bail, because if each party were not surety for the other, the equality, in certain particulars essential to traffic (such as the demand of payment from either of them for purchases made by the other), could not exist.

A purchase made by either partner is participated between both ; except in articles of subsistence.—WHATEVER is purchased by either of two partners under a contract of reciprocity is participated of by both, except the food and clothing purchased by the partner for himself and his family;—because a contract of reciprocity requires that both parties be upon a perfect equality: and as each is the other's substitute in all dealings, it follows that a purchase made by one is equivalent to a purchase by both. This, however, is exclusive of such articles as are here excepted (which exception proceeds upon a favourable construction), as the articles in question must be excluded from a contract of reciprocity, necessarily, because there is perpetual occasion for them: for one partner cannot be made answerable for the other's wants; neither can one of them expend the property of the other in the supply of his own wants; yet the purchase of these articles is indispensable; and, on account of this indispensable necessity, the food and other articles mentioned appertain solely to the purchaser. (Analogy would suggest that those articles also are participated in by both partners, in conformity with what was before advanced, that "a contract of reciprocity requires that both parties be upon a perfect equality.") The seller of the food or clothing is, however, at liberty to take the price of his commodity from either partner, as he pleases; from the purchaser, evidently, since it was he who bought the article; and also from the other partner, since he is surety for the purchaser; and in this last case the other partner takes from the purchaser a moiety of what he has paid to the seller, as having discharged a debt of the purchaser out of property common to both.

A debt incurred by either partner is obligatory upon the other.—WHATEVER debt is incurred by either of two partners in reciprocity, for a thing in which partnership holds, the other partner is responsible for the same, in order that equality may be established. Of those things in which partnership holds are sale, purchase, and receipt of hire or wages;—and of those in which partnership does not hold are marriage, and divorce for a compensation, composition for blood wilfully shed, and composition for a subsistence, and offences against the person.

Reciprocity in either partner, is binding upon the other:—If a partner in reciprocity become, in behalf of a third person, surety for property to a stranger, it is binding upon the other partner likewise, according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that it is not binding upon the other partner; because a person's becoming surety for another is a gratuitous act* (whence it is that the bail of an infant, a Mazoon, or Mokatib, is invalid,—and also, that if a person give bail upon his deathbed it is valid with respect to a third of his property only);—and as becoming surety is a gratuitous act, it is equivalent to the act of granting a loan, or giving bail for the personal appearance of any one;† in other words, if one of two partners in reciprocity were to grant a loan to a stranger out of the partnership stock, it does not affect the other partner, inasmuch that the right of exacting repayment rests solely with the lender, as lending is a gratuitous act;—and in the same manner, if one of two partners in reciprocity become bail for the personal appearance of any one, a requisition for the production of the person bailed cannot be made to the other partner;—and so likewise in the case in question. The argument of Haneefa is that bail for property is gratuitous in its principle, but in its consequence induces a kind of obligation or contract; because, in consequence of the bail, the surety is entitled to exact of the person bailed whatever he pays to his creditors, provided the bail had been given with his concurrence: it is therefore comprehended in a contract of reciprocity, with regard to its continuance (and the circumstance of its continuance is the point in question, as we say "it becomes binding upon his partner after becoming so upon himself"). With respect to what the two disciples urge, that "a person's becoming surety for another is a gratuitous act; whence the bail of an infant, a Mazoon, or Mokatib, is invalid; and consequently, that it is not comprehended in a contract of reciprocity," we reply, that a contract of bail entered into by incompetent persons is invalid in its principle; but in the case in question it is binding upon the other partner in the circumstance of its continuance only. Bail, therefore, with regard to its continuance, as being an act of exchange, bears a relation to traffic; and traffic is comprehended in a contract of reciprocity. If a dying person, on the other hand, enter into a contract of bail, it is valid with respect to a third of his property, in regard to its execution, as well as its continuance. Thus bail for property is not of a gratuitous nature in its continuance, whereas bail for the person, on the contrary, is gratuitous, both in its execution and its continuance. Hence bail for property is in no respect analogous to bail for the person. As to what the two disciples further urge, that "if one of two partners in reciprocity were to grant a loan to a stranger out of the partnership stock, it does not affect the other partner, as lending is a gratuitous act,"—it is not admitted; because it is recorded from Haneefa, that the act of lending does affect the partner: if, however, it even were admitted by Haneefa, as not affecting the other partner, we reply that a loan in money is equivalent to the act of lending any article of goods or effects; and hence the property paid to the lender by the borrower may be said to be the same identical property which he had borrowed, and not a compensation for it (whence a stipulated time or place of repayment are not valid in it), and therefore, that lending does not bear the property of exchange.

* All concessions, or acts of a gratuitous description, are admitted in law to affect only the actor himself.

† There is a material difference between bail for property, and bail for the person; as is shown at large elsewhere. (See Bail)

Unless it be engaged in without consent of the suretee.—All which is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the bail for property having been contracted with the concurrence of the person bailed. If, however, it be entered into without his concurrence, it is not binding upon the other partner (according to the Rawayet Saheeh of Haneefa), because in a bail so contracted the property of mutual obligation or exchange does not exist in its continuance. Let it be observed, also, that indemnification for usurped property, or indemnification for damages, stand on the same ground as bail for property, as these are of a retributive nature in their principle.

An accession of property to either partner by gift or inheritance resolves a partnership by reciprocity into a partnership in traffic.—If a property,* of such a nature as that partnership in it is valid, should fall to one of two partners in reciprocity, by inheritance,—or, if any person present him with such property, by gift, and he take possession of it,—the contract of reciprocity is null, and the partnership becomes a Shirkat Ainan, because equality in point of property (such as is capable of constituting capital stock) is a condition essential to a contract of reciprocity throughout, and this does not exist in the present case, as the other partner is not a participator in the property so acquired by gift or inheritance, no principle of partnership therein appearing with respect to him. The partnership by reciprocity, however, is resolved into a Shirkat Ainan, or partnership in traffic, as the case admits of such a partnership, equality not being essential thereto; in reciprocity, on the other hand, it is essential, and consequently reciprocity no longer continues. The reason of this is that a contract of reciprocity is not of an absolute nature: now, in a contract which is not of an absolute nature, the rules with respect to its continuance and its commencement are one and the same; hence an increase of the capital stock [of either parties] during its continuance is equivalent to an inequality in its commencement; and as an inequality of capital, in the commencement of a partnership of reciprocity, is prohibitory to contracting it, so, in the same manner, such inequality taking place during its continuance prohibits it:—the contract of reciprocity, therefore, terminates.

Unless the property be of a nature incapable of continuing stock.—If one of two partners in reciprocity inherit goods or effects,* these are his sole property; but the contract of reciprocity does not become null (and the same rule also obtains if one of them inherit land); because, as those articles are incapable of constituting capital stock, equality with respect to them is not a condition.

Section.

Partnership by reciprocity cannot be contracted but in cash.—PARTNERSHIP by reciprocity cannot be contracted but in dirms, deenars, or fluctuating faloos;† Malik alleges that such a partnership is lawful in goods and effects, and also in all articles estimable by weight, or measurement of capacity, where the species is the same, because a partnership so contracted respects a known and specified capital, whence those articles are equivalent to money. It is otherwise in a contract of Mozaribat; for that is restricted solely to cash, the legality of it being contrary to analogy, since under this species of engagement a profit is acquired on property concerning which there is no responsibility (as the manager is not responsible for the Mozaribat stock), and the prophet has forbidden the acquisition of gain upon property in which there is no responsibility; the contract, therefore, must not go beyond what is prescribed by the law; and the only thing in which the law declares Mozaribat to be lawful is cash. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—FIRST, if a contract of reciprocity, in goods and effects, were held to be legal (as maintained by Malik), it would necessarily induce a profit upon a property concerning which there is no responsibility; because, upon each partner in reciprocity selling his own particular capital (consisting of goods and effects), if the goods of one partner produce a greater price than the goods of the other, the excess of profit upon the goods of the former would be due to the latter; and this would be a profit from property for which the person who gains by it is not responsible, and in which he has no right; because in this instance the contract is connected with actual goods, and not with the semblance of them, such as debts; and the goods are a trust in the hands of each partner respectively;—whence it is evident that a profit is induced upon property concerning which there is no responsibility. It is otherwise with cash, because whatever either partner may purchase with the capital stock, consisting of cash, the purchase thereof is not connected with the actual capital, but with its semblance, namely, debt (since the price of it is a debt);—now the purchase being connected with the semblance of the capital (namely, debt), and the other partner also being liable to be called upon for it (as a contract of reciprocity involves mutual bail), it follows that the consequence objected (of profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility) is not induced, since this is a property in which there is responsibility. SECONDLY, The first transaction in goods and effects is the sale of them; and the first transaction in cash is purchase made with it:—now a person selling his property under the condition of another being his partner in the proceeds is unlawful, since this is endowing with a right of property in the debt, and an endowment of right in a debt, made to any other than the debtor himself, is illegal: on the other hand, his making a purchase with his own property, under the condition of another being his partner in the article purchased, is lawful, since this is endowing with a right of property in an actual substance, and not in a debt.

And copper coinage is comprehended under the head of cash.—FALOOS-RABIHA, or fluctuating copper coins, are connected with dirms and deenars [cash], as they pass current, in the same manner as gold and silver coin. Mohammed is of this opinion, because he holds that faloos are cash, inasmuch that they cannot be particularized by specification; whence it is that if any person were to purchase an article, for certain faloos, he is at liberty to give any other faloos in place of them; and also, that two specified faloos cannot be sold for one faloo, according to what is established. According to the two elders, partnership, or Mozaribat, are not lawful in faloos, although they be current, as the valuation of them fluctuates from time to time, and they at length become the same as goods or effects.* Abou Yousaf is elsewhere said to entertain the same opinion with Mohammed upon this point. It is also recorded, from Haneefa, that a contract of Mozaribat is lawful in current faloos; but not a contract of reciprocity. Thus part-

Or in gold or silver bullion, where that passes in currency.—It is to be observed, however, that if gold or silver bullion, by general usage, pass current for value,† in this case partnership by reciprocity is lawful in it. This is also related in the Kadooree. It is asserted, in the Jama Sagheer, that partnership by reciprocity is not lawful in gold or silver bullion; for, according to that authority, uncoined gold and silver are the same as household stuff, distinguishable by identic specification, and therefore incapable of constituting capital in either partnership or Mozaribat. It is said in the Mabsoot, treating of exchange, that gold or silver cannot be identified by specification, inasmuch that a contract of sale is not broken in consequence of any accident to the bullion before delivery (that is, if a person purchase any article, agreeing to give for it certain gold or silver uncoined, and it be lost before delivery, the contract of sale is not broken, because the gold or silver cannot be particularly specified).—Now such being the case, it follows (according to this statement) that uncoined gold or silver are capable of constituting capital stock, in either Mozaribat or partnership, on this ground, that the precious metals were originally introduced for the purpose of valuation‡ The opinion delivered in the Jama Sagheer, however, is the most approved; because, although the precious metals were originally introduced for the purposes of traffic, yet their capacity to represent property depends upon their being coined, as, when once coined, they are no longer liable to be used for any other purpose (such as making ornaments for the person, and so forth): uncoined gold or silver, therefore, does not constitute value, except where the use of it in that way is customary, in which case it is the same as coin, and consequently a representative of property, and as such capable of constituting capital stock. It is to be observed that what was before advanced, that “partnership by reciprocity is not lawful in anything beyond dirms, deenars, and current faloos,” applies to all articles of weight and measurement of capacity, or which are of a heterogeneous nature.§ The illegality of reciprocal partnership in these articles is admitted by all our doctors, provided the partnership be contracted previous to the union or admixture of stocks, in which case it is illegal, and each partner receives the profit arising from his own particular commodity, and the loss upon it also falls on him. If, also, two persons mix homogeneous stocks, and then enter into a contract of partnership, Abou Yoosaf holds the rule to be the same, and that a partnership by right of property is here established, not a partnership by reciprocity. Such, also, is the doctrine of the Zahir Rawayet. According to Mohammed, the contract of partnership, in this instance, holds good.

Or (according to Mohammed) in homogeneous stocks, after admixture.—THE result of this difference of opinion appears where the property of both partners is equal, and they stipulate a larger profit to one, and a smaller profit to the other;—for in this case, according to Abou Yoosaf, each is to receive in proportion to his property, and he in whose favour the larger profit had been stipulated is not on that account entitled to receive any excess; but, according to Mohammed, each is to receive agreeably to what was stipulated. The ground upon which the Zahir Rawayet proceeds is that articles of weight and measurement of capacity,* and so forth, are distinguishable by specification after admixture, in the same manner as before. The argument of Mohammed is that the articles in question are, in one shape, value; for if a person were to sell goods for such articles, so that the price of the goods (consisting of those articles), is a debt upon the purchaser, it is lawful; and, in another shape, they are subjects of sale, as admitting of specification: attention, therefore, is paid to both these circumstances, with respect to situations both of admixture and of non-admixture: in other words, partnership in them, before admixture, is unlawful, as they are then subjects of sale; but after admixture it is lawful, as they then constitute value: contrary to the case of goods and effects of any other description, since these are not value in any shape.

It cannot be contracted respecting heterogeneous stocks.—If the stocks [of the respective parties] be of two different species, such as barley and wheat, or olives and pepper, and the proprietor unite them, and then enter into a contract of partnership, it is unlawful according to all our doctors. The reason for this distinction, according to Mohammed, is that whatever is mixed, of one species, is Zoatal Imisal;† and whatever is mixed, of two different species, is

Zoatal Keem.* now as things of different species, when mixed together, are Zoatal Keem, ignorance exists with respect to them (because, it is requisite that appraisers fix the value of them),† and they are therefore incapable of constituting capital stock, in the same manner as any other goods or effects:—a partnership in them is consequently invalid; and such being the case, they become subject to the rules in admixture of property, as treated of under the head of Decrees, in the Jama Sagheer, and which shall be fully set forth (in this work) when we treat of deposits.‡

Partnership by right of property is effected by each partner selling one half of his stock to the other.—WHERE two persons are desirous of entering into a contract of partnership in goods and effects, each must sell one half of his own goods in lieu of one half of the goods of the other, so that a Shirkat-Milk, or partnership by right of property may be established between them; and then let them enter into partnership by compact.—(Our author remarks that in this instance a partnership in right of property is established, but that a partnership by reciprocity is not lawful, as goods and effects are incapable of constituting stock in such a partnership.) With respect to what is advanced above, that “each partner must sell one half of his own goods in lieu of one half of the goods of the other,” it means, that each is thus to sell a moiety of his goods to the other, provided the value of the goods of each be equal. If, however, the value of the goods of each be different, it is requisite that he whose goods are of least value sell such a proportion as may suffice to establish a partnership; for instance, if the value of the goods of one be four hundred dirms, and that of those of the other be one hundred dirms, then let the latter sell four-fifths of his goods to the former, in lieu of one-fifth of his goods, so that the whole of the goods may be held in partnership between the parties, in five lots, or shares. With respect to what is advanced by our author, as above, that "a partnership in right of property is established, but a partnership by reciprocity is not lawful," it is of no weight; for, rendering goods and effects capital stock in a contract of reciprocity is illegal, only, because this would induce a profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility,—or, because the respective capital of each would be unknown at the time of division: but neither of these reasons exist in the case in question:—the first reason does not exist, because upon each selling a moiety of his estate to the other, the half of each partner, respectively, is a subject of responsibility to the other, with respect to its value, and hence the profit which accrues from the property of both is a profit from property which is a subject of responsibility: and the second reason does not exist evidently, because there is no occasion for specifying the respective capital of each partner at the time of division, so as to require the valuation of appraisers, thence inferring ignorance respecting it, because the property of both is equal, and they are both partners in that property, and consequently, whatever price the property may bring must necessarily be divided between them in equal shares.

† Before the respective proportion of each partner, in the capital stock, can be ascertained.

‡ The arguments throughout this and the preceding passages are so much involved in subtle distinction and perplexing casuistry, and are in many places so little capable of an intelligible translation (from the impossibility of rendering clearly the technical terms which so frequently occur in them), as greatly to obscure the matter. The principle upon which the whole turns is that “a partnership by reciprocity cannot be entered into with respect to any articles which are not standards of value;” and the question is, “what articles they are which may be considered as standards?”—which some of the doctors confine solely to cash in the precious metals: others extend it to bullion; and others, again, to copper coins [faloos]; whilst some include grain, contending that this is a standard of value, and may therefore be used to represent property, in the same manner as cash.

Description of partnership in traffic.—SHIRKAT-AINAN, or partnership in traffic, is contracted by each party respectively becoming the agent of the other, but not his bail. This species of partnership is where two persons become partners in any particular traffic, such as in clothes or wheat (for instance), or where they become partners in all manner of commerce indifferently.

It does not admit mutual bail, but it requires mutual agency.—No mention, however, is to be made concerning bail, in their agreement, as bail is not a condition in a partnership of this nature:—but it is indispensably requisite that each act as agent on behalf of the other; since, without this, the design (namely, partnership in property), cannot be obtained; as acts done on behalf of another are performed either in virtue of some avowed authority, or of agency; and no authority existing, agency is constituted, in order that each may act for the other, so that the property may be held in partnership between them.

It admits of inequality in point of stock.—If the stock of one of these partners exceed that of the other, it is lawful, because there is occasion for this equality (as shall be hereafter demonstrated), and the terms in which such a partnership is contracted do not require equality.

And also of a disproportionate profit.—In partnership in traffic, it is lawful that the stock of each partner be equal, and yet the profit unequally shared;—that is, that it be stipulated that the profit, to one partner exceed the profit to the other. Ziffer and Shafei maintain that this is not lawful; for if, with equality of stocks, an inequality of profit be admitted, it induces a profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility; because, if the capital appertain to the two in equal shares, and the profit be divided into three lots (for instance), the sharer in the larger proportion of profit is entitled to a superior profit without any responsibility, since the responsibility is in proportion to the capital;—and also, because a partnership in the profit exists in virtue of partnership in the capital (according to their tenets, whence they likewise hold the admixture of the property to be a condition);—the profit upon the property, therefore, is the same as increase of living stock; and each is consequently entitled thereto, in proportion to his original right of property in the capital. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—FIRST, the prophet has said, "The profit between them is according to their agreement, and their loss in proportion to the property of each respectively;" where no distinction is made between the equality or inequality of their properties.—SECONDLY, in the same manner as a person is entitled to profit in virtue of property, he is also entitled to it in virtue of labour (as in a case of Mozaribat, for instance): it may also sometimes happen that one of the partners is more skilful and expert in business than the other, and consequently, that he will not agree to the other sharing equally in the profit, whence it is requisite that one have a larger share than the other. It would be otherwise if the whole profit were restricted to one of the partners, because in this instance the contract is not a contract of partnership: neither is it a contract of Mozaribat, for if, in Mozaribat, the whole profit be assigned to the manager, it is a loan; or if to the proprietor of the stock, it is a Bazat. With respect to what is objected by Ziffer and Shafei, that "if, with equality of stocks, an inequality of profit be admitted, it induces a profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility,"—we reply that a contract of partnership in traffic resembles a contract of Mozaribat, in this particular, that each party respectively manages with the stock of his partner; and it also resembles partnership by reciprocity, both with regard to its name (as being a partnership), and likewise with regard to the conduct of it, because both partners act in it. In consideration, therefore, of its resemblance to Mozaribat, we determine that it is lawful to stipulate a profit upon property concerning which there is no responsibility; and, in consideration of its resemblance to partnership by reciprocity, we determine that, if it be stipulated that both partners shall act, alike,* yet the contract of partnership in actual stock is not invalidated.

A person may engage a part only of his property in it.—It is lawful for either party, in partnership in traffic, to engage in the contract with respect to a part of his property only, and not the whole, because an equality in point of stocks is not essential to it, since the term Ainan does not require it.

The stock can only be such as is lawful in reciprocal partnership.—PARTNERSHIP in traffic is not valid except in such property as is lawful in partnership by reciprocity.

But the respective stocks may be heterogeneous.—It is lawful for two men to engage in a partnership in traffic, where the stock of one party consists of dirms, and that of the other party of deenars, or where on one side it consists of white dirms, and on the other of black dirms.† Ziffer and Shafei allege that this is illegal. This difference of opinion is founded on a difference of sentiments respecting the admixture of stocks; for, according to those two doctors, a coalescence of the capital is essential to the partnership; and that cannot take place where the two stocks are heterogeneous. This point will be more fully treated of hereafter.

Debts can only be claimed from the partner who incurs them.—WHERE one of two partners in traffic makes a purchase, the demand for the price lies against him, and not against the other partner (because, as has been already demonstrated, the contract of partnership in question comprehends agency, but not bail; and the agent is the original with respect to rights).‡

And this partner, on making payment, has recourse to the other for his proportion.—And on making payment, the purchaser is to take from the other partner his proportion of the price (provided he has satisfied the demand out of his own particular property, and not out of the partnership stock), because he is the other's agent with respect to his share. If, however, it be not known whether he has paid the price out of the partnership stock, or out of his own property, except from the declaration of the purchaser himself, it is in this case incumbent upon him to produce proof; because the purchaser here advances a claim for property against his partner; and the partner resists his claim: and the declaration of a defendant (delivered upon oath), is to be credited.

The contract is annulled by the loss of the whole capital; or of the stock of either partner in particular.—If the whole partnership stock, or the stock of either partner in particular, perish before any purchase be made, the contract of partnership is annulled: because, in a contract of partnership, the subject of the contract is property (that being specified in a contract of partnership, in the same manner as in a deed of gift, or a will), and, in consequence of the destruction of the subject, the contract is dissolved, in the same manner as in sale. It is otherwise in Mozaribat, and singular agency, because in those the dirms or deenars cannot be identified by specification, or in any other mode than by actual seisin. The agency herein mentioned is restricted to the singular description, for the purpose of distinguishing it from the agency implicated in a contract of partnership or of pawning, because that is annulled by the dissolution of the partnership or the pawning, as a thing which is comprehended is annulled by the dissolution of that which comprehended it. An example of singular agency is where a person commissions another to purchase him a slave (for instance), in which case, if he give the agent money for that purpose, and the money perish in the agent's hands, yet the agency is not annulled. "It is otherwise" (says Fakr-al-Islam, in his commentary on the Zeeadat), "in cases of Mozaribat and partnership, because the dirms and deenars are in both identified by specification, inasmuch that if the money be lost before delivery, the Mozaribat is annulled." This is contradictory to what our author has above advanced, that, "in Mozaribat and singular agency, the dirms and deenars cannot be identified by specification, nor in any other way than by actual seisin." It is, however, probable that there are two opinions recorded on this point. What is above said, that "if the whole partnership stock, or the stock of either partner in particular, perish before any purchases be made, the contract of partnership is annulled,"—is evident, where the whole stock of both partners perishes; and where the stock of one of the partners perishes the contract is also annulled; because the partner whose property has not perished had agreed to the other participating in his property for no other reason than that he should also participate in the other's property; but, upon this being rendered impossible, he will not agree that the other should participate in his property.

And (in the last case) the loss falls entirely upon the partner to whom such stock had belonged.—THE contract, therefore, is void, as its continuance is useless: and, to whomsoever the destroyed property belonged, the loss affects him only, and not the other, whether it perish in his own hands, or in the hands of his partner;—if in his own hands evidently; and also, if in the hands of his partner, because it is a trust in the hands of that person.*

Unless it had perished after admixture.—It is otherwise, however, where the stock perishes after admixture; for in this case the loss falls upon the partnership stock generally, since, as the property of each is no longer distinguishable, it follows that the loss must affect both.

A purchase made by one partner, where the stock of the other afterwards perishes, is participated in by both; and the partnership continues in force, agreeably to the contract.

—If one of the partners in question make a purchase with his own stock, and the stock of the other afterwards perish before he has made any purchase with it, in this case the thing purchased by the first partner is in partnership between the two, agreeably to stipulation; because, as partnership subsisted between them at the time of the purchase, the article purchased became a subject of partnership between them at that time; and the effect is not altered by the destruction of the other's property after the purchase. This partnership in the purchase is a partnership by contract † (according to Mohammed), inasmuch that, whoever of the two sells it, the sale is lawful. Hassan-Ibn-Zeeyad alleges that the partnership is merely a partnership by right of property, ‡ inasmuch that it is not lawful for either partner to sell more than his own share, because the contract of partnership was dissolved in the present instance, in consequence of the destruction of stock, in the same manner as where the destruction takes place before any purchase being made; nothing, therefore, remains, except the effect of the purchase, namely, right of property [in the thing purchased], and hence it is a partnership by right of property. The argument of Mohammed is that the contract has been completely fulfilled with respect to the article purchased, and consequently cannot be rendered void by the destruction of property after such completion. It is to be observed that, in the case now under consideration, the purchaser is to take from his partner his proportion of the price [of the article purchased], because he bought a moiety of it by agency, and paid the price out of his own substance, as was before mentioned.—What is now advanced proceeds upon a supposition of the purchase made by one partner having been effected before the destruction of the other's stock.

But if it perish before the other's purchase, that continues between them under a partnership by right of property.—If, however, the stock of one partner first perish, and the other partner then make a purchase with his own substance, and it should have been expressly agreed, in the contract, that each is to act as an agent on behalf of the other, in this case whatever the purchaser may have bought is divided between the two, according to their previous stipulation; because, although the contract of partnership be annulled, yet the agency, which was expressly mentioned in it, continues in force; the purchase is therefore participated in by both, in virtue of the agency; the connexion continues a partnership by right of property; and the purchaser is accordingly to take from his partner his proportion of the price, for the reason before stated.

Unless there be no mention of mutual agency in the contract; for in this case it belongs solely to the purchaser.—If, on the other hand, the partnership only be mentioned in the contract, and nothing expressed in it respecting each partner acting as an agent on the other's behalf, the article purchased by one partner appertains solely to him; because, if the article were participated between the two, it could be so only in virtue of the mutual agency implicated in the contract; but, that being annulled, the power of agency implicated in it is also annulled. It is otherwise where the parties have expressly mentioned a mutual power of agency; because in this case the agency is not annulled by the annulment of the partnership, as agency is here one especial design of the contract, and is not merely implicated in it.

Partnership holds without admixture of stocks.—A PARTNERSHIP is legal, although the parties should not have mixed stocks. Ziffer and Shafei maintain that it is illegal, because the profit is a branch of the stock, and the branch is not to be participated in except where the original stock itself is also participated, which cannot be so but by coalescence or admixture. The ground upon which they proceed is that, in a contract of partnership, the stock is the subject of the contract (whence it is that the partnership is referred to the stock, by each partner saying to the other, "I make you my partner in such stock,"—and also, that the specification of the capital is an essential),—and, such being the case, it is indispensably requisite that the stock be participated in by both. It is otherwise in Mozaribat, as that is not partnership, since it implies nothing more than that, as the manager is to act for the proprietor of the stock, he is consequently entitled to a share in the profit, as wages on account of his labour, which is different from the case in question, where the profit is a branch of the stock, and not wages for labour. This is a grand leading principle with Ziffer and Shafei, inasmuch that (arguing upon this ground) they allege it to be indispensable, in a contract of partnership, that the stock of both partners be of the same species; for, if otherwise (as where one is possessed of dirms and the other of deenars), they hold that the contract is invalid because of the capital not being participated in by both: and they also allege (upon the same principle) that admixture is an essential: and likewise, that it is unlawful to stipulate an excess of profit to either partner, where their stocks are equal, as the profit is a branch of the stock:—and also, that partnership in arts* and trades† is illegal, as in those there is no stock (as shall be hereafter explained).—The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—FIRST, partnership in profit is referred to the contract, and not to the stock; because, as the contract is termed “a contract of partnership,” it is indispensable that the property of the term partnership exist in it; and, such being the case, it follows that the admixture is not essential.—SECONDLY, as the money [of which the stock consists] is not specified, the profit is not derived from the capital, nor indeed from anything else than the transactions [which are had with the stock]; because each party is a principal, with respect to one half of the stock, and an agent with respect to the other half; and, as it hence appears that partnership may be established, in point of transaction, without admixture of stocks, it follows that it may also be established in the thing which accrues from transaction (namely, the profit), without such admixture: and, as the contract of partnership thus becomes similar to a contract of Mozaribat, a similarity of species in the stocks, and an equality of profit, are not essentials, although the stock of each be equal. A partnership in arts is also lawful on the same principle.

‡ That is, existing merely in virtue of a mutual right of property, and not of the contract.

Partnership does not admit a specification of profit in behalf of either partner.—A CONTRACT of partnership, which stipulates any particular sum out of the profit for one of the partners, is unlawful, as this condition is a means of destroying partnership, since it is possible that no more profit may be acquired altogether, than the sum so stipulated. Correspondent to this is a case of cultivation; that is to say, where the parties, in a compact of cultivation, stipulate a particular quantity of produce to one of them (that is, to the cultivator or to the landlord), the compact is invalid; because such a stipulation is a means of destroying partnership; and in cultivation it is essential that the produce of the land be equally participated between those persons.

Either partner may make over his stock, in the manner of a Bazat.—EACH of the partners, in a contract either of reciprocal partnership or of partnership in actual stock, is at liberty to give his stock in the manner of a Bazat; because it is customary so to do in contracts of partnership; and also, because either partner is at liberty to hire any person to work for the acquisition of profit; and as the acquisition of profit without any return is still less objectionable than hiring with the same view, he is consequently authorized to adopt the other mode à fortiori.

Or lodge it as a deposit.—In the same manner, also, either of them is at liberty to lodge this capital as a deposit, as this is customary, and sometimes necessary, among merchants.

Or intrust it to the care of a manager, by Mozaribat.—EACH of them is also at liberty to give his capital in the way of Mozaribat, because, as Mozaribat is subordinate to partnership either by reciprocity or in traffic, it follows that a contract of partnership comprehends Mozaribat. It is recorded from Haneefa that a partner has not this in his power, because Mozaribat is also a mode of partnership. The former opinion, however, is according to the Mabsoot, and is the most approved, because partnership is not the design of a contract of Mozaribat, the only view in it being the acquisition of profit. It is therefore lawful to give the capital in the way of Mozaribat, in the same manner as it is lawful for the proprietor of the stock to hire a labourer with wages. It is lawful, indeed, in a superior degree, because, where the Mozarib manages, and no profit is acquired, there are no wages owing to him from the proprietor of the stock, whereas, in a case of hire, where the hired person manages the stock and no profit is acquired, wages are nevertheless due to him from the hirer. It is otherwise with respect to a contract of partnership, for neither party is at liberty to engage in such a contract with a third person, with regard to the capital, because a thing cannot be a dependant of a similar thing.

Either partner may also appoint an agent on his own behalf.—EITHER of two partners, by reciprocity, or in traffic, is at liberty to constitute a person his agent to transact for him, because the appointment of an agent for purchase and sale is a dependency of traffic; and contracts of partnership are formed for the purpose of traffic. It is otherwise with an agent for purchase, for he is not at liberty to constitute another person his agent, to make the purchase on his behalf, as the appointment of an agent for purchase is a particular contract, the end of which is the acquisition of some specified and existent article, and a thing cannot be the dependant of its similar.

Each partner holds the stock in the manner of a trust.—THE possession of each of two partners, by reciprocity or in traffic, over the partnership stock, is considered as the possession of a trust, since each possesses the property with consent of the proprietor, for this reason, that he is to give something in lieu of it, in the same manner as where a person takes possession of a thing with a view to purchase it (not because it is a pledge, as in pawnage); the stock is therefore a deposit.

Description of partnership in arts.—SHIRKAT SANNAI, or partnership in arts (which is also termed *Shirkat Takabbal), signifies where two tailors, or two dyers (for instance), become partners, by agreeing to work and to share their earnings in partnership; which is lawful, according to our doctors. Ziffer and Shafei allege that this is unlawful; because the design of partnership is a participation of gain between the parties, and the partnership in question is not calculated to answer this end, since a capital is indispensable, as partnership in profit is founded on partnership in stock (according to their tenets, as before set forth), and in the case in question there is no capital. The argument of our doctors is that the design of the contract in question is the acquisition of property, which is attainable by each party constituting the other his agent; because upon each becoming agent on the part of the other with respect to one half, and a principal with respect to the other half, a partnership is established in the property to be acquired.

It is not requisite that the parties both follow the same trade or reside in the same place.—Unity of trade and of dwelling-place are not essentials in this species of partnership. Malik and Ziffer controvert this; for according to them unity of trade and of residence are essentials.

OBJECTION.—It was before mentioned that, according to Ziffer, partnership in arts is unlawful; but here it appears that he holds it to be lawful; which is a contradiction.

REPLY.—There are two reports of the opinion of Ziffer upon this point. That before recited is conformable to one report; and what is now mentioned is according to another report.

The argument of Ziffer in support of his latter opinion is that if the parties be of different trades (such as where a dyer and a bleacher become partners), each will be at a loss with respect to the business undertaken by the other, as that is not his trade; the end of partnership, therefore, cannot be obtained: in the same manner, also, if their places of residence be different, each is at a loss with respect to the business of the other. The argument of our doctors is that the cause of the legality of the partnership (namely, the acquisition of property) is in no way affected by unity of trade and place of residence, or the reverse:—it is not affected by unity of trade, or the reverse, because an appointment of agency made by agreement, with respect to any business, is approved, whether the person who undertakes it be able to execute it in a good and sufficient manner, or not at all, since the person who so agrees is not under any obligation to perform the business himself, but is at liberty to appoint any other person to perform it; and as each party has it in his power thus to appoint a person to perform the business in question, the contract is consequently valid: neither is it affected by unity of place, or the reverse, because, if one of the two partners work in one shop, and the other in another shop, yet it is evident that no difference whatever is thereby created in essential circumstances.

It admits an inequality of profit.—It is to be remarked, that if, in the case now under consideration, the partners stipulate to perform equal labour, and to divide the acquisition arising from it in three lots,* the same is lawful, upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that this is unlawful, because the responsibility is in proportion to the labour, whence, if this stipulation were admitted, it would induce a profit from a matter concerning which there is no responsibility: any excess to either party, therefore, is unlawful in the present instance, in the same manner as it is unlawful in a Shirkat Wadjooh, or partnership upon credit (as shall be hereafter demonstrated). The reason for a more favourable construction is that what each of the partners takes he does not take in the manner of profit; as gain does not bear the denomination of profit except where the stock and the gain are of the same nature; but they are not of the same nature in the case in question, because the capital, in this instance, is industry, and the profit substance; the property so acquired, therefore, is not profit, but merely a return for industry: now industry is appreciable by means of estimation; and consequently, where both partners agree to receive a certain specific proportion, such proportion is an estimate of the industry of each respectively: the excess, therefore, is not unlawful with respect to him in whose behalf it is stipulated. It is otherwise in a partnership upon credit, because in that instance the gain is of the same species with the capital (as both consist of substance); and profit is established where the capital and the gain are of the same nature; and as profit on property concerning which there is no responsibility is unlawful, except in a contract of Mozaribat, it follows that it is unlawful in a contract of partnership upon credit: the case in question, therefore, is in no respect analogous to a case of partnership upon credit.

The work agreed for by either partner is binding upon the other; and either is at liberty to call upon the employer for payment.—In a partnership in arts, whatever work one partner agrees to is incumbent upon him, and also upon the other partner, inasmuch that the employer may require the performance of it from either; and each is entitled to demand payment from the employer for the business performed. Upon the employer, also, thus paying either, he is thereby discharged of all demands. This is evident where the partnership in arts is of a reciprocal nature (by both partners being upon an equality with respect to those particulars in which equality is requisite in a contract of reciprocity);—and where the partnership in question is not of a reciprocal nature, but in the manner of a partnership in traffic, the same is admitted, on a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest otherwise; because the partnership has been contracted in general terms, without any mention of bail; and bail is not one of the articles of a partnership in traffic: it would therefore follow that the employer is not empowered to require the performance of the business from either of them indifferently; and also, that they are not both empowered to require payment from the employer;—and likewise, that the employer is not discharged from all demands, by paying either indifferently. The reason for a more favourable construction is that the partnership is an occasion of responsibility; that is, in consequence of the partnership, the performance of work is incumbent upon the parties; whence any business engaged in by either is incumbent upon the other also; and the other is accordingly entitled to the payment, as one of them engaging to perform any work equally affects the other; for if the other also were not subject to this obligation, he would not be entitled to payment: the partnership in question, therefore, is equivalent to a partnership by reciprocity, with respect to the obligation of work, and the taking possession of the payment for it.

Description of partnership upon credit.—SHIRKAT WADJOOH, or partnership upon credit, is where two persons, not being possessed of any property, become partners by agreeing to purchase goods jointly, upon their personal credit* (without immediately paying the price), and to sell them on their joint account. This species of partnership is termed Wadjooh, for this reason, that no person can purchase articles upon credit but one possessed of personal notoriety [Wijahit] among mankind.

It may include reciprocity.—It may lawfully constitute a partnership by reciprocity; because each partner may become both bail and agent for the other. Where, therefore, two persons, capable of bail, make a purchase of any article, on condition that it shall be held between them in equal shares, introducing the term "by reciprocity" into their agreement, it is a contract of reciprocity. If, on the other hand, they express their agreement merely in general terms, it is a Shirkat Ainan, or partnership in traffic, because, when thus generally expressed, it is conducted in the manner of such a partnership. The legality of the partnership in question is according to our doctors. Shafei alleges that it is illegal. The arguments on both sides have been already recited.

Each partner is agent for the other.—In partnership upon credit, each partner is agent on behalf of the other, with respect to what he purchases;—because any act which affects another is unlawful, except it be performed in virtue either of agency or of authority;* and as authority does not exist in the present instance, agency is certified.

The profit of each partner must be in proportion to the share of each in the adventure.—If the partners agree that what they purchase shall be held between them in equal shares, and that the profit also shall be equally divided, it is lawful: but it is not lawful, in such a case, to stipulate an excess of profit to one of them. If, however, they agree that what they purchase shall be held between them in three lots, and that the profit also shall be divided into three lots,† it is lawful. In short, if the profit be in proportion to the right of property it is lawful, but otherwise not. The reason of this is that men are entitled to profit only on account of stock, management, or responsibility; thus the proprietor of a stock is entitled to profit in virtue of the stock; a manager in virtue of his management; and a master artisan, who employs a scholar or apprentice at half wages or third wages (for instance) is entitled to the profit arising from his work in virtue of his responsibility for such work (whence it is that if a person say to another, "Transact with your own stock on condition that the profit be mine," it is unlawful, because in such a case, no one of the above particulars exists). As men, therefore, are entitled to profit only on some one of these three principles, and as, in a partnership of credit, the title to profit is in virtue of responsibility (as aforesaid), and as, also, responsibility attaches in proportion to the right of property in the thing purchased, it follows that whatever exceeds the proportion of such right of property is a profit upon a thing concerning which there is no responsibility. Now the stipulation of profit from a thing concerning which there is no responsibility is not valid except in a contract of Mozaribat; and a partnership upon credit has not the property of a contract of Mozaribat. It is otherwise in a partnership in traffic, as that has the property of a contract of Mozaribat, inasmuch as each partner in traffic transacts business with the stock of the other partner, in the same manner as a manager transacts with the stock of the proprietor, whence a partnership in traffic is, in effect, a Mozaribat.

Of Invalid Partnerships.

Partnership does not hold in articles of a neutral nature.—PARTNERSHIP is not lawful in wood, grass, or game. If, therefore, two persons enter into a contract of partnership with respect to such articles, and afterwards collect wood, or grass, or kill game in hunting, the wood or grass so collected, or the game so killed, by either of them, belongs to him solely, and not to the other partner. The same rule holds in cases where two persons enter into a contract of partnership with respect to any other articles of a neutral nature (such as fruit collected from the trees of the forest, which are common property); because a contract of partnership comprehends a commission of agency; and the appointment of an agent for procuring things of a neutral description is null, because the instructions of a constituent to this effect are invalid, since an appointment of agency signifies an endowing with authority to transact concerning a matter originally subject to the acts of the constituent only, and not of the agent; but it is otherwise in the case in question, as the agent is here at liberty himself to take the neutral article without the instruction of his constituent, and consequently is incapable of appearing as his deputy concerning it. In short, a right of property in a neutral article is established only by the acts of taking and putting it in custody.

Unless they be taken possession of jointly.—If, therefore, both partners take it jointly, it is equally in partnership between them, as they are both equally entitled to it. But if one of them only exert himself in taking it, the other doing nothing, it belongs wholly to the one who acts: if, on the other hand, one be the chief actor, and the other only an assistant (as where one plucks the fruit, and the other collects it,—or, where one both plucks and gathers it, and the other carries it away), in this case the assistant is to receive wages in proportion to his labour.—This is according to Mohammed. (Abou Yoosaf alleges that this rule holds only where the wages do not exceed half the value of the article in question; but that, if the wages exceed this, one half of the value only is paid to the assistant, because, as he had agreed to accept one half of the article specified, his right fails with respect to any larger proportion.)

Nor in this instance, where the means of acquiring them are different.—If one man possess a mule, and another a Mashack (or leather bucket, such as is used in drawing water), and they enter into a contract of partnership in drawing water,* by agreeing that whatever may be acquired thereby shall be in partnership between them, such partnership is invalid, the whole acquisition going to the person who actually draws the water; and if this be the owner of the mule, he owes the other the adequate hire for the bucket; or, if it be the owner of the bucket, he owes the other an adequate hire for the mule. The reason of the partnership being invalid is that it is contracted with respect to an article of a neutral nature (namely, water), and is therefore unlawful. The hire of a mule or the bucket is due, because the neutral article (namely, the water) becomes the property of the person who drew it; and as he derives an advantage, under an invalid contract, from the property of another person (namely, from his mule or his bucket), it follows that he owes a hire for the same.

The profit to each partner must be in proportion to the stock.—In all cases of invalid partnership, the profit is in proportion to the stock; any stipulation; therefore, of an excess of profit to either partner is null. Accordingly, if the stock be between the partners in equal shares, and they agree to their profit being in three lots, such agreement is null, and the profit must be equally divided; because, as the profit which accrues is a dependant of the stock, the degree of it must be in proportion to the stock, in the same manner as, in a contract of cultivation, the grain which is reaped is a dependant of the seed. The reason of this is that a claim to an excess profit can exist only in virtue of a previous specific agreement: but in the case in question this agreement has become invalid in consequence of the invalidity of the contract of partnership itself: the claim, therefore, remains in force only in proportion to the capital stock.

A contract of partnership is annulled by the death or apostasy of either partner.—If one of two partners die, or apostatize, and be united to a foreign country,* the contract of partnership is annulled; because a contract of partnership comprehends an appointment of agency, which is essential to the existence of partnership, for the reasons already assigned: now agency is annulled by death; and it is also annulled by the circumstance of desertion to a foreign country during apostasy, where the Kazee issues a decree in consequence of such desertion, because that is equivalent to death: upon the agency, therefore, being annulled, the contract of partnership is also annulled.

Whether the survivor be aware of that event or not.—It is also to be observed that the surviving partner being aware of the decease of his fellow, or otherwise, makes no difference whatever with respect to the dissolution of the partnership; because as, in the case in question, the survivor is virtually discharged from the agency by the decease of his partner, it is not essential that he be informed of that event. It is otherwise where one of two partners breaks the contract of partnership, for the effect of such a breach depends upon the knowledge of the other partner, as the breach is a designed dissolution of the contract.

Section.

A person cannot pay Zakat upon his partner's property without his permission.—It is not lawful for either partner to pay the Zakat upon the other's property without his permission, as the payment of Zakat is not a branch of traffic.

Case of mutual permission to pay Zakat.—If each of the partners give a general permission to the other to pay the Zakat upon his property, and each should afterwards first pay the Zakat upon his own particular share in the stock, and then pay Zakat upon his partner's share, in this case he who last paid the Zakat is responsible, whether he be aware of the other having already paid it or not. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that he is not responsible, where he is not aware of that circumstance. What is here advanced proceeds upon a supposition of each partner having paid the Zakat upon their respective shares of stock successively, and not altogether; for where they have paid it altogether, each is responsible for the other's proportion of it.* A correspondent difference of opinion obtains where any indifferent person directs another to pay the Zakat upon his property, and the other accordingly pays the Zakat upon his property after the person who so directed him had already paid it; for, according to Haneefa, the person acting under such direction is responsible, whether he pay the Zakat with a knowledge of the above circumstance, or otherwise. The two disciples, on the other hand, maintain that he is not responsible unless he pay it, having a knowledge of that circumstance, as he has acted by direction, and consequently cannot be held answerable. They admit, indeed, that it may be objected that what the person acting under such direction pays is not Zakat,* and consequently he ought to be responsible:—but to this they reply that the order which the person in question received was not in fact an order to pay so much ZAKAT, but rather, merely, an order to transfer so much to the POOR, since the payment of actual Zakat is not within his province, as this is connected with the intention of the principal, and no more can be required of the person so directed than what is within his province and ability:—the person in question, therefore, stands in the same predicament with one who is directed to perform sacrifice on behalf of another, in a case of detention; thus, if a person engaged in the ceremonies of pilgrimage were to fall into the hands of an enemy, and to direct any other person to perform sacrifice at the temple on his behalf, and the other perform sacrifice accordingly, after the principal had been released from the enemy, and had completed his pilgrimage, yet he does not bear the loss,* whether he be aware of the detention having ceased, or otherwise. The argument of Haneefa is that the person in question has been directed "to pay ZAKAT;" and as what he pays is not in fact Zakat, it is evident he has acted contrary to the orders of his principal, whose design in giving such orders was to discharge himself from an obligation incumbent upon him (for it is evident that his sole view in subjecting himself to such an expense is to ward off the divine anger attending the neglect of Zakat);—now, as (in the case in question) this design has been fully answered by the payment of the principal himself, it can no longer be so by the payment of his substitute, and hence it follows that the substitute is discharged from his commission, whether he be aware or not, because this is a virtual discharge, and to that knowledge is not essential. With respect to the case of sacrifice under a circumstance of detention, as adduced by the two disciples, some in reply to it allege that the principle there advanced is not generally admitted, as concerning that also there is a difference of opinion. Others, again, maintain that there is an essential difference between that case, and the case under consideration. The reason they give for this difference is, that sacrifice is not incumbent upon the detained person, as he is permitted to delay it until his detention shall cease. The payment of Zakat, on the other hand, is incumbent, whence the design in appointing an agent to pay it is to discharge an obligation; and as this design is not fulfilled,† it follows that the agent has no credit for his payment, and that what he pays is a waste and destruction of the property of his

* That is to say, the expense attending the sacrifice (although it be insufficient and nugatory under such a circumstance), nevertheless falls upon the director, not upon the person directed.

† As it has been already fulfilled by the payment of the principal himself.

 Because Zakat has been already paid by the principal, and hence what this person pays is not properly Zakat, but rather gratuity or alms-gift.

principal, for which he is consequently responsible. The case of sacrifice under a circumstance of detention, therefore, is not analogous to the case now under consideration, as sacrifice in such a circumstance is merely lawful but not incumbent, and hence the sacrifice performed by the delegate is not to be regarded as a waste and destruction of the property of his principal, for which reason he is not responsible.

A female slave, purchased under a contract of reciprocity, becomes the property of that partner who, with permission of the other, has carnal connexion with her.—If one of two partners by reciprocity permit the other partner to purchase a female slave with the partnership stock, and to have carnal connexion with her, and the other act accordingly, in this case the slave appertains to the purchaser, and he is not responsible for anything. This is according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that the other partner is entitled to take half the price of the slave; because the purchaser has paid for the slave out of the partnership stock, and consequently his partner has a right to be repaid his share in the same manner as in the purchase of victuals or clothing (that is, as, where one of two partners by reciprocity purchases victuals or clothing, paying the price out of the partnership stock, the other partner is entitled to take half the price from the purchaser, so also in the case in question). The ground upon which this proceeds is that the slave in question has become the sole and exclusive property of the purchaser because of the necessity of legalizing generation; and as the price is due in proportion to the right of property, it follows that the price of the slave is solely and exclusively due from the purchaser. The argument of Haneefa is that the slave has fallen into the possession of both partners, a certiori, according to what partnership requires (for they cannot alter the requisites of partnership); the slave, therefore, is the property of both, in the same manner as if no permission had been given: now the permission implies that the person who grants it makes a gift of his share to the purchaser; for carnal connexion is lawful only in virtue of right of property; and there is no mode of establishing that in the present case but by gift; because sale cannot be supposed on this occasion,* as the establishment of a right of property by sale would be repugnant to the requisites of a contract of partnership; for if the partner were to sell his share to the purchaser, still that share is in partnership between the two, and does not belong exclusively to the purchaser. His share, therefore, is made the property of the purchaser by gift implied in the permission granted to the purchaser to have carnal connexion with the slave. It is otherwise with respect to victuals and clothing, because, as these are excepted from the contract of necessity, they are the sole property of the purchaser in virtue of the spirit of a contract of purchase and sale; he, therefore, must pay half the price thereof to his partner, because he has discharged a debt due from himself [for the above articles] out of the partnership stock, whereas, in the case under consideration the purchaser discharged a partnership debt, which was equally due from both partners, for the reasons already alleged.

But the seller may take the price from either.—It is to be observed that, in the case in question, the seller of the slave is at liberty to take the price from either partner, according to all our doctors, because this price is a debt incurred by an act of traffic. A contract of reciprocity, moreover, comprehends bail; and hence the price of the slave resembles (in this respect) the price of victuals or clothing.

BOOK XV.

OF WAKF, OR APPROPRIATIONS.*

Definition of Wakf; and various opinions respecting it.—WAKF, in its primitive sense, means detention. In the language of the LAW (according to Haneefa), it signifies the appropriation of any particular thing in such a way that the appropriator's right in it shall still continue, and the advantage of it go to some charitable purpose, in the manner of a loan. Some give it as the opinion of Haneefa that, as the advantage of a thing is a nonentity, and as the alms-gift of a nonentity is invalid, it follows that appropriation is utterly illegal.† It is, moreover, recorded in the Mabsoot that Haneefa held appropriation to be invalid. The most approved authorities, however, declare it to be valid according to him; but since (like a loan) it is not of an absolute nature,‡ the appropriator is held to be at liberty to resume it, and the sale or gift of it is consequently lawful. According to the two disciples, Wakf signifies the appropriation of a particular article, in such a manner as subjects it to the rules of divine property, whence the appropriator's right in it is extinguished, and it becomes a property of God by the advantage of it resulting to his creatures. The two disciples, therefore, hold appropriation to be absolute; and, consequently, that it cannot be resumed, or disposed of by gift or sale; and that inheritance also does not obtain with respect to it. (There is, indeed, one point upon which the disciples differ in opinion: for, according to Abou Yoosaf, the appropriation is absolute from

* Meaning always of a pious or charitable nature.

† That is, has no force in law.

‡ That is, it is not IRREVOCABLE.

the instant of its execution; whereas Mohammed holds it to become absolute only on the delivery of it to a Mootwalee, or procurator;*—as will hereafter appear.) Thus the term Wakf, in its literal sense, comprehends all that is mentioned both by Haneefa and by the two disciples. Now, such being the case, no preference can be given to the tenets of one party over that of the other, as drawn from the meaning of the term; this preference, therefore, must be given as drawn from arguments. The arguments of the two disciples upon this subject are twofold: FIRST, when Omar was desirous of bestowing in charity the lands of Simag, the prophet said to him, "You must bestow the ACTUAL LAND ITSELF, in order that it may not remain liable to be either SOLD or BESTOWED, and that INHERITANCE may not hold in it!"—SECONDLY, there is a necessity for the appropriation being absolute, in order that the merit of it may result for ever to the appropriator; and this necessity is to be answered only by the appropriator relinquishing his right in what he appropriates, and dedicating it solely to God; which dedication, as being agreeable to the LAW, in the same manner as that of a mosque, must therefore be made in the same mode. The arguments of Haneefa concerning it are various. FIRST, the prophet has said, "Property cannot, after the decease of the proprietor, be detained from division among his heirs" (in other words, appropriations are not ABSOLUTE, but INHERITABLE). Shirrah moreover says, "the prophet determined the sale of an appropriation to be lawful,"—which is as much as to say, that "before the promulgation of the LAW by the holy Mohammed (on whom be the blessing and peace of God) appropriations were absolute; but our LAW has rendered them otherwise."—SECONDLY, the appropriator's right in the article appropriated must still continue in force, for this reason, that it is lawful for the creatures of God to derive an advantage from it, either by tillage (if it consist of land), or by residence (if it consist of dwelling-houses); for if no one had any right in it, any acts with respect to it would be unlawful, in the same manner as with respect to a mosque. It is, therefore, evident that a right of property in it still continues: and it is also evident that this right of property must rest with the appropriator, and not with any other person, as he alone is entitled to expend the revenue arising from it upon the objects of the appropriation, and to appoint a procurator over it: but yet, as the term Wakf implies giving in charity, the use of it resembles that of a loan. THIRDLY, the appropriator wishes to apply the revenue arising from what he appropriates to some charitable purpose in perpetuity, which is impossible, unless his right of property in it continue. FOURTHLY, it is impossible that the appropriator's right of property in the Wakf should be extinguished, during its existence, without its becoming the property of some other person, as the LAW does not admit the idea of a thing, during its existence going out of the possession of one proprietor without falling into the possession of another proprietor. Wakf, therefore, in this particular resembles a Sayeeba. (A Sayeeba is a female camel, set at liberty in pursuance of a vow (as where a man says, "if I return home from this journey," or, "recover from this disorder a certain female camel of mine is Sayeeba,"*) which the owner prohibits himself from any further use of; in the same manner as a Baheera, or female camel, which, after producing ten colts, it was customary, in times of ignorance, then to set at liberty, rendering it unlawful to be used or eaten.) Appropriation, in short, resembles the Pagan act of setting a camel at liberty, in this respect, that the thing appropriated does not go out of the right of property of the proprietor:—in other words, if a man constitute his quadruped a Sayeeba, still it continues his property; and so also, if a person appropriate his lands or quadruped. It is otherwise in a case of manumission, as that is a dereliction of property. It is otherwise also in the case of a mosque, as that is dedicated purely to God (whence it is unlawful to derive any advantage from a mosque), whereas, in a case of appropriation, the right of the individual still continues in force, and that, consequently, is not dedicated purely to God.

Alienation of the article appropriated is completed by a decree of the magistrate, and the declaration of the appropriator, or the consignment of it to a procurator.—It is reported by Kadooree, from Haneefa, that the appropriator's right of property is not extinguished, except where the magistrate so decrees, or where the appropriator himself suspends it upon his decease, by declaring "When I die, this house is appropriated to such a purpose" (and so forth). Abou Yoosaf alleges that his right of property is extinguished upon the instant of his saying "I have appropriated"—(and such also is the opinion of Shafei); because that is a dereliction of property, in the same manner as manumission. Mohammed says that it is not extinguished until he appoint a procurator, and deliver it over to him: and decrees are passed upon this principle. The reason of this is that the right of God cannot be established in an appropriated article but by implication, in the consignment of it to his ofeature (as a transfer to the Almighty, who is himself the proprietor of all things, although it cannot be effected actually and expressly, yet may be so dependantly);—it therefore becomes subject to the rules of divine property dependantly, and consequently resembles Zakat and alms-gift. With respect to what is reported from Haneefa, that “the appropriator’s right of property is extinguished by a decree of the magistrate,”—our author remarks that this is approved doctrine, as such a decree removes all difference of opinion. With respect, however, to what is further reported from him, that “the appropriator’s right of property is extinguished in consequence of his suspending that upon his decease,” it is altogether unfounded, as his right of property cannot be extinguished but by his bestowing the use of the article for charitable purposes in perpetuity, in which case it is the same as a bequest of perpetual usufruct:—in this instance, therefore, his right of property becomes extinct, and the appropriation is absolute.

* Literally, a person endowed with authority; the term procurator is adopted by the translator, as being peculiar to the management of a religious foundation, and as distinguishing this office from that of a common agent.

* Literally, running about at liberty. It may be used towards a female slave as a formula of manumission.

A decree of the magistrate fixes an appropriation: but the decision of a referee does not fix it.—It is related, in the Fatavee Kazee Khan, that judicial decrees are issued on the subject of appropriations only in cases where a person having appropriated a particular article, and delivered it over to a Mootwaltee or procurator, is afterwards desirous of resuming it; and the latter disputes the resumption, on the plea of the appropriation being absolute; and they carry the matter before a Kazee, who decrees it to be absolute. —Concerning a case where the parties authorize any third person to decide upon this point, and he decides the appropriation to be absolute, there is a difference of opinion: it is certain, however, that such a decision is not binding upon the parties.

Case of an appropriation made upon a death-bed.—If a person make an appropriation upon his death-bed, Tehavee reports that, according to Haneefa, it stands in the same predicament with a bequest after death, —(that is to say, is absolute): contrary to an appropriation made during health, which is held by Haneefa not to be of an absolute nature. The true statement, however, is that the appropriation in question is not absolute, according to Haneefa; but it is absolute, according to the two disciples; with this distinction, however, that the appropriation here treated of is regarded as from the third of the appropriator’s estate, whereas an appropriation made during health is regarded as from the whole of the appropriator’s property.

The appropriator’s right of property is destroyed; but without a transfer of that right to any other person.—UPON an appropriation becoming valid (that is, absolute, according to the various opinions of our doctors, as here stated,—according to Haneefa, in consequence of the appropriator’s declaration, and the magistrate’s subsequent decree —and according to Aboo Yoosaf, by his simple declaration,—and according to Mohammed, by his declaration and delivery to a procurator),—it passes out of the possession of the appropriator; but yet it does not become the property of any other person; because, if this were the case, it would follow that it is not in a state of detention, but may be sold in the same manner as other property; and also, because if the person or persons to whom it is assigned were to become the proprietor of it, it would follow that it could not afterwards pass out of his possession in consequence of any condition stipulated by the former proprietor,—whereas it is not so, for if a person were to appropriate a dwelling-house (for instance) to the poor of a particular tribe, and the poverty of any one of these were afterwards removed, the right in it passes to the others, which it could not do if this person were a proprietor.

Any undefined part of a thing may be appropriated.—THE appropriation of an undefined part or portion of any thing* is lawful, according to Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed alleges that an appropriation of this nature is unlawful; because as actual possession is held by him to be an essential (by the procurator taking possession of the article appropriated), so, in the same manner that without which possession cannot take place is also an essential, namely, division; and this can only be in a thing capable of division. (With respect, however, to a thing incapable of division, the appropriation of an indefinite portion of it is held to be legal by Mohammed also, as he conceives an analogy between this and a gift, or charitable donation.) The ground upon which the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, proceeds is, that the separation of an indefinite part of any thing is indispensable to the taking possession of it; but as the taking possession is not (according to him) essential in a case of appropriation (whence the means of taking possession is also unessential), it follows that the appropriation of an indefinite part of any thing is held by him to be lawful. From this rule, however, he excepts a mosque, or burying-ground, the appropriation of any undefined portion of which is unlawful, although it be of an indivisible nature; because the continuance of a participation in any thing is repugnant to its becoming the exclusive right of God; and also, because the present discussion supposes the place in question to be incapable of division, as being narrow and confined, whence it cannot be divided but by an alternate application of it to different purposes, such as its being applied one year to the interment of the dead, and the next year to tillage, or, at one time to prayer, and at another time to the keeping of horses, which would be singularly abominable. It is otherwise with regard to the appropriation of anything else than a mosque or burying-ground; because the appropriation of an undefined portion of any other matter, where it is of an indivisible nature, is decreed to be lawful by all our doctors, as it may be hired (for instance), and the parties may divide the rent.

Case of appropriation of land, where an indefinite portion of it afterwards appears to be the property of another person.—If a person appropriate land,* and it should afterwards appear that an indefinite portion of the land (such as the fourth) was the property of another person, the appropriation is void with respect to the remainder also, according to Mohammed; because, in this instance, the separation into indefinite divisions is associated with the appropriation, which is consequently invalid, in the same manner as a gift. It is otherwise where a donor resumes a part of his gift; or where the heirs of a donor who had made the gift upon his death-bed resume two-thirds of his gift after his decease: for if a person, upon his death-bed, make a gift or appropriation of the whole of his property, and the heirs resume two-thirds, still the gift or appropriation are not rendered void, because, in this instance, the separation into indefinite divisions is supervenient, and not associated; that is, at the time of the gift or appropriation, the article was not divided into undefined portions, but became so afterwards. If, however, it should appear that another is entitled to a portion of the land, of a specific and not an undefined nature, in this case the appropriation is not void with respect to the remainder, because of no indefinite division existing in this instance: and gifts and charitable donations are also subject to the same analogy.

The objects of an appropriation must be of a perpetual nature.—An appropriation is not complete, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, unless the appropriator destine its ultimate application to objects not liable to become extinct; as where, for instance, a man destines its application ultimately to the use of the poor (by saying, "I appropriate this to such a person, and after him to the poor"),—because these never become extinct. Abou Yoosaf maintains that where the appropriator names an object liable to termination (as if he were to say, "I have appropriated this to Zeyd), it is valid, and after the death of Zeyd it passes, as an appropriation, to the poor, although the appropriator had not named them. The argument of Haneefa and Mohammed upon this point is that appropriation requires an extinction of right of property, without a transfer of it; and as this, like manumission, is of a perpetual nature, it follows that if a thing be appropriated to a finite object, the appropriation is imperfect; whence it is that an appropriation is rendered void by making it temporary, in the same manner as a sale is made void by limiting its duration.

OBJECTION.—This argument of Haneefa, that the right of property becomes extinct without "a transfer of it," contradicts what was formerly said, that, "According to Haneefa, in appropriation, the right of property is not extinguished."

REPLY.—There are two reports from Haneefa upon this subject. One of them is that which was before stated. Another makes the opinion of Haneefa to agree with that of Mohammed. Some also allege, in reply to this objection, that what is here advanced from him proceeds from a supposition of the magistrate having decreed the appropriation to be absolute, under which circumstance it passes out of the possession of the appropriator according to all our doctors.

The argument of Abou Yoosaf is that the design of the appropriator is to perform an act of piety acceptable to God; and this is fully answered in either case; because piety on some occasions may consist in the appropriation of an article to a terminable object,—and it may at other times consist in the appropriation of a thing to an interminable object;—the appropriation, therefore, is equally valid in both instances. Now some say that perpetuity is essential to it. Abou Yoosaf, however, does not consider the mention of perpetuity as an essential, as the terms appropriation or charity do clearly argue thus much, according to what was before advanced, that "Appropriation, like manumission, signifies an extinction of a right of property without a transfer of that right." According to Mohammed, on the other hand, the mention of perpetuity is an essential; because appropriation is a charitable donation of the use of a thing, or of actual product; and as those are sometimes temporary and sometimes perpetual, the general mention of it cannot be understood as a perpetuation: it is therefore indispensable that perpetuity be expressly mentioned.

Appropriation of immoveable and of moveable property.—The appropriation of land is lawful; because several of the prophet's companions appropriated their lands: but the appropriation of moveable property is altogether unlawful, whether purposely, or as a dependant. This is the opinion of Haneefa. Abou Yoosaf alleges that if a person appropriate lands, together with the cattle and slaves attached to them, it is lawful; and the same of all instruments of husbandry; because those are all dependants of the soil in the fulfilment of the design; the appropriation of these, therefore, as dependants of the land, is lawful; for many things are admissible dependantly, which are not so positively; thus the sale of wine (for instance) by itself is unlawful, whereas, along with land it is lawful,—and in the same manner the appropriation of the beam of a house is unlawful, whereas along with the house it is clearly legal. The opinion of Mohammed, also, accords with that of Abou Yoosaf in this point, because as he holds the appropriation of moveables to be lawful merely in virtue of the appropriator's declaration, it follows that he admits the appropriation of them as a dependant to be legal a fortiori. Mohammed is also of opinion that if a person appropriate horses, camels, or arms, to carry on war against infidels, it is lawful;—in which opinion (as lawyers report), Abou Yoosaf coincides with him. This proceeds upon a favourable construction; for analogy would suggest that such an appropriation is unlawful, for the reasons already alleged. The reason for a more favourable construction, however, is that the prophet once said, "KHALID has appropriated his HORSE and ARMOUR in the way of GOD; and TELLIHA has appropriated his HORSE in the way of GOD."*—According to Mohammed, the appropriation is lawful of all moveables, the appropriation of which is commonly practised, such as spades, shovels, axes, saws, planks, coffins (and their appendages) stone or brazen vessels, and books: but according to Abou Yoosaf it is unlawful; because analogy cannot be abandoned but on the express authority of the sacred writings; and as horses and armour only are there mentioned, the admission must be restricted accordingly. Mohammed says that analogy may be abandoned on account of utility (as in arts or manufactures, for instance); and utility exists in the articles in question. It is, moreover, recorded of Nasseer Ibn Yehce, that he appropriated his books, as conceiving that to be analogous to the appropriation of a KORAN (in other words, as the appropriation of a KORAN is lawful, so also is the appropriation of any other book): and this is approved, because other books as well as KORANS are kept for the purpose of reading and instruction. Most lawyers have passed decrees according to the opinion of Mohammed in this particular. It is written in the Fatavec-Kazee-Khan that there is a difference of opinion between the Elders concerning the appropriation of books.—Pikkae-Aboual-Seyb, however, holds it to be lawful; and decrees pass accordingly.

* Arab. Akkar; meaning any immoveable property whatever, whether lands or tenements. Zimeen is the term in the Persian version, and the translator therefore renders it land throughout

The appropriation of articles in which it is not customary is unlawful.—IT is not lawful to appropriate moveables, the appropriation of which is unusual or uncommon, according to our doctors. Shafei alleges that the appropriation is lawful of everything which admits of the use without a destruction of the subject, or of everything lawfully saleable, because such articles as admit usufruct resemble land, horses, or arms. The argument of our doctors is that appropriation requires perpetuity, according to what has been already stated; and this cannot exist in moveables, since these are not of a lasting nature: analogy therefore suggests that the appropriation of moveables in general is unlawful:—it is admitted, however, in some articles (although contrary to analogy), because of the traditions already recorded,—and in other articles (such as axes, saws, and so forth), because of utility: but the appropriation of furniture, clothes, and slaves, is unlawful, as being contrary to the suggestions of analogy, because they have neither tradition nor utility to support the legality, and therefore resemble dirms and deenars. With respect to what Shafei has advanced that "those articles are analogous to lands, horses, and armour," we reply that no analogy can be admitted between them; because land endures perpetually; and horses and armour are instruments of war against infidels, which is among the highest religious obligations, whence the property of piety exists in the appropriation of these articles in a much stronger degree than in the appropriation of other moveables;—the analogy, therefore, is not allowed.

An appropriation cannot be sold or transferred.—UPON an appropriation becoming valid and absolute, the sale or transfer of the thing appropriated is unlawful, according to all lawyers: the transfer is unlawful, because of a saying of the prophet; "Bestow the ACTUAL LAND ITSELF in charity, in such a manner that it shall no longer be saleable nor inheritable." An appropriation, therefore, is incapable of sale or transfer, upon becoming valid and absolute.

But it may be divided off, where it consists of an undefined part of anything.—If, however, the appropriation consist of an undefined part of anything, and (in conformity with the doctrine of Abou Yoosaf) become absolute, and the partner require it to be divided off, such division is lawful; because division implies separation and distinction. In all things, indeed, except those which are computable by weight or measure, exchange chiefly prevails: in appropriation, however, a superior regard is had to separation and distinction, in order that the appropriation may be valid: the dividing it off, therefore, is not to be regarded in the light of a sale or transfer, and is consequently legal.

If a person appropriate his share in partnership lands, he must divide it off and detach it from those of his partner; because he alone has authority to do this during his life, or his executor, after his decease. If, on the other hand, a person appropriate the half (for instance) of his own land, in this case the Kazee is to divide it off, and alienate it from the appropriator—(or the appropriator may sell one half (for instance) of his land to any other person, and then divide off the portion appropriated and alienate it from that person, and afterwards re-purchase the remainder from the purchaser*):—for the

* This is, in waging war against the infidels.

* This is merely a device, for the purpose of obviating legal objections. ○ appropriator is not at liberty himself to divide off the portion of land which he has appropriated, or to separate it from that portion which he has not appropriated, because one person is incapable of himself making a division, and thus giving to himself, since division can take place only between two.

In case of dividing it off, the payment of a balance made by the appropriator is lawful; but if made to the appropriator, it invalidates the appropriation.—If, in dividing off appropriated land, any balance occurs (as where a person appropriates his share in partnership land, and he and his partner accordingly make a division of the land, and the share of one of them proves defective, and the other makes up the difference by a payment in money), it is unlawful, where this balance is paid to the appropriator, as the sale of an appropriated article is unlawful: but if it is the appropriator who pays the balance, it is lawful, and what he gets in return is his property;—if, therefore, he be desirous of having it divided off from the part he has appropriated, he must refer the matter to the Kazee, in order that he may separate the portion appropriated from what he [the appropriator] gets in return for the balance.

The income of an appropriation must be expended (in the first instance) upon keeping it in repair.—It is incumbent that the income of an appropriation be in the first instance expended in the repairs*, of it, whether the appropriator may have stipulated this or not; because his design was that the income should serve as a perpetual fund, and as a perpetual income cannot be drawn from the article appropriated unless it be preserved in continual repair, that is a necessary attendant upon it; and also, because all acquisition must be attended with expense—(in other words, he who enjoys the profit must also bear the loss).—In short, upon the person to whom the advantage of a thing accrues, must rest the inconveniences attending it; and such being the case, it follows that the repair of an appropriation resembles the subsistence of a slave whose service has been bequeathed to any one, for the subsistence of such slave rests upon the legatee of usufruct. If, therefore, the appropriation be to the poor, and the requisition of repairs from them be impossible (because of the appropriation itself being their sole dependence), the repairs must be afforded out of the income arising from it.

Unless the appropriator be rich, in which case he is answerable for the repairs.—If, however, the appropriation be to some particular person, in the first instance, and after him to the poor, the repairs are in this case due out of that person's property (but he is at liberty to furnish the means out of whatever part of his property he chooses), during his life; and in this case no part of the income is laid out in repairs, because the requisition from the person who enjoys the benefit is in such instance possible, since he is specified and known.

But in such a degree only, as may suffice to preserve it in its original state.—It is to be understood, however, that the repairs are to be made out of the property, only in such a degree as may be requisite to preserve it in the state in which it was appropriated: if, also, it fall to ruin [or run waste] it is to be restored to the state in which it was appropriated, because the income of it was made over to others, and was to be derived from it as in THAT state, and not as in any superior state; and as such income is the right of him to whose use it is appropriated, it is not lawful, without his permission, to expend it in repairs to a degree beyond the original state of the appropriation. Some are also of opinion that the same rule obtains where the appropriation is to the poor at large, and not to any particular individual,—that is to say, the income is not to be expended in repairs beyond the original state of the appropriation. Others allege that this is lawful. The former, however, is the better opinion; because the income arising from an appropriation is expended in the repairs of it only from the necessity of preserving it as it was originally, and there is no necessity for repairs beyond what may suffice for this purpose.

The repairs of a house are incumbent upon the individual occupant pro tempore.—If a person appropriate a house, with this condition, that his son or any other person shall reside therein during life, the repairs are incumbent upon him who has the right to inhabit it, because he who enjoys the profit must also bear the loss (as has been already stated), and the case consequently resembles the subsistence of a slave whose service has been bequeathed to any person by his master.

Or if he neglect this, the magistrate must let the house, and furnish the repairs out of the rent.—If, therefore, the person in question refuse or neglect to repair the house, or be incapable of so doing, from poverty, the magistrate must in this case let it, and provide for the repairs out of the rent; and must return it to him upon the repairs being completed; because by this means attention is paid to the rights both of the appropriator and of the person to whose use it is appropriated, since, if it were not duly repaired, the tenement would be lost, and the rights of both would be consequently destroyed; the repair must therefore be provided out of the rent, in order that the rights of the parties may be secured.

But the occupant is not liable to any compulsion.—It is to be observed, however, that where the person to whom the article is appropriated refuses to make the repairs, he is not to be compelled, because the repairs would be at his loss, his case being the same as that of the proprietor of the seed, in a contract of cultivation, who, if he refuse to cultivate the land, is not liable to any compulsion, as the cultivation cannot be effected without the loss of his property, namely, the seed.

* Arab. Tameer: meaning, the rendering a place habitable, by cultivation, if it be land, or by-rebuilding, &c., if it be houses.

OBJECTION.—Upon the occupant refusing to make the repairs, it would appear that the magistrate should not return the house to him after the repairs are completed; because, as he thus assented to the destruction of his right, any attention to that is unnecessary.

REPLY.—The refusal of the occupant to repair the house does not argue his assent to the destruction of his right, as there is a doubt with respect to the motive of his refusal, since it is possible, that he has refused merely on account of the expense to his property; his right, therefore, is not destroyed because of the doubt.

And none can let the house but the magistrate.—It is proper to observe that it is not lawful for the occupant to let the house, since he is not the proprietor. The magistrate, on the contrary, possesses a general power, as being the agent of the community.

Decayed materials are to be used for repairs.—Such buildings or materials of an appropriation as become damaged or useless, must be employed by the magistrate in the repairs of it, where necessary; and if these be not immediately necessary, he must keep the articles in question until such time as occasion offers, when he must employ them in making the necessary repairs; as repairs are required from time to time, in order that the appropriation may be continually preserved, and the design of the appropriator answered. If the materials of the decayed place be damaged so much as to render it impracticable to employ them in the repairs (by the timbers being broken, for instance), it is incumbent on the magistrate to sell them, and expend the price in such repairs: but it is not lawful for him to give them to the occupants, because the timbers, and so forth, are constituent parts of the actual appropriation, in which no person has any right,—their right being merely to the use, and not to the thing itself.

Case of appropriation, with a reserve of the use to the appropriator during life.—If a person appropriate a house (for instance), with a reserve of the income to his own use during life, and after his death to go to the poor, this is lawful, according to Abou Yoosaf. Our author remarks that this is deemed lawful by Abou Yoosaf; but that, judging from the opinion of Mohammed, it is unlawful;—and such is the opinion of Hilla Kaze and Shafei respecting it. Some allege that the difference between Abou Yoosaf and Mohammed upon this point is occasioned by their difference of opinion concerning the necessity of consignment; for, according to Mohammed, the consignment of the appropriation to the Mootwalee, or procurator, is an essential, and consequently it is unlawful for the appropriator to reserve the income to himself: according to Abou Yoosaf, on the contrary, this is lawful, as he does not hold the consignment to a procurator to be an essential. Others, again, allege that their difference upon this point is not occasioned by their difference upon any other point, but is merely an original difference of opinion with respect to the present case itself. This difference of opinion between the disciples subsists in every case, that is, whether the appropriator reserve the whole or a part only of the income to himself during life, and after his death to go to the poor. If, also, the appropriator reserve the whole or part of the income from his appropriation to the use of his Am-Walids, or his Modabbirs, during their lives, and after their deaths destine it to the poor, some say that this is lawful according to all our doctors. Others, however, maintain that, in this instance also, the above difference of opinion obtains: and this is approved, because his reserving the income to their use for their lives is equivalent to his reserving it to his own use. The argument in favour of Mohammed's opinion is that appropriation is a gratuitous act, effected in the transfer of a property to God, by delivering over the thing appropriated to a Mootwalee or procurator (for a transfer to the Almighty, who is himself the proprietor of all things, although it cannot be effected actually and expressly, yet may be so dependently); and the reserving of the whole or part of the income arising from it to his own use is repugnant to this, because, the delivery cannot be made to himself.—The case, therefore, resembles the reserve of an alms-gift,—and also the reserve of a part of a mosque:—in other words, if a person were to assign certain property to the poor, stipulating at the same time, that his right in part of it should continue, the alms under such a condition are unlawful;—or, if the founder of a mosque stipulate that his right in a part of the mosque shall continue, this opposes the legality of the whole foundation:—and so also in the case in question. The arguments of Abou Yoosaf upon this point are threefold. FIRST, the prophet was accustomed himself to consume the revenue arising from what he had appropriated. Now the use would not at any rate be lawful, unless the appropriator had previously stipulated it for himself at the time of appropriation: the prophet consuming the revenue, therefore, argues that it is lawful for an appropriator to reserve that to his own use. SECONDLY, appropriation implies the owner of a property destroying his right in that property by a transfer of it to God, under some pious intention (as was formerly stated); and such being the case, where an appropriator reserves a part or the whole of the revenue arising from what he appropriates to his own use, it follows that, in so doing, he reserves to himself a thing which is the property of God (not that he reserves to himself what is his own), and a person's reserving to himself a thing which is the property of God is lawful; thus, if a man build a caravansera, or construct a reservoir, or give ground for a burial-place, reserving to himself the right of residing in the caravansera, or of drinking water out of the reservoir, or of interment in the burial-place, it is lawful; and so likewise in the case in question.—THIRDLY, the design, in appropriation, is the performance of an act of piety: and piety is consistent with the circumstance of a person reserving the revenue to his own use, as the prophet has said, "A man giving a subsistence to HIMSELF is giving ALMS."*

Or, with a reserve of a liberty to change the subject.—If the appropriator reserve to himself a right of changing the lands he appropriates for any other lands, at pleasure, it is lawful, according to Abou Yoosaf. Mohammed maintains that the appropriation itself is valid, but that the condition reserved is void; because the condition does not prevent an extinction of right of property; and the appropriation is consequently complete, because of the extinction of this right; but the condition, as being invalid, is void, in the same manner as the reserve of a right of change, in the foundation of a mosque, is void.

Or, with a reserve of a right of option.—If the appropriator reserve to himself a right of option with respect to his appropriation, for three days, by saying (for instance) "I appropriate this house to such and such purposes, with this condition, that I shall have a right of option for three days;" according to Abou Yoosaf, both the appropriation and the condition are lawful. According to Mohammed, on the contrary, the appropriation is null. Their difference of opinion upon this point originates in the difference of their doctrine respecting a reserve of the revenue of an appropriation to the use of the appropriator: for as, according to Abou Yoosaf, an appropriator may lawfully reserve to his own use, during life, the revenue arising from what he appropriates, it follows that he deems it lawful that the appropriator reserve a right of option for three days, for the purpose of consideration. Mohammed, on the other hand, holds that the possession of a Moot-walee, or procurator, is an essential, and as a reserve of option prevents possession from being completely taken, it follows that, according to him, the appropriation is void. An appropriation, moreover, is not complete without the will of the appropriator; and as, where he makes a reserve of option, this cannot be ascertained, it follows that the appropriation is void; and being once void, its validity cannot afterwards be restored by the condition ceasing to operate.

Or, with a reserve of authority.—If a person appropriate land, with a reserve of his authority over it, it is lawful, according to Abou Yoosaf.—Our author remarks that Kadooree has expressly declared this. Such also is the doctrine of Hillal; and it is, indeed, the generally received opinion. Hillal particularly mentions it in treating of appropriations. Some doctors allege, that if the appropriator particularly stipulate a reservation of authority over the lands, this authority remains to him accordingly; but not unless it be particularly stipulated by him. Our modern doctors, however, consider it as very doubtful whether this be an opinion of Mohammed, because it is a tenet of his that delivery into the hands of a procurator is essential to the validity of an appropriation; and where such delivery takes place, the appropriator can no longer possess any authority over it. According to the tenets of Abou Yoosaf, on the other hand, the delivery to a procurator is not an essential, and consequently the authority remains with the appropriator, although he should not have so stipulated. What was mentioned above, concerning the opinion of Mohammed, that "where the delivery to a procurator takes place, the appropriator can no longer retain any authority over the appropriation," applies to a case where the appropriator had not stipulated any reservation of authority to himself at the first;—for if he had stipulated this at the time of making the appropriation, his authority is not rendered void by delivery to a procurator; because as his authority continues where he stipulates a right of authority in behalf of another, it follows that, where he stipulates it in behalf of himself, it continues a fortiori.—The arguments in support of the opinion of Abou Yoosaf (which is the most generally received doctrine), are twofold. FIRST, the procurator enjoys his authority, only on behalf of the appropriator, in consequence of his reservation; and it is impossible that the appropriator himself should not be possessed of any authority, at the same time that another person enjoys an authority held on his behalf.—SECONDLY, the appropriator stands in a nearer relation to what he appropriates than any other person, and it is consequently proper that he possess an authority over it; in the same manner as where a person builds a mosque, in which case the business of repairing it, as well as the appointment of all the officers, &c., appertains solely to him; or as where a person emancipates a slave, in which case the Willa appertains solely to him, as he stands in a nearer relation to the slave than any other person.

* As where (for instance) a man appropriates the whole of his property, thus reducing himself to poverty; in which case the charity is as effectual with respect to him (where he necessarily reserves a sufficiency from the product for his own sustenance) as with respect to any other pauper.

If, however, the appropriator who makes this condition (namely, a reservation of authority to himself), be a person of infamous character and unworthy of confidence, the magistrate may take the appropriation out of his hands, from a regard to the interest of the poor; in the same manner as he is at liberty to suspend the powers of an executor, where he happens to be a person of bad character, from a regard to the interest of the orphans. If, also, an appropriator constitute another the Mootwalee or pro-durator, declaring that "the sovereign or magistrate shall not take the appropriation out of his charge," yet these are at liberty to take it from him, where he happens to be a person of bad character:—because, as such a declaration is repugnant to the precepts of the LAW, it is consequently void.

Section.

A mosque is not alienated from the founder otherwise than by the performance of public worship in it.—If a person build a mosque, his right of property in it is not extinguished so long as he does not separate it from the rest of his property, or give general admission to people to come and worship in it: but as soon as the people in general, or a single person, say their prayers in it, his right of property is extinguished, according to Haneefa. The utter separation of it from the rest of the appropriator's property is indispensable, for this reason, that the mosque cannot become dedicated solely to God until that be effected: and the performance of prayer in it is a condition, because, as a consignment (according to Haneefa and Mohammed) is indispensable, it follows that consignment is requisite in this way, since consignment must be carried into execution in whatever way may be proper to the nature of the appropriation, and the mode of consignment proper to a mosque is public worship; or, the performance of prayer is a condition, because as it cannot be conceived that God himself should take possession of a mosque, it follows that that which is the design must stand as a substitute for the taking possession of it. It is proper in this place to observe that if a single person say his prayers in the mosque it suffices (according to one report from Haneefa and Mohammed); because, as it is impossible that all men should perform their prayers in it, the circumstance of a single individual performing his prayers is the condition. It is also reported, from Haneefa and Mohammed, that the performance of prayer by a whole congregation is a necessary condition, because a mosque is founded with a view to public worship. Abou Yoosaf maintains that the founder's right of property is destroyed immediately upon his saying, "I constitute this a mosque!"—because he does not hold consignment to be a condition, since according to him, appropriation signifies a relinquishment of right on the part of the individual; the thing appropriated, therefore, appertains solely to God merely in consequence of the right of the individual ceasing,—as was before demonstrated.

Cases of a mosque, as connected with a dwelling-place.—If a person erect a building of two stories, making the under story a mosque, and the upper story a dwelling, or vice versa,—with the door of the mosque towards the public road, and detach the mosque from his own property [in the manner before described], he is nevertheless at liberty to sell it;—or, if he die, the mosque is an inheritance,—as the mosque does not, in this instance, appertain solely to God, because of the individual's right in it still subsisting. This, however, is only where the dwelling has not been constructed merely for the purposes of the mosque: for if it have been constructed for the purposes of the mosque (as in the great mosque at Jerusalem), the appropriation is absolute. Hasan reports, from Haneefa, that if the lower story be a mosque, and the upper story a dwelling, the former continues for ever a mosque; because a mosque is one of those things which are designed to continue in perpetuity, and an under story answers this purpose better than an upper story. The reverse of this is reported from Mohammed, because reverence is indispensably due to a mosque, and where an upper story is constructed over a mosque, for the purpose either of dwelling in or of letting out to hire, this reverence cannot be observed. It is recorded, also, that when Abou Yoosaf went to Bagdad and beheld the narrow and crowded condition of the place, he held the appropriation to be lawful and absolute in either case,—that is, whether the mosque be in the lower story and the dwelling in the upper, or vice versa:—but this he admitted out of necessity. The same is recorded of Mohammed, when he went to Rai,* and for the same reason.

If a person convert the centre hall of his house into a mosque, giving general admission into it, still it does not stand as a mosque, but remains saleable and inheritable; because a mosque is a place in which no person possesses any right of obstruction; and wherever a man has such a right with respect to the surrounding parts, the same must necessarily affect the place inclosed in them. This place, therefore, cannot be a mosque; besides, it is necessarily a thoroughfare for the family, and consequently does not appertain solely to God. It is reported from Mohammed that the centre hall of a house, thus constituted a mosque, cannot afterwards be given away, sold, or inherited. He consequently considers it to stand as a mosque; and Abou Yoosaf is of the same opinion, because, as the person in question was desirous that this place should become a mosque, and as it cannot become so without a road, or entrance into it, the road is included without specification, in the same manner as in a case of hire.

Ground appropriated to building a mosque cannot be sold or inherited.—If a person appropriate ground for the purpose of erecting a mosque, he cannot afterwards resume or sell it, neither can it be inherited, because this ground is altogether alienated from the right of the individual, and appertains solely to God. The reason of this is that all things whatever are originally the property of the Almighty. When, therefore, the individual relinquishes his right in the ground, it reverts to its original state, and his power over it terminates, in the same manner as a master's power over a slave terminates in consequence of manumission, and cannot be resumed.

A mosque cannot, in any instance, revert into the property of the founder.—If the place in which a mosque is situated should become deserted or uninhabited, insomuch that there is no farther use for the mosque, no person coming to worship therein, still it continues to stand as a mosque (according to Abou Yoosaf), and does not revert to the founder; because, as he had put it out of his own possession, it cannot again become his property. Mohammed alleges that the mosque again becomes the property of the founder, or of his heirs, in case of his decease; because he had erected it for the purpose of public worship; and as that has ceased, the mosque is in the same predicament with the materials for building a mosque. In other words, if there be no farther occasion for materials (such as bricks and so forth) designed for the crection of a mosque, they revert to the founder, and so also in the case in question. This, however, is a conclusion which does not accord with the doctrine of Abou Yoosaf, for he holds that where there is no farther occasion for those materials in the construction of this mosque, they must be carried to another.

Cases of appropriations made to the use of the community at large.—If a person construct a reservoir for public use, or a caravansera for travellers, or erect a house upon the infidel frontiers for the accommodation of the Mussulman warriors in their excursions (which is termed a Ribat), or dedicate ground as a burying-place, his right of property therein is not extinguished until the magistrate issue a decree to that effect; because no termination of the proprietor's right takes place in this instance, insomuch that he may still lawfully continue to use those things (by residing in the house or Ribat, or drinking water out of the reservoir, or interring in the burial-place). It is therefore requisite either that the magistrate issue a decree, in order to complete the alienation, or that the founder himself refer the appropriation to his decease, in order that it may stand as a bequest, and become absolute upon that event, in the same manner as in the case of an appropriation made to the use of the poor. It is otherwise in the case of a mosque, because in that instance no right of usufruct remains to the founder, as the mosque appertains solely to God independent of any magisterial decree. All that is here advanced is according to Haneefa. Abou Yoosaf is of opinion that the person's right of property ceases on the instant of his saying, "I have made this for such and such purposes" (of residence, interment, or so forth), because with him it is a rule that appropriation is absolute, and that consignment is not a condition of it. Mohammed maintains that as soon as people drink water out of the reservoir, or enter the caravansera, or warriors take up their residence in the Ribat, or interment takes place in the burying-ground, the proprietor's right is extinguished; because consignment (which he holds to be a condition) is established by such acts, as the consignment of any thing must be made in the mode proper to that thing. It is sufficient also (according to him) if these acts be performed by, or with respect to, only a single individual; because as the whole community cannot engage in those acts, regard must necessarily be had to them as performed in any single instance. Wells and fountains are also subject to the same rule.

They may be consigned to a procurator.—If, in the cases last recited, the founder consign the article to a Mootwalce or procurator, such consignment is approved, because the procurator is in the character of a deputy, and the act of the deputy is the act of the principal. With respect to a mosque, indeed, some allege that the delivery of it to a procurator is not a complete consignment, because there is no business for a procurator in a mosque. Others again say that consignment is established, as it is necessary, in a mosque, that there be some person to keep it in order, and lock up the doors; the consignment of a mosque, therefore, to a procurator is approved. Some also assert that a burying-ground is considered in the same light as a mosque in this particular, because the procurator of a burying-ground is an office not in use. Others, again, maintain that it resembles a reservoir, or caravansera; if, therefore, it be delivered to a procurator, consignment is established; because such an appointment is valid, although it be contrary to general usage.

Appropriations may be consigned to the prince or chief magistrate.—If a man, having a house in Mecca, appropriate it to the accommodation of pilgrims, or if a person, having a house in any other place, appropriate it to the accommodation of the poor, or mendicants, or, having a house upon the frontiers, dedicate it to the accommodation of the Mussulman warriors and their cattle, or dedicate the revenue from his lands to the support of the warriors in the way of God,* and make over or consign those houses or lands to the prince (who is empowered to act in those particulars) such consignment is lawful. If, therefore, the person in question be afterwards desirous of revoking his appropriation, he cannot lawfully do so, for the reasons before alleged. The revenue arising from the lands, however, is lawful to the poor only, and not to the rich; but the use of any of the other articles (such as residing in the caravansera, or drinking water from the well, fountain, or reservoir) are lawful to rich and poor alike. The reasons of this distinction are twofold. FIRST, people in general, in the appropriation of a revenue, intend only the relief of the needy, whereas, in that of the other articles, the accommodation of rich and poor is equally intended. SECONDLY, the articles of drink and lodging are requisite equally to the rich and to the poor; but in the article of pecuniary assistance, the rich are not necessitous, on account of their wealth, whereas the poor are necessitous.

* That is, engaged in war against the infidels.

OF SALE.

Definition of the terms used in sale.—BEEYA, or sale, in the language of the LAW, signifies an exchange of property for property with the mutual consent of the parties. Shirra signifies purchase. The seller is termed Bayee: the purchaser Mooshterree: the thing sold Moobea: and the price Simmin.

Sale is contracted by declaration and acceptance.—SALE is completed by declaration and acceptance, the speech of the first speaker, of the contracting parties, being termed the declaration, and that of the last speaker the acceptance. Thus, if Zeid should first say to Omar, "I have sold to you a particular article belonging to me for ten dirms," and Omar should then say, "I have bought that article belonging to you for the said price," the speech of Zeid is in that case termed the declaration, and that of Omar the acceptance. If, on the contrary, Omar should first say to Zeid, "I have purchased a particular article belonging to you for ten dirms," and Zeid should then say, "I have sold the same to you for the said price," the speech of Omar is in this case termed the declaration, and that of Zeid the acceptance.

Expressed either in the preterite or the present.—It is a necessary condition that the declaration and acceptance be expressed in the present or preterite tense indicative; for if either be expressed in the imperative or future the contract is incomplete. Thus, if the seller should say to the purchaser, "Buy this article belonging to me for ten dirms," and the purchaser reply, "I have bought the said article for ten dirms,"—or, if the seller should say, "I have sold this article to you for ten dirms," and the purchaser reply, "I will purchase the said article for ten dirms,"—in neither case would the sale be binding.

Or by any expressions calculated to convey the same meaning.—It is to be observed that in the same manner as a sale is established by the words "I have bought," or "I have sold," so also is it established by any other words expressive of the same meaning;—as if either of the parties, for instance, should, say, "I am contented with this price," or "I have given you this article for a certain price," or "take this article for a certain price," because, in sale, regard is had to the spirit of the contract, and the particular use of the words bought and sold is not required; whence it is that sale may be contracted simply by a Taata or mutual surrender, where the seller gives the article sold to the purchaser, and the purchaser in return gives the price to the seller, without the interposition of speech. Some have alleged that this mode of sale by a mutual surrender is valid with relation to things of small value; but not otherwise. It is, however, certain that sale by a mutual surrender is valid in every case, as it establishes the mutual consent of the parties.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that the sale, as recited above, to be rendered complete by the words "Take this," &c., is not valid, as it was before declared to be a necessary condition that both declaration and acceptance should be expressed in the present or preterite tense indicative, and neither of them in the imperative.

REPLY.—In this case the words "Take," &c., are not of themselves declaration, but merely indicate the existence of a declaration in the preterite tense;—as if the seller had first said, "I have sold this thing," and were then to add, "Take this," &c., for the command is consequent to the declaration.

The acceptance may be deferred until the breaking up of the meeting; whether the declaration be made personally.—If, either of the parties make a declaration, it is in the power of the other to withhold his acceptance or refusal until the breaking up of the meeting; and this power is termed the option of acceptance.* The reason of this is that if such a power did not rest in one of the parties, it must necessarily follow that the sale would take effect without his consent. It is to be observed, in this instance, that as the declaration is not of itself efficient to complete the contract, the person making the declaration is at liberty to recede from it.

Or by letter, or message.—If either the buyer or seller should send a letter or a message to the other, that other has the power of suspending his acceptance or refusal until he leave the place or meeting where he received such message or letter.

An offer made by the purchaser cannot be restricted by the seller, to any particular part of the goods.—If the purchaser make a declaration of his purchase of merchandise at a particular price, the seller is not in that case entitled to construe his acceptance as limited to a part of the merchandise only at a rate proportionate to the declaration for the whole;—and, in the same manner, if a seller should make a similar declaration, the purchaser is not at liberty to construe his purchase after that manner;—because this is a deviation from the terms proffered; and also because the declarer has not expressed his assent thereto.

Unless he oppose a particular rate or price to particular parts or portions.—If, however, the person who makes the declaration should specify a particular rate, opposed to particular parts of the merchandise, the acceptance may be limited. Thus if a person should say, "I will sell this heap of grain for ten dirms," the purchaser, if he declare his acceptance, is not in that case at liberty to limit his purchase to half the grain for five dirms; whereas, if the seller should say, "I will sell this grain at the rate of one man for a dirim," the purchaser, after declaring his acceptance, may limit his purchase to what quantity he pleases.

If the acceptance be not expressed in due time, the declaration is null.—If either a seller or purchaser make a declaration, and one of the parties quit the place before any acceptance be expressed, the declaration so made is void.

Declaration and acceptance, absolutely expressed, render the sale binding.—When the declaration and acceptance are absolutely expressed, without any stipulations, the sale becomes binding, and neither party has the power of retracting unless in a case of a defect in the goods, or their not having been inspected. According to Shafei, each of the parties possesses the option of the meeting* (that is, they are each at liberty to retract until the meeting break up and a separation take place),—because of a saying recorded of the prophet, "The buyer and seller has each an option until they separate." Our doctors argue that the dissolution of the contract, after being confirmed by declaration and acceptance, is an injury to the right of one of the parties; and that the tradition quoted by Shafei alludes to the option of acceptance, as already explained.

Where the article and the price are both produced, the sale is complete, without any specification of quantity or amount.—If, at the time of concluding a contract of sale, either the merchandise, or the price, or both, be present and alluded to in it (as if the seller should say, "I have sold this wheat to you for these dirms," or the purchaser, "With these dirms now present I have purchased such an article belonging to you"), in this case the sale is valid, although neither the quantity of wheat (such as "so many loads," for instance), nor the amount of the money (such as "so many dirms"), be mentioned; for the reference made to them is sufficient to ascertain the subjects of the contract, and does not leave room for any dispute.

But a mention of money, without a specification of the sum (unless it be produced upon the spot), is not valid.—If, at the time of concluding the contract, the dirms or deenars be not present, so as to admit of being referred to; in this case the general mention of them, without a specification of the numbers or of the quality, is not valid; because the delivery of them on the part of the purchaser is requisite; and as the general mention of them would occasion a contention between the purchaser and seller (the one wishing to give a few and of a bad quality, the other insisting on a greater number and a better quality), the delivery would therefore become impracticable. (It is here proper to observe, that every species of uncertainty which may prove an occasion of contention is invalid, in a contract of sale.)

A sale may be entered into, either for ready money, or with specification of a promised time of payment.—A SALE is valid either for ready money or for a future payment, provided the period be fixed; because of the words of the Koran, "ABSOLUTE SALE IS LAWFUL;" and also, because there is a tradition of the prophet having purchased a garment from a Jew, and promising to pay the price at a fixed future period, pledging his coat of mail for the performance of it. It is indispensably requisite, however, that the period of payment be fixed, as an uncertainty in this respect might occasion a contention, and be preventive of its execution, since the seller would naturally demand the payment of the price soon, and the buyer would desire to defer it.

The price must be stipulated at some known and determinate rate.—A SALE, stipulating a payment of dirms in an absolute manner (as if a person should say, "I have sold this for ten dirms"), is valid; provided, however, that all the different species of dirms be of the same value: and in that case the purchaser is entitled to pay the price in any of the species he pleases.—If the different species of dirms be of different value, the sale then rests upon that which is most generally in use. If, however, the different species be of different values, and it be impossible to ascertain the one of most common use, the absolute expression of dirms in this case renders the sale void, because the price being thereby rendered uncertain, a contention must necessarily ensue: still, however, if the parties choose to remove the cause of contention by voluntarily fixing the rate, the sale is valid.

Grain may be sold for other grain of a different species.—It is lawful to sell wheat, or other kinds of grain, either by means of measures of capacity, or by conjecture,* provided it be in exchange for a different kind of grain; because the prophet has said, "Sell any thing that is in exchange for a different kind, in whatsoever manner you please and without regard to the quality;" and also, because the uncertainty in this case proves no bar to its delivery. It is not lawful, however, to sell grain in exchange for the same kind by conjecture, because this is of an usurious nature.

Goods may be sold by a weight or measurement which is not of any particular standard.

—It is lawful, in sale, to use the measure of a particular vessel, of which the exact capacity may not be ascertained,—or the weight of a particular stone, the exact weight of which is not ascertained,—because the uncertainty in this case cannot be productive of contention, since either of these instruments of estimation may be used and the delivery take place immediately after; and it is not probable that the vessel or stone should be lost or destroyed in the interval between the measurement and the delivery, the only case in which a contention could arise.

Except in a case of Sillim sale.—A MEASUREMENT of this kind, however, is not allowed in Sillim sales (that is, where the price is advanced, and the merchandise delivered afterwards), because in such case there is a probability of the vessel or stone being lost or destroyed during the long interval that takes place between the conclusion of the contract and the delivery of the goods; in which case, as the parties had no other criterion (during the existence of the stone or vessel) than their eyesight to judge from, a contention might afterwards arise as to the size or weight of the stone or vessel.

A sale fixing a particular price to each particular part or portion of goods, in the gross, extends only to one such part.—If a person sell a heap of grain, by declaring, "I have sold this heap at the rate of one dirim for every Kafeez,"† in this case (according to Haneefa) the sale takes place in one Kafeez only; nor can it extend beyond that quantity, unless the seller should explain, in the same meeting, the sum of the Kafeez's. The two disciples are of opinion that the sale of the whole is valid in both cases.

The reasoning of Haneefa is that it is impracticable to extend the sale to the whole of the heap, because both the goods to be delivered and the price to be received are in this case uncertain: it must therefore be construed as existing in one Kafeez, the only ascertained quantity. It is rendered valid, however, with respect to the whole quantity, by the removal of the uncertainty,—that is, by the seller either explaining the total, or ascertaining it by measurement during the meeting. The argument of the two disciples is, that the power of removing the uncertainty rests with the parties: and that the uncertainty, in this case, ought not to be deemed a bar to the validity of the sale; in the same manner as it is not a bar where a person sells one slave out of two, leaving it in the option of the purchaser to fix on either of them.

And a sale expressing the whole quantity, in this way, is altogether void, unless the amount of the whole be particularly specified.

—If a person say, "I have sold my flock of goats at the rate of one dirim for each," the sale in that case is altogether invalid,—in other words, it is not extended even to one goat,—according to Haneefa; and in the same manner, the sale is altogether invalid if a person sell cloth at the rate of one dirim the yard, without explaining the number of yards; and the same of every other article, such as wood, pots, or the like. The two disciples are of opinion that, in all these cases, the sale is valid with respect to the whole quantity; because the removal of the uncertainty is in the power of the parties; and also, because such uncertainty does not prevent the validity of the sale, as is demonstrated in the preceding case. The arguments of Haneefa in support of his opinion are also the same as those advanced by him in the preceding case;—in which, however, he has admitted the validity of the sale with respect to one Kafeez of wheat, because all Kafeez's of wheat being the same, no contention can arise in the delivery of it,—whereas, in the case in question, the different articles, comprehending in themselves unequal unities, the delivery could not be made without contention.

If the quantity agreed for full short, the purchaser may either take it, or undo the contract.—If a person purchase a heap of grain for one hundred dirims, on the condition of the heap amounting to one hundred Kafeez's, and it be afterwards discovered to fall short of that amount, in this case the purchaser has the option of either taking the actual amount, at a rate proportioned to the terms of the contract, or of undoing the contract entirely; because a breach of the terms takes place before the deed is rendered complete, since, in order to render the deed complete, it is necessary that the actual quantity stipulated be taken possession of.

But, if it exceed, the sale is valid to the amount of the quantity bargained for.—If, on the other hand, the heap be afterwards found to contain an excess beyond the stipulated amount, the sale is valid with respect to the amount of the one hundred Kafeez's, and the excess continues the property of the seller; because the sale is restricted to a specific quantity; and the excess is not included in the description, so as to be a dependant thereof, and not a separate article.

* Meaning, by Estimate.

† A measure containing about sixty-four pounds weight.

If the quantity be of a nature capable of specification and fall short, the purchaser may either take it, or undo the bargain.—If a person sell a piece of cloth for ten dirms, on the condition of its contents amounting to ten yards,—or a piece of ground for one hundred dirms, on condition of its measuring one hundred yards,—and a deficiency afterwards appear, the purchaser has in that case the option either of cancelling the bargain entirely, or of taking the ground, or cloth, thus defective, at the stipulated price; for the specification of yards is a mere description of the length and breadth; and no part of the price is opposed to the description of the wares;—in the same manner as in cases with respect to animals;—in other words, if a person purchase a goat, which afterwards appears to want an ear, he would have the option of taking the defective goat for the price stipulated, or of undoing the bargain: but he would have no right to diminish the price on account of such defect, because no part of the price is opposed to the ear in particular, so as to admit of any fixed diminution on account of its deficiency;—and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise in the preceding case, relative to wheat; because there the deficiency comes under the head of the quantity and not the description of the wheat; and the price being opposed to quantity, a proportionate diminution is accordingly made from it. Still, however, the purchaser has the option of undoing the contract if he please, on account of the difference from the terms; his consent having been given to the purchase of one hundred Kafeez's.

But if it exceed, the sale is binding to the amount agreed for.—If, however, the ground or the cloth should prove larger than the description, in this case the excess becomes the property of the purchaser, and no option remains to the seller, because (as has been already explained) the specification of yards relates merely to description and not to substance. The case, in short, becomes the same as if he had sold a slave on the supposition of his being defective, but who afterwards proves to be perfect.

If the quantity be so expressed as to relate both to description and to substance, the purchaser may either stand to or undo the bargain, whether it exceed or fall short of the amount specified.—If a person sell a piece of cloth, by declaring, "I have sold this piece of cloth, which measures one hundred yards, at the rate of one dirm for each yard," and a deficiency should afterwards appear, in this case the purchaser has the option, either of taking it, with a proportional deduction from the price, or of dissolving the contract entirely; because, although the specification of yards comes under the head of description, yet in this case the yards are considered as relating to the substance, the seller having opposed the price to each of them, which renders each (as it were) a separate piece of cloth. Besides, if the seller should take the defective quantity at the rate proposed for the whole, it would follow that the terms of the contract (namely, the payment of one dirm per yard) did not take place:—if, on the other hand, the amount of the cloth exceed one hundred yards, the purchaser has the option, either of taking the whole, at the rate of one dirm for each yard, or of dissolving the bargain; for although he has an advantage in the receipt of more cloth than he had contracted for, yet this being tempered with a loss, in the necessity it lays him under of paying an additional sum, he is therefore left at liberty either to abide by the contract on these conditions, or to undo it.

The sale of a specific number of yards of a tenement is null; but not the sale of a share.—If a person purchase ten yards of a house or bath measuring one hundred yards, such purchase is invalid, according to Hanefah, whether the buyer may or may not have known the measurement of the whole house. The two disciples maintain that it is valid. If, on the contrary, a person purchase ten shares of a house or bath containing one hundred shares, it is valid, in the opinion of all our doctors. The argument adduced by the two disciples in support of their opinion is, that ten yards of a house of an hundred yards in capacity are in fact the same as ten shares out of an hundred shares. Hanefah, in support of his doctrine, argues that a yard, in its original meaning, is a stick applied to the purpose of measurement; but it is also used to denote the thing measured, and the thing so measured must be relative and not an abstract idea of the mind, such as a share: now it is impossible, in this case, to render such yards relative, since there exists an uncertainty, as no mention is made of the particular side of the house from which they have been measured; and such uncertainty would occasion contention between the parties. It is otherwise with respect to shares, for these are abstract ideas of the mind and not undefined relatives; and although, of consequence, an uncertainty exist with respect to them also, yet such uncertainty cannot occasion a contention, since the possessor of ten shares of the house may either enjoy them indefinitely, or may receive his share according to the mode prescribed in the division of joint property.

The purchase of a package of cloth is null, if it contain more or less than the quantity of pieces agreed for.—If a person purchase a package containing cloth, on condition of there being ten pieces in it, and it afterwards appear that there are nine or eleven pieces in it, the sale is invalid, because of the uncertainty, with regard to the price, in the one case, and to the merchandise in the other; for in case of there being nine pieces, as the price of the piece wanting is unknown, that of the remaining nine is of consequence also unknown; and where, on the other hand, there is one too many, it is unknown which are the specific ten that ought to be delivered.

Unless the seller previously specify the price of each particular piece.—If, however, the seller should explain the price of each piece of cloth, and there be too few, the sale is valid; but the purchaser has the option of undoing it if he please; whereas, if there be too many, it is invalid, because of the uncertainty with respect to the goods, as it would be impossible to ascertain the particular ten that are included in the sale.—Some have said that in case of deficiency also the sale is invalid, according to Hancefa. But this is unfounded.

A sale is null in toto, if the description of the goods be at all fallacious.—If a person sell two pieces of cloth, on the condition of their being Heratee, and one of them afterwards prove to be Murwallee,* in that case the sale is completely invalid, that is, does not hold good even with respect to the true one, although the seller should have specified the prices of both; for when the seller joined together both pieces in the declaration of a sale of Heratee pieces, he, as it were, established a condition that the purchaser should accept a piece of Murwallee, which being a false condition, the sale is therefore annulled.

Case of the purchase of a piece of cloth at so much per yard.—If a person purchase a piece of cloth, on the condition of its measuring ten yards, and at the rate of one dirm for each yard, and the measurement afterwards prove to be ten yards and a half, or nine yards and a half, in this case the purchaser (according to Hancefa) must pay ten dirms in the first instance, and nine in the second; still having the option of undoing the contract if he please. Abou Yoosaf alleges that if the purchaser choose to abide by the contract, he must pay eleven dirms in the first instance, and ten in the second. The opinion of Mohammed is, that in case the purchaser chooses to abide by the contract, he must pay ten and a half dirms in the first instance, and nine and a half in the second; because the measurement of a yard having been fixed at one dirm, it necessarily follows that half a yard must be rated at half a dirm. The reasoning of Abou Yoosaf is that as the price of each yard was fixed at one dirm, it follows that each yard becomes virtually a distinct piece of cloth; and as one of these proves defective, it follows that the purchaser has the option either of undoing the bargain, or of taking the goods according to the terms of the contract. The arguments adduced by Hancefa in support of his opinion are, that the specification of yards is considered as referring to the description, and not the real quantity of the thing, excepting only where the price of each given measurement is specifically stipulated as a condition of the contract. Now, as in the case in question, the rate is opposed to each complete yard, but not to any smaller quantity, it follows that such smaller quantity must be considered as remaining in its original form,—that is, as applying merely to description, and therefore cannot involve an additional payment. Some have observed that in coarse cotton cloths, of which the extreme and interior parts are of a similar texture, it is not lawful for the purchaser to take any excess beyond the terms of the contract; as it may be cut off and restored to the seller without any injury to the piece, in the manner of things estimable by weight; and hence the learned deem it lawful to sell even a single yard of it.

In the sale of a house, the foundation and superstructure are both included.—If a person sell the place of his abode (in other words, his house), the foundation and superstructure are both included in such sale, although they may not have been specified by the seller; because they are comprehended in the common acceptance of the term; and also, because, being joined to the ground in the nature of fixtures, they are considered as dependant parts of it.

In the sale of land, the trees upon it are included.—In a sale of land, the trees upon it are included, although they be not specified, because they are joined to it, in the same manner as foundation and superstructure in the preceding case.

But not the corn.—In a sale of ground, the grain then growing on it is not included, unless particularly specified by the seller; because it is joined to the ground, not as a fixture, but for the purpose of being cut away from it, in the same manner as goods of any kind which may have been placed upon it.

Nor, in the sale of a tree, is the fruit then upon it included.—So also, if a person should sell a tree on which fruit is growing, the fruit belongs to the seller, unless it had been specifically included in the sale; because the prophet has said, "If a person sell a DATE tree with fruit upon it, the fruit belongs to the seller, unless the purchaser should have stipulated its delivery to him as a condition of sale." Besides, although the fruit be, in fact, a part of the tree, yet as it is intended to be plucked and gathered, and not to be suffered to hang on the tree, it is therefore the same as grain.

But the purchaser must immediately clear these away.—It is to be observed, however, that in the sale of a tree with fruit, or of ground with grain upon it, the seller must be immediately desired to clear them away, and deliver the property to the purchaser; because, in these cases, the property of the purchase and seller being implicated together, it becomes incumbent on the seller to clear away what belongs to him; in the same manner as if he had placed any of his goods upon the ground, in which case the clearance of them would have been requisite. Shafei maintains that in both these cases the grain and the fruit must be suffered to remain until they become ripe, because there ought to be a period stipulated for the delivery of the things sold, and that period ought to be extended to the complete growth and maturity of these vegetables; in the same manner as in the case of a lease of ground, where if, at the expiration of the lease, the grain on the ground be green, it is suffered to remain until it ripen. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that the obligation is the same on a lessee; and if he be permitted to extend the lease on account of the unripeness of the grain, he must, however, pay additional rent for it, which is a substitute for the delivery; and the substitute is in effect the same as the thing itself. It is to be observed that in the sale of a tree, the fruit is not included, whether it be of an appreciable nature or otherwise, unless it be specifically mentioned.

In the sale of ground, the seed sown in it is not included.—If a person sell a piece of ground in which seed has been sown, but of which the growth has not appeared above ground, in this case the seed is not included in the sale. If the apparent growth should have taken place, though not in such a degree as to render the vegetable of any value, in this case there is a difference of opinion. Some allege that the vegetation is not included in the sale; and others, that it is. This difference of opinion has its foundation in the different sentiments which the parties entertain with regard to the validity of the sale of vegetation, prior to its being fit to be cut down by the hook, or used by animals in the way of forage: for those who consider the separate sale of such vegetation to be valid, are of opinion that it is not included; whilst those who consider the sale of it as invalid, are of opinion that it is included in the sale of the ground.

The imme-product is not included, in the sale of land or trees, although the rights and appendages be expressed in the contract.—GRAIN and fruit are not included in a sale of ground, or of a tree, although the purchaser and seller specify the rights and appendages (in other words, although the seller declare, "I have sold this ground, or this tree, with all its rights and appendages"), because grain and fruit do not fall under these descriptions. (The rights of a thing are those without which it cannot be enjoyed, and which form the principal object of possession, such as a watercourse or a road: the appendages are things from which we derive use, but which are more particularly considered as dependant parts, such as a cook-room, or a house for keeping water.) In the same manner, if the seller should say, "I have sold this tree, or this piece of ground, with every thing small and great of its rights and appendages which I possess in it," still neither the fruit nor the grain is included in it.

Nor unless all its dependencies be generally expressed.—If, however, he should say, in a general manner, "I have sold this tree (or this piece of ground), with every thing great and small which I possess in it," in this case the grain and the fruit are necessarily included in it.

Nor can any product be included after being gathered or cut down.—It is to be observed that grain which has been cut, or fruit which has been plucked, cannot by any construction whatever be included in the sale, unless expressly mentioned as such.

Fruit may be sold upon the tree in every state of growth.—THE sale of fruit upon a tree is valid, whether the strength of the fruit be ascertained or not; that is, whether it may or may not have reached such a degree of strength as may preserve it from common accidents: because fruit is a property of certain value, either immediately, in case of its being ripe, or hereafter, in case of its being in an unripe state (some have said that the sale of fruit in a weak state is invalid: the first doctrine is, however, the most authentic): and the sale of fruit in an absolute manner being valid, the purchaser must immediately take it from the tree, whether this be particularly expressed as a condition in the sale or otherwise.

But if the contract involve any condition not properly appertaining to sale, it is null.—If, however, the condition of suffering the fruit to remain on the tree be stipulated, the sale is null, because such a condition is illegal, since it implicates together the right of property of the two parties, which is repugnant to the nature of sale; and every condition of this kind invalidates the sale. Besides, in this case, it must necessarily follow that one deed is interwoven with another; in other words, that either a loan or a lease is implicated with the sale, which is unlawful. In the same manner, the sale of grain, with a stipulation of leaving it on the seller's ground, is unlawful, and for the same reason. The same rule also obtains (according to Hanecfa and Abou Yoosaf) where the fruit or corn has attained its full growth, as this implicates the right of property of two parties. Mohammed is of opinion that, in this instance, such a condition is lawful, because of the existence of the whole of the thing in question; whereas, in the former case, the part of the property which afterwards vegetated was not in being at the time of the conclusion of the deed; and the stipulation of a condition with regard to a nonentity being illegal, the sale is therefore null.

The additional growth of fruit purchased on the tree, if suffered to continue upon it, by consent of the seller, is the property of the purchaser.—If a person purchase fruit upon the tree before it had reached its full growth, in an absolute manner (that is, without stipulating the condition of its remaining upon the tree until it become ripe), and afterwards, with the permission of the seller, suffer it to hang on the tree, in this case the additional growth becomes his lawful property. If, however, he act in this manner without the consent of the seller; he must then bestow the difference in charity, as being the produce of the property of another without the consent of that other. If, on the other hand, the sale should have taken place when the fruit had attained its full growth, and the purchaser suffer it to remain until it become ripe, he is not on that account required to bestow any thing in charity, because in this instance a change from one state to another takes place without any increase being made to the substance.

And so also if the purchaser take a lease of the tree.—If a person, having in an absolute manner purchased fruit which had not attained its full growth, should afterwards suffer it to remain on the tree till it became ripe, by taking a lease of the tree till that period, in this case the increase of substance is lawful to him, because the lease is null, on account of a want of precise knowledge with respect to the period of it,—and also, on account of its not having been warranted by absolute necessity, since it was in the power of the lessee to have purchased the tree itself:—and the lease being null, there remains only the consent of the seller, to which regard must be had.

But this rule does not hold with respect to grain purchased upon the ground.—It is otherwise where a person purchases grain upon the ground, and having then taken a lease of the ground until the grain be capable of being cut down, suffers it to remain until that time; for the increase of substance is not in such case lawful to him, since the lease so made is invalid, and an invalid lease is the occasion of baseness and abomination.

Any new fruit which may grow in the interim is the property of the seller and purchaser.—If a person, in an unconditional manner, purchase fruit upon a tree which had not completely vegetated, and afterwards, before he had received a formal seisin of it, new fruit should grow, in this case the sale is invalid, because of the impracticability of delivery on the part of the seller, from the impossibility of distinguishing between what was the subject of the sale and what was not. But if new fruit should appear after the seisin of the purchaser, such fruit is in an equal degree the right of both, because of its intermixture with the property of both. The assertion of the purchaser, however, with regard to the quantity, is credited, because the fruit is in his possession. (The sale of artichokes or melons which are growing is subject to the same law as that of fruit growing upon trees.)

Rule in the purchase of vegetables sold on a tree.—If a person wish to purchase fruit, artichokes, or melons, and afterwards to have it in his power to let them remain until they become ripe, or until they shall yield a new crop, so as to have a lawful claim to the property, the expedient to be practised, in order to render such conduct legal, is to purchase the tree or bed itself, and after clearing it of the fruit when ripe, to undo the contract of sale with regard to the tree or bed.*

If a person should sell fruit, with a reservation of a specific number of Raths of it, the sale is invalid, whether the fruit be upon the tree or off it; because although the reservation be itself specific and known, yet the residue is unknown. It is otherwise where a reservation is made of a specific tree; because there the remainder is known, being obvious to the eye.—Our author remarks that this doctrine is conformable to a tradition of Hasan, adopted by Tahavee: but that such a sale is valid, according to the Zahir Rawayet, and also in the opinion of Shafei, because it is a rule that whatever may be lawfully sold, separately, may also be lawfully excepted from a deed of sale. Thus the sale of one Kafecz from a heap of grain being lawful, the exception of it is also a lawful act.—It is otherwise with respect to a fetus in the womb, or any particular member of an animal; because as the separate sale of such subjects is illegal, so also is the reservation of them.

Grain may be sold in the ear, or pulse in the husk.—The sale of wheat in the ear, or of beans in the husk, is valid; and the law is the same with respect to rice or rape seed in the husk. Shafei is of opinion that the sale of green beans in the husk, or of walnuts, almonds, or Pistachio nuts in the shell, is not valid; but with respect to wheat in the ear, he has given two opposite opinions. All these sales are, however, valid in the opinion of all our doctors. The reasoning of Shafei is that the subject of the sale, in these cases, is hidden within a thing of no value in itself, namely, the husk, and that therefore the case becomes the same as if a goldsmith should sell a heap of earth mixed with particles of gold, in exchange for another heap of a similar nature, which is invalid. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. FIRST, the prophet has said, "The sale of fruit upon the tree, or of grain in the ear, is invalid, unless it approach to a state of ripeness."† SECONDLY, wheat is an article capable of yielding advantage; and hence the sale of it in the ear is valid in the same manner as that of barley, the one being an appreciable article as well as the other. It is otherwise with gold dust, for the sale of

* The consent of the seller is here presupposed; for neither of the parties can undo a sale without the consent of the other. This expedient is therefore suggested on a supposition of the future undoing of the sale being equally agreeable to both parties.

† Whence it may be inferred that the sale, in the ear, or upon the tree, is admissible.

that, mixed with earth, is unlawful from the possibility of its being usurious.

The sale of a house includes the fixtures and their appendages.—If a person sell a house, of which the locks are not of the hanging but of the fixed kind, in this case, the keys of such locks are considered as included in the sale; because the locks themselves are included in the house, in consequence of their being fixtures; and the sale of a lock includes the key, without its being expressly stipulated, because it is considered as a constituent part of it, since a lock without a key is of no use.

The seller must defray the expense of weighers, tellers, measurers, and money-essayers.—THE wages of the measurer* of the money, or of the essayer of the goods, must be paid by the seller:—the wages of the measurer, because, as measurement is essential to enable the seller to deliver over the goods, the payment of the expense attending that falls properly upon him (and so also, the wages of weighers or tellers);—and the wages of the essayer, because of a tradition, delivered by Ibn Roostim, that such is the doctrine of Mohammed; and also for this reason, that the essay of the money takes place after the delivery, when it becomes the business of the seller to have it essayed, in order that he may distinguish what is his right and what is not; and that he may ascertain the bad coin in order to reject them. Ibn Soomai relates it as the opinion of Mohammed that the purchaser should defray the wages of the essayer, because he stands in need of ascertaining the good dirms which he has stipulated to deliver, and the good dirms are known by means of an essayer, in the same manner as quantity by means of a measurer.

But the charge of weighing the price must be defrayed by the purchaser.—THE charge of weighing the price is due by the purchaser, because he is under the necessity of delivering it to the seller, and the delivery is completed after the ascertainment of the weight. In a sale stipulating immediate payment, the purchaser must first deliver the price to the seller, because his right (namely, the goods sold) is of a fixed and determinate nature, whereas the price is not so; and it is therefore incumbent on him, in order that both parties may be on a par, to deliver the price to the seller, which fixes and determines it; for it cannot be determined but by delivery.†

* Meaning, properly, some person who is employed as a sworn or professed measurer.

† Thus if the price stipulated be ten dirms, and the purchaser be in possession of a thousand dirms (for example) in this case, although the number ten be determinate, yet the units to compose that number and to be taken from a great number, are not specific and determinate, until actually delivered. This doctrine is frequently and particularly enlarged upon in the sequel of this book.

In barter or exchange, the mutual delivery must be made by both parties at the same time.—IN a sale of goods for goods, or of money for money, it is necessary that both parties make the delivery at the same time; because being on a par in point of certainty and uncertainty, there is no necessity for a prior delivery.

CHAPTER II.

OF OPTIONAL CONDITIONS.*

Definition of the term.—AN optional condition is where one of the parties stipulates it as a condition that he may have the option, for a period of two or three days, of annulling the contract if he please.

A condition of option may be lawfully stipulated by either party.—THE stipulation of a condition of option, on the part either of the seller or purchaser, is lawful; and it may be stipulated to continue for three days or less; but it must not be extended beyond that term; because it is related that Hooban having been defrauded in several of his bargains, the prophet addressed him thus, "HOOBAN, when you make a purchase bar deceit, and stipulate a condition of option."

Provided it exceed not the term of three days.—AN optional condition, stipulated to remain in force for a period exceeding three days, is unlawful according to Hancefa; and Ziffer and Shafei are of the same opinion. The two disciples, on the contrary, maintain that it may be stipulated to continue to any length of time whatever: because it is related that Ibn Omar extended it to two months; and also because it is ordained, by the LAW, for the purpose of answering the necessities of man, in enabling him to consider and set aside what is bad; and as a period of three days may not be sufficient for this purpose, the indulgence is therefore extended with respect to the merchandise, in the same manner as with respect to the price. The argument of Haneefa is that an optional condition is repugnant to the nature of the act, which fixes an immediate obligation on the parties, and is allowed only because of the saying of the prophet already quoted; whence it cannot be extended to a period beyond what has been there specified.

* Arab. Khiaar-al-Shirt. In contracts of sale there are five different options. These are, 1st. Option of acceptance. 2. Optional conditions. 3. Option of determination. 4. Option of inspection, and 5. Option from defect. An option of acceptance is a liberty which either of the parties, in a contract of sale, has of withholding his acceptance, after the tender of the other, until the breaking up of the meeting. An optional condition is where one of the parties stipulates a period of three days before he gives his final assent to the contract. An option of determination is where a person, having purchased one out of two or three homogeneous things, stipulates a period to enable him to fix his choice. Option of inspection, is the power which the purchaser of an unseen thing has of rejecting it after sight. Option from defect is the power which a purchaser has of dissolving the contract on the discovery of a defect on the merchandise. The translator has thought it proper, in this note, to bring into one point of view, an explanation of the several kinds of option, as it may possibly tend to give a clearer idea of them than what could be collected from the scattered definitions of them as they occur in the course of the work.

If it exceed three days, and the stipulating party declare his acceptance before the expiration of the third day, the sale is lawful.

—ALTHOUGH a conditional option beyond three days be not permitted, still if such a condition be stipulated, and the person making such stipulation, before the lapse of the three days, declare his acceptance of the contract, the sale is in that case valid, according to Haneefa. Ziffer, however, is of a different opinion; for he argues that the sale being invalid from the beginning, on account of the illegality of the condition, it cannot be afterwards rendered valid by the removal of such condition. The arguments of Haneefa on this point are twofold. FIRST, as the acceptance of the sale was declared before the lapse of the three days, the cause of its invalidity has not begun to operate. SECONDLY, the invalidity takes place on the fourth day; and as the acceptance is declared before that period, the sale is consequently kept free from any cause of invalidity. From this second argument some have considered that the invalidity of the sale does not take place until the commencement of the fourth day;—whilst others (founding their opinion on the first argument), hold that the contract was invalid from the beginning; but is afterwards rendered valid by the removal of the cause of its invalidity previous to its operation.

The payment of the price may be substituted as the condition.—It is lawful for a person to make a purchase on this condition, that “if in the course of three days he do not pay the price, the sale shall be null and void.” If, however, instead of three days he stipulate four, the sale is not valid, according to Haneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed is of opinion that it is valid, whether he stipulate four days or more. All our doctors, however, agree, that in case of such a stipulation having been made, if the purchaser in the mean time pay the price, previous to the lapse of the third day, the sale is valid. The reason of this is that a condition of this nature is of the same nature with an optional condition, because, in case the purchaser cannot furnish the price, the seller stands in need of a power to annul the act. As, moreover, Haneefa holds that a sale is invalid, where the condition of option extends beyond three days, but may afterwards be rendered valid by a formal confirmation previous to the lapse of the third day, so also in the case in question. As Mohammed, on the contrary, holds that the extension of the condition of option beyond the third day is lawful, so also in the present instance. Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, although (contrary to analogy) he hold the extending of a condition of option beyond three days to be lawful, because of a tradition which he quotes to this effect, yet is of opinion that the same extension is unlawful in the present instance (arguing from analogy), as there is no tradition in support of it. There is another explanation, from analogy, with respect to this case, which has been adopted by Ziffer, to the following effect, that, in the sale in question, an invalid dissolution has been stipulated (for the dissolution is invalid, as it depends upon a condition); and as a sale is rendered void by the stipulation of a valid dissolution, it follows that by the stipulation of an invalid dissolution it is rendered void a fortiori. The reason, however, for a more liberal construction in this particular is, that the condition here stipulated is considered as an equivalent to a condition of option, as has already been explained.

The seller, by stipulating a condition of option, does not relinquish his property in the article sold.—If the seller stipulate a condition of option, the right of property over the goods does not in that case shift from him, because the completion of the sale depends on the mutual consent of the parties, and the condition of option evinces that the seller has not completely consented. If, therefore, under these circumstances, the seller should emancipate a slave whom he had in that manner sold, the emancipation would hold good.—Neither is the purchaser in such a case entitled to use or employ the goods, although he should have taken possession of them with consent of the seller.—If, after the purchaser had possessed himself of the goods, they should perish or be destroyed previous to the expiration of the period of optional condition, he becomes in that case responsible for the value; because by the destruction of the goods the sale is annulled (for the execution of it rested only on the consent of the seller; and where the subject of it is lost, the execution of it becomes impracticable; and it is null of course); and as the goods were in possession of the purchaser with a view to purchase (which circumstance renders a purchaser responsible for the value), he is responsible accordingly. If, on the other hand, the goods be lost in the possession of the seller, the deed is annulled; and no payment is incumbent on the purchaser, in the same manner as in the case of an absolute sale, that is, a sale where no condition is stipulated.

But the property in it devolves upon the purchaser where the stipulation is made on his part; and he is consequently responsible for the loss of the goods.—If the condition of the sale is such that the right of property over the goods shifts from the seller, because the sale is rendered complete on his part. The right of property, however, although it shift from the seller, does not vest in the purchaser, according to Haneeffa. The two disciples have said that the purchaser becomes the proprietor; for, if this were not the case, it must necessarily follow that, after it moved from the seller, it would remain subject to no person; and this is a state not supposed by the LAW. The arguments of Haneeffa on this point are twofold. FIRST, as the right of property with respect to the price has not shifted from the purchaser, it follows that if the right of property with respect to the goods also vest in him, the property with respect both to the thing purchased and the return for it is concentrated in one person, which is absolutely illegal. SECONDLY, if the right of property with respect to the goods were to vest in the purchaser, it might frequently happen that the goods would, in the interval, before the completion of the sale, be made away, without any intention on the part of the purchaser (as if the purchaser had bought a slave related to himself within the prohibited degrees)*; and as the sole object of the reserve of option is the benefit of the purchaser, in allowing him time for consideration, it follows, that if the right of property were to vest immediately in him, he might be deprived of the advantage which is the object of the reserve of option.

If the purchaser have the option, and the goods be injured or destroyed in the interim, he is responsible for the price.—If the merchandise, where the stipulation of option is on the part of the purchaser, perish or be destroyed, the purchaser is in that case answerable for the price. In the same manner also, if the goods receive an injury, the purchaser is responsible for the price; because the goods, after sustaining an injury, cannot be returned, and the sale consequently becomes binding. The purchaser, therefore, is responsible for the price in either instance; for destruction necessarily implies previous injury; and hence in a case where the purchase is utterly destroyed, the sale first becomes binding and complete, and the destruction takes place afterwards.

But if it rest with the seller, the purchaser is responsible for the value only.—AND as, in a case of injury, the payment of the price becomes obligatory, so also in a case of destruction. It is otherwise where the merchandise perishes in the possession of the purchaser when the option had been stipulated by the seller; for in this case the purchaser is answerable only for the value;†

because the circumstance of the injury does not render the condition impracticable, since the seller, in that case, has the option either of taking the merchandise thus injured, or of rejecting it, if he please, as the optional condition remains with him: and hence, as the sale does not become binding on the occurrence of the injury, if the seller choose to confirm it, the purchaser in that case only pays the value of the injured merchandise.

Right of option, in the purchase of a wife, is not affected by cohabitation with her in the interim of option.—If a person purchase his own wife, with a reserve of option for three days, in this case the marriage subsists during that interval, as the right of property does not take place because of the optional condition: and if he have carnal connexion with her during that interval, the condition of option is not thereby annulled; because he has it still in his power, after such connexion, to undo the sale, since his cohabitation with her is the exercise of a right in virtue of his marriage, and not of his right of property. If, however, his wife be a virgin, his cohabitation with her annuls the condition of option, and establishes the sale, as it is a damage to her, and a diminution of her value. This is the doctrine of Haneeffa. The two disciples are of opinion that the husband becomes immediate proprietor of his wife by the optional purchase, whence the marriage is immediately annulled. If, therefore, he should have cohabitation with her, he cannot afterwards reject her, although she may have been a woman;* because, the marriage being null, the cohabitation was not in virtue of marriage, but of property. This difference of opinion between Haneeffa and the two disciples, respecting the property vesting immediately in a conditional purchaser, has given rise to opposite decisions in a variety of different cases. Of this number are the following:—

Case of optional purchase of a slave related to the purchaser.—If a person make an optional purchase of a slave related to him within the prohibited degrees, the emancipation, in the opinion of the two disciples, takes place immediately; whereas, according to Haneeffa, it does not take place until after the confirmation of the contract.

And of a slave optionally purchased under a vow of emancipation.—If, also, a person make a vow to emancipate a slave whenever he becomes proprietor of one, then, according to the two disciples, if he make a conditional purchase of one, the emancipation takes place immediately; whereas, according to Haneeffa, it does not take place till after the confirmation.

Or of a menstruous female slave.—If, also, a person make an optional purchase of a female slave, and her monthly courses happen during the term of option, these courses are included in the prescribed term

* In which case the slave would become immediately free.

† And not for the price set upon it if the contract.

* That is to say, not a virgin.

of abstinence,* according to the two disciples; whereas, according to Haneefa, they are not included. And if the purchaser, availing himself of his optional condition, should return her to the seller, the seller need not observe the prescribed term of abstinence, according to Haneefa; whereas, the two disciples hold that such observance is incumbent on him.

Or of a pregnant wife.—If, on the other hand, a person make an optional purchase of his own wife, and if she, during the interval of option, bring forth a child, she is not an Am-Walid to the purchaser, according to Haneefa; whereas, according to the two disciples, she is so. If, also, a person make an optional purchase of merchandise, and having, with the consent of the seller, received possession of it, afterwards give it in deposit to the seller, and it be lost in the interval, in this case, according to Haneefa, the trust is null and void, as the deposit was not the property of the purchaser, and therefore he is of opinion that the loss results to the seller; whereas the two disciples, holding the said deposit to be valid, are of opinion that the loss results to the purchaser, agreeably to the law of deposits.

Optional purchase made by a privileged slave.—If, on the other hand, a privileged slave make an optional purchase, and the seller, during the interval of option, exempt him from the payment, in this case, according to Haneefa, the condition of option remains in force; because if he should return the merchandise, it follows that he does not choose to accept of the property, and a privileged slave has the power of accepting or rejecting as he pleases: but, according to the two disciples, the condition of option is annulled by the exemption of payment; because (in their opinion) the property having vested from the beginning, it follows that if he were to return the merchandise to the seller, it would be in effect a gift to him, and a privileged slave has not the power of making a gift.

Case of optional purchase of wine by a Zimnee, who in the interim embraces the faith.—If, moreover, a Zimnee purchase spirituous liquors from a Zimnee, on a condition of option, and the purchaser, in the interval, become a Mussulman, in this case, according to the two disciples, the condition of option remains no longer in force, because the purchaser having (agreeably to their tenets) become proprietor of the liquor, it follows that if he were permitted to reject it, he would create in another a right of property with respect to liquors, which no

Mussulman is allowed to use. According to Haneefa, on the contrary, the sale becomes void, because the purchaser (agreeably to his tenets), not being then the proprietor, and the circumstance of becoming a Mussulman putting it out of his power to become the proprietor by removing the condition, the sale is of necessity annulled.

The possessor of option may annul the sale with the knowledge of the other party, or confirm it without his knowledge.—In case of a sale on a condition of option, it is lawful, according to Haneefa and Mohammed, for the party possessing the option to annul the contract within the stipulated period, or to confirm it; which latter he may do without the knowledge of the other party: but it is not lawful for him to annul it without the knowledge of the other. Abou Yousaf alleges that the parties possessing the option may annul the contract without the knowledge of the other: and such, also, is the opinion of Shafei. The argument of Abou Yousaf is that the party possessing the option is empowered, on the part of the other, to annul the contract; and that therefore, such annulment cannot rest upon that other's knowledge of it; in the same manner as his knowledge of it is unnecessary in case the possessor of the option confirm the contract; as in the case of an agent for sale (for instance), who may lawfully act in every matter to which his agency extends, without the knowledge of his constituent, in virtue of the powers given to him on his behalf. The arguments of Haneefa and Mohammed are, that a contract of sale involves the rights of both parties; and that the annulment of the sale by one party only is an exercise of a right partly belonging to the other, whilst at the same time such exercise may eventually be attended with a loss to the other: for supposing the possessor of the option to be the seller, and that he annul the sale without the knowledge of the purchaser, and the purchaser, in the mean time, in the confidence of the sale being complete, take possession of the merchandise, then, in case of its destruction, he must of consequence be responsible for it: or, supposing the purchaser to be the possessor of the option, and that he annul the sale without the knowledge of the seller, then an eventual loss may result to the seller, as it is possible that, on the presumption of his goods being already sold, he may enquire out another purchaser. Hence, as such an exercise, on the part of either, of the right of the other, may be attended with an eventual injury, the annulment of an optional sale is therefore made to rest upon the knowledge of the other party. This case, in short, resembles the dismissal of an agent: for if a person, having appointed an agent, should afterwards dismiss him without his knowledge, it would not be valid until the agent was himself informed of it; and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise with the confirmation of a sale; as the exercise of such a right by one party only does not entail an injury. The assertion of Abou Yoosaf that "the possessor of the option is empowered to make such annulment on the part of the other," is not admitted; for how can the other, who does not himself possess such power, bestow it upon the possessor of the option?

* The purchaser of a female slave is required to abstain from carnal connexion with her until she shall have had three different courses from the period of her becoming his property, that it may be ascertained whether she be pregnant or not. (See Edit.)

And even if he annul it without the other's knowledge, and the other be informed before the expiration of the term, it is valid.—If the person possessing the option annul the sale without informing the other party, and such knowledge, nevertheless, reach him before the expiration of the stipulated period, then, because of his acquirement of such knowledge, the annulment is rendered complete. If, on the other hand, it should not have reached him until the expiration of the stipulated period, then the annulment is rendered complete, because of the expiration of the stipulated period.

A right of option, in sale, cannot descend to an heir.—If a person possessing the right of option in a sale should die, the sale is then complete, and the right of option becomes void, and does not descend to his heirs.—Shafei maintains that the option descends to the heirs, because, being a fixed and established right in sale, it may be inherited, in the same manner as an option in case of defect, or an option of determination. The arguments of our doctors are that an option is in reality nothing but desire, or disposition, which is not capable of being transferred from one to another; and nothing but what is capable of devolving from one person to another can be inherited.—It is otherwise with respect to option in case of defect, as that is granted to the heir, because of his right to obtain possession of a thing whole and complete, in the same manner as the deceased, and not because of his right of inheritance, since option is incapable of being a subject of inheritance. It is otherwise, also, with respect to an option of determination, as the heir becomes the proprietor in that instance, because of the mixture of property, and not because of his right of inheritance.

A right of option may be referred to a third person.—If a person, in purchasing any article, stipulate the option of another person, in this case, provided either the purchaser or the possessor of the option confirm the sale, it is valid; or, if either of them annul it, it becomes void.—The reason of this is, that the stipulation of the option of another is admitted, upon a favourable construction. Analogy would suggest that it is inadmissible, and such is the opinion of Ziffer, because option being one of the articles of the contract, it follows that the stipulation of it for another, who is not one of the contracting parties, is illegal, in the same manner as if it were stipulated that some other than the purchaser should pay the price.—The arguments of our doctors are, that the establishment of the right of option in one who is not a party to the contract is by way of appointment from him to act as his substitute. In this case, therefore, the option is vested both in the party and in his substitute; and consequently it is lawful for either of them to confirm or annul the contract.—If one of them should confirm, and the other annul the contract, in this case the first of these acts which may have been performed becomes valid. If both should have been performed at the same time, then (according to one tradition) the act of the contracting party is valid;—or (according to another) the validity of the annulment is preferred to that of the confirmation. The principle on which the first tradition proceeds is that the act of the contracting party is of superior force to that of a substitute who derives his authority from him; and the principle on which the second tradition is founded is that annulment is of superior force to confirmation, because annulment may take place after confirmation, but confirmation cannot take place after annulment. Some have asserted that the first tradition is conformable to the doctrine of Mohammed, and the second to that of Abou Yoosaf;—arguing from their different decisions in the case of an agent of sale and his constituent: for if both of them should at the same time sell the same thing to different persons, the sale of the constituent is valid, according to Mohammed;—whereas, according to Abou Yoosaf, both sales are valid; but the article sold must be divided between the two purchasers.

Case of selling two slaves, with a condition of option with respect to one of them.—If a person sell two slaves for a thousand dirms, stipulating an optional condition with respect to one of them, the case admits of four different statements.—I. Where the seller does not oppose a specific price to each of the slaves, nor specify the one respecting whom the optional condition is to operate: and this is illegal, because of the uncertainty both as to the subject of the sale and the price; for as the slave, concerning whom the condition of option is stipulated, is not (as it were) included in the sale, and as he is not specified, it follows that the other, who is the subject of the sale, is also unknown.—II. Where the seller sets a particular price upon each of the slaves, and also specifies to which the condition of option relates; and this is valid, because of the certainty with respect to the subject of the sale and the price.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that the sale is in this case illegal; because the slave who is the subject of the condition is not, in effect, included in the sale; and, as both are joined together in one declaration, it follows that the acceptance of the sale with relation to what is not the subject of it, becomes a condition of the validity of the sale with regard to what is; it being the same, in short, as if a person should join a freeman and a slave in one declaration of sale, which is illegal, because the acceptance of the sale with regard to what is not capable of being the subject of it (namely, the free man) is here made a condition of the validity of the sale with respect to the slave; and this condition is the cause of annulling the sale: it therefore follows that the sale is in the same manner invalid in the case in question, as the same condition (which occasions an annulment of the sale) is equally induced in this instance.

REPLY.—The sale, in the case in question, is lawful; because, although the acceptance of the sale, with respect to the slave concerning whom the option is stipulated, be a condition of the validity of the sale with respect to the other slave also, still such condition does not annul the sale, since the optional slave is a fit subject for sale: it is therefore, in fact, the same as if a person were to join a Modabbir and an absolute slave in one declaration; and as the sale is in that instance valid, so also in the case in question:—contrary to where a seller joins a slave and a freeman in one declaration: because a freeman is not a fit subject of sale.—III. Where the seller opposes a particular price to each slave, but does not specify to which of them the condition of option relates.—IV. Where the seller specifies the slave to whom the condition of option relates, but does not oppose a specific price to each of them.—In both these cases the sale is invalid, because of the uncertainty of the subject of the sale in the one instance, and of the price in the other.

Option of determination.—If a person purchase one of two pieces of cloth for ten dirms, on the condition of his being at liberty for three days to determine on the particular piece which he may approve, such sale is valid; and the condition so stipulated is called an option of determination.*

It extends to a choice out of three, but not out of more.—A SALE is in the same manner valid, where a person purchases, with a reserve of option, one out of three pieces; but it is not lawful to purchase, in that manner, one out of four pieces.—What is here advanced proceeds upon a favourable construction.—Analogy would suggest that the sale is not lawful in either of these three cases, because the subject of sale is uncertain;—and such, also, is the opinion of Ziffer and Shafei.—The reason for a more favourable construction is, that optional conditions have been ordained for the benefit of man, in order that he may thereby be enabled to set aside the bad, and to choose the good for himself:—it is, moreover, evident that man stands in need of contracts of this nature, in order that he may be enabled to show the merchandise to some person in whose judgment he confides; or, if an agent be employed, that he may show it to his constituent; and this the seller would not permit him to do unless such a condition were stipulated.—This species of sale, therefore, being in effect the same as an optional one, it follows that it is in a similar manner lawful.—This necessity on the part of man, however, is fully answered by means of three pieces, as this number comprehends the three qualities of good, bad, and medium; and there can be no uncertainty with respect to the subject of the sale, in this species of contract, to occasion contention, as regard is had solely to the price on which the purchaser determines.

OBJECTION.—Why then is it not lawful with respect to four pieces, as in that case also no contention would take place?

REPLY.—Although, in this case also, there would be no uncertainty with regard to the subject of the sale, to occasion contention, still the efficient cause of the legality (namely, the necessity of MAN) does not here exist, and it is therefore unlawful.

An option of determination may involve a condition of option.—SOME have observed that, in a case of option of determination, a condition of option is also indispensable; and this is recorded in the Jama Sagheer. Others, again (following the Jama Kabeer), say that the condition of option is not requisite: and hence it is inferred that what has been recorded in the Jama Sagheer is that such a condition often takes place; not that it is absolutely necessary.

But the term for making the determination must not, at all events, exceed three days.—It is to be observed, however, that, if, in a sale stipulating an option of determination, it should not be thought necessary to insert a condition of option, the period for determining the choice must in that case, according to Haneefa, be limited to three days: but according to the two disciples it may be fixed to whatever period they please.

Of the articles referred to the purchaser's choice, one is the subject of the sale, and the others are as deposits.—It is also to be observed that in case of option of determination, the subject of the sale is one piece of cloth (for example), and the other piece is a deposit in the hands of the purchaser.* If, therefore, one of the pieces be lost or spoiled, the sale takes place with respect to it in exchange for the stipulated price; and the other price is as a deposit; because it is impossible to reject the piece which is lost or spoiled. If, on the other hand, both pieces be lost at the same time, the purchaser must in that case pay the half of the price of each, because the determination of purchase not having been made with respect to either of the pieces, it follows that sale and trust operate indefinitely with respect to each.

And both may be returned in case of a condition of option.—If, besides the option of determination, a conditional option be also

* Arab. Khiaar-al-tayeen.

* And consequently (according to the laws of deposit) he is responsible in case of accident, for one piece only.

stipulated, the purchaser is in that case at liberty to return both pieces.

The heir of the person endowed with an option of determination may return one of the two articles referred to the purchaser's option, in case of his death.—If a person possessing an option of determination should die, his heir is empowered to return one of the articles; for an option of determination (as has been before explained) necessarily descends to an heir, because of the implication of his property with that of another; whence he is not, in his option of determination, restricted to three days.—If, on the contrary, a person recently possessed of a power of option die, his heir has no option, as was before explained.*

Option is declared and the sale made binding by any act of the purchaser in relation to the article sold.—If a person purchase a house under a condition of option, and the adjoining house be afterwards sold before the expiration of the period of option, and the purchaser under the condition of option claim the right of Shaffa, in this case his assent to the first sale is thereby virtually given, and his right of option exists no longer;—because his claim of Shaffa presupposes him to be confirmed in the adjoining property, otherwise he would have no right to make such a claim; and it is therefore inferred, that he first tacitly annuls his condition of option, and then urges his claim. It is to be observed that the necessity of this explanation arises from the doctrine of Haneefa; for, by his tenets, a purchaser under a condition of option does not become proprietor of the article of sale during the interim of option. The two disciples hold, on the contrary, that he becomes immediate proprietor under the condition of option; whence this explanation is, with regard to their doctrine, unnecessary.

An option of determination, vested jointly in two persons, is determined by the subsequent consent of either to the purchase.—If two persons purchase a slave, on this condition, that both purchasers shall have the option of rejecting him, and one of them afterwards express his consent, the other cannot reject him, according to Haneefa. The two disciples allege that if the other choose, he may reject his share in the slave. The same disagreement subsists with respect to two purchasers in a case of option of inspection or option from defect. The argument of the two disciples is that as the power of rejection was vested in both the purchasers, it consequently operated in each of them; and the rejection of one cannot abrogate the right of option with respect to the other, as that would be a destruction of his right, which is not lawful. The argument of Haneefa is that the subject of the sale, when it issued from the tenure of the seller, was not injured by the defect of participation; but if one of the purchasers have the liberty of rejecting his portion singly, it necessarily follows that upon the rejection the seller holds the article in partnership with one of the purchasers; and this is a defect in the tenure, to which he was not before subject.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that the rejection of one of the purchasers is valid although attended with an injury to the seller, since the seller has himself virtually assented to it, because in giving such power to two persons, it is evident that he assents to a possible rejection by one of them.

REPLY.—The consent of the seller to the injury is inferred from a supposition of his having consented that one might reject where the power of rejection was given to two. This, however, is not the case in the present instance; for it is to be supposed that the seller understood that both should declare their rejection together; and on this supposition his consent was given, not on the other.

If an article purchased under one description prove to be of another description, the purchaser may either confirm or annul the contract.—If a person purchase a slave on account of his being a scribe, or a baker, and he prove to be neither of these, the purchaser is in that case at liberty either to abide by the bargain, or to undo it, as he pleases; because the descriptive quality being the object he had in view, and being specified as a condition in the contract, is therefore his right, and the want of it gives him the power of dissolution if he please, because his assent signified was on this condition, and not otherwise.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that the sale is in this case invalid, in the same manner as in the case of purchasing a male slave who afterwards proves to be a female.

REPLY.—The sale in the case quoted is invalid because of difference of sex, which does not exist in the case in question. Thus a person that is a baker or not a baker is of the same sex, and differs only in the quality: and hence the analogous application of the one case to the other is unfounded. It is to be observed, that a difference of the sex does not invalidate the sale, unless it defeat the purchaser's object. Thus the object in the purchase of a man (for instance) is different from that in the purchase of a woman, and therefore the sale is invalid in case of a difference: if, on the contrary, a man should purchase a he-goat on the supposition of its being a female, the sale would not be invalid, but it would remain with the purchaser to abide by it or not, as he pleases. It is to be observed, however, that, in the case in question, if the purchaser choose to abide by the bargain, he must pay the whole of the price; as no diminution is admitted on account of the defect of quality, which (as has been before explained) is of a dependant nature.

* Because a condition of option is not inheritable.

CHAPTER III.

OF OPTION OF INSPECTION.*

A purchaser may reject an article upon inspection after purchase.—If a person purchase an article without having seen it, the sale of such article is valid, and the purchaser after seeing it has the option of accepting or rejecting it as he pleases. Shafai maintains that a sale of this nature is wholly invalid, because of the uncertainty with regard to the object of it. The arguments of our doctors are,—FIRST, a saying of the prophet, that “whosoever purchases a thing without seeing it, has the liberty of rejection after sight of it. SECONDLY, the uncertainty with respect to the object cannot occasion litigation, since, if it be not agreeable, the purchaser is at liberty to reject it.

Although, before seeing it, he should have signified his satisfaction.—If a person, having purchased an article unseen, should say, “I am satisfied with it,” in this case also he is at liberty, after sight of it, to reject it if he please, for two reasons. FIRST, as the option of inspection (according to the tradition already quoted) rests entirely upon inspection, it follows that it becomes established by the inspection, whereas before that it was not established: and as the acquiescence signified previous to the inspection is not repugnant to this, it consequently remains established.

OBJECTION.—If the right of option do not exist previous to the actual sight of the article of sale, it would follow that the purchaser, before inspection, has not the power of annulling the contract;—whereas we find, on the contrary, that he is actually possessed of this power before inspection.

REPLY.—His right to dissolve the contract, previous to this inspection, proceeds from the contract not being then binding; and from any reference to the tradition above quoted.

SECONDLY, the purchaser’s acquiescence in the article before he attains an actual knowledge of its qualities, is perfectly nugatory; and hence no regard is paid to his acquiescence previously signified:—contrary to his rejection, which is regarded, because the contract has not as yet become binding.

A seller has no option of inspection after sale.—If a person sell a thing which he himself has not seen, he has no option of inspection;† because the tradition before cited limits this option entirely to the purchaser: moreover, it is related that Osman sold a piece of ground belonging to him at Basra to Tilha-Bin-Abeedoola; when a person said to Tilha, “you have been injured in this matter;” but he replied, “I possess the liberty of rejection, having purchased a thing unseen:—after which another said to

Osman, “You have been injured in this sale,” and he replied, “I have the liberty of retraction, having sold a thing which I had not seen:” upon which Mazim was appointed arbitrator between them; and he decreed that the right of option rested only with Tilha; and this decree was given in the presence of all the companions of the prophet, none of whom objected to it.

The option of inspection continues in force to any distance of time after the contract, unless destroyed by circumstances.—THE right of option of inspection is not, like an optional condition, confined to a particular period: on the contrary, it continues in force until something take place repugnant to the nature of it.—It is also to be observed that whatever circumstance occasions the annulment of an optional condition (such as a defect in the merchandise, or an exercise of right on the part of the purchaser), in the same manner occasions an annulment of the option of inspection.

Such as would have annulled a condition of option.—If, therefore, the exercise of right be such as cannot afterwards be retracted (such as the emancipation of a slave, or the creating him a Modabbir),—or, if it be such as to involve the rights of others (such as absolute sale, mortgage, or hire,)—the option of inspection is immediately annulled, whether the thing have been seen or not; because these acts render the sale binding, and the existence of the option is incompatible with the obligation of the sale. If, on the contrary, the exercise of right be not such as to involve the right of others (such as a sale with an optional condition, a simple tender to purchase, or a gift without delivery),—the option of inspection is not annulled previous to the actual sight of the article sold; because acts of this description are not of a stronger nature than the purchaser’s acquiescence; and as the purchaser’s express acquiescence to inspection is not the cause of annulling the option of inspection (as has been already demonstrated), it follows that the acts above described do not annul it, à fortiori:—whereas those acts after inspection annul the option of inspection, as they indicate an acquiescence, and an acquiescence after the sight of the thing occasions the annulment of the option.

Option of inspection is destroyed by the sight of a part of the article, where that suffices as a sample of the whole.—If a person should look at a heap of grain, or at the outward appearance of cloth which is folded up, or at the face of a female slave, or at the face and posteriors of an animal, and then make purchase of the same, he has no option of inspection. In short, it is a rule that the sight of all the parts of the merchandise is not a necessary condition, because it is often impracticable to obtain it, and therefore it is sufficient to view that part whence it may be known how far the object of the purchaser will be obtained. In the purchase, therefore, of articles of which the parts are similar

* Arab. Khiar-al-Rooyat.

† That is, he has no power of retraction, if, upon inspection of the article sold, he should happen to repent of the sale.

(such as articles sold by weight or measurement of capacity, and the mode of ascertaining the goodness of which is by presenting a sample to the purchaser) the sight of a part is sufficient; that is, no option of inspection can afterwards be claimed unless the other parts of the article should prove inferior to the part which has been seen. In the purchase, on the other hand, of things of which the individuals are not similar (such as cloths or animals), the sight of one does not suffice;—on the contrary, the purchaser must see each individual article. Of this kind are eggs and walnuts, according to Koorokheec. (The compiler of this work observes, however, that these are of the nature of wheat and barley, since their individuals are nearly alike.)—Now such being the established rule, it follows that the sight of a heap of wheat is sufficient, as the quality of what is hidden may be inferred from what is seen, wheat being an article sold by measurement of capacity, and the quality of which may consequently be ascertained by means of a sample: and in the same manner, the sight of the outside of a piece of cloth suffices, unless there be a particular part within the folds necessary to be known, such as (in stamped cloths) the pattern, in which case the option of inspection is not annulled until the purchaser see the inside of the piece. In the case of a man,* on the other hand, a sight of the face is sufficient; and in animals a sight of the face and posteriors.—Some allege that in animals a sight of the fore and hinder legs is necessary. What was first related is on the authority of Abou Yoosaf. In goats purchased on account of their flesh it is necessary to squeeze and press the flesh in the hands, as that ascertains the goodness of it. But if purchased for breed, or for giving milk, it is necessary to look at their dugs. In purchasing victuals ready dressed, it is necessary to taste them, to ascertain their goodness.

Option of inspection in the purchase of a house.—If a person look at the front of a house, and then purchase it, he has no option of inspection, although he should not have seen the apartments:—and so also, if a person view the back parts of a house, or the trees of a garden from without. Ziffer has said that it is requisite that the purchaser inspect the apartments of the house. Our author also remarks that what is here advanced with respect to a sight of the front or back part of a house being sufficient, is founded on the customs of former times, when, all their buildings being of a uniform nature, the sight of the front or back parts sufficed to ascertain the interior parts; but that in the present time it is very necessary to enter in, as buildings are in these days variously constructed, whence a view of the outside is no standard by which to judge of the inside; and this is approved.

An agent for seisin may inspect in the same manner as the purchaser.—THE inspection of an agent appointed to take possession of an article purchased is equivalent to the inspection of the purchaser, and consequently, after the inspection of such agent, the purchaser has no power of rejecting the article purchased, unless in a case of a defect. The inspection, however, of a messenger on the part of the purchaser is not equivalent to his own inspection. This is the doctrine of Hancefa. The two disciples hold that an agent and a messenger are in effect the same (that is, the inspection of neither is equivalent to that of the purchaser, and consequently, that the purchaser has afterwards the liberty of rejection in both instances. The argument they adduce in support of their opinion is, that as the constituent has appointed the agent merely to take possession, and not to annul his option, it follows that such annulment does not belong to him;—in the same manner as holds with respect to option from defect; in other words, if an agent should knowingly take possession of a defective article, the option of the purchaser is not thereby annulled;—and in the same manner, also, as holds with respect to a condition of option; that is, if a person should purchase any article, with a reserve of option, and his agent, in the interval, take possession of the article, the purchaser's right of option is not annulled;—and in the same manner also, as holds in the wilful annulment of an option of inspection; as if an agent should take possession of an article concealed, and after inspection expressly declare the option to be null; in which case the purchaser's right of option would nevertheless still continue in force.—Hancefa, on the other hand, argues that seisin, or the act of taking possession, is of two kinds.—I. Perfect, which is the seisin of the article with sight and knowledge. II. Imperfect, which is the seisin of it without sight, that is, whilst it is concealed. The first is termed perfect, and the second imperfect, because the completeness of seisin depends upon the completeness of the bargain,* which cannot be complete whilst an option of inspection remains; and as, in the former instance, this option has been done away, it follows that the bargain is in that instance complete and perfect; but as, in the latter instance, on the contrary, it still continues in force, it follows that the bargain is in that instance imperfect.—Now as the constituent is empowered to take possession in either of these modes, it follows that the agent is equally empowered, since his constituent has appointed him, in an absolute manner, his agent for seisin. Where, however, an agent takes possession of an article without seeing it, his power is terminated by such imperfect seisin, and he consequently cannot afterwards exert an option of inspection.

* Meaning a slave set up to sale.

*Arab. Safka, literally, the act of striking hands, in making a bargain.

tion so as to destroy that privilege on the part of his constituent by any express declaration. It is otherwise in the case of an option from defect, because, as that is no bar to the completeness of the bargain, the seisin is in that instance perfect, notwithstanding the continuance of the option of defect.—Concerning the case of condition of option there is a difference of opinion.—Admitting, however, that the agent has not the power of annulling such option, it is because the constituent himself is not in this case empowered to make a perfect seisin, in as much as the object of such conditional option is experience and trial, which can only be acquired after seisin; and as the constituent himself is not empowered to make a perfect seisin, it follows that his agent cannot be so.—With respect to a messenger, he possesses no power, being barely commissioned to deliver a message, and cannot therefore be capable of taking formal possession of any thing.

The inspection of a blind person may be made by touch, smell, or taste.—SALE or purchase, made by a blind person, is valid: and after purchase, he has still an option, as having purchased an article without seeing it; which option is determined by the touch of the article, provided it be of such a nature that the touch may lead to a knowledge of it; or by the smell, if it be of a nature to be known by the smell; or by the taste, if the article be of an esculent nature;—in the same manner as all these modes determine the option of a person possessed of sight.

Or (in a purchase of land) by description.

—THE option of a blind person, in the purchase of land, is not determined until a description of the qualities of it be given to him: because such a description is equivalent to a sight of the object, as in the case of Sillim sales.—It is recorded from Aboo Yoosaf, that if a blind person, in purchasing land, should stand on a spot whence, if he possessed his sight, he might inspect the whole, and should then declare, “I am content with this ground which I have purchased,” the right of option is annulled; because the standing on the spot in this manner is analogous to the actual view of it; and the semblance is equivalent to the reality where the reality is unattainable; as in the case of a dumb person, the motion of whose lips is deemed equivalent to the reading of the Koran; or, as in the case of a bald person, with respect to whom the motion of the razor to and fro over his head is deemed equivalent (in case of his making a pilgrimage to Mecca) to actual shaving.—Hoosn-Bin-Zeeyad has said that a blind person must appoint an agent for seisin, who may inspect and take possession of the article on his behalf; and this is conformable to the doctrine of Haneefa, who is of opinion (as has been already explained) that the inspection of an agent is equivalent to that of his constituent.

A sight of one of two articles, such as do not admit of samples, still leaves a power of rejecting both.—If a person, having seen one of two garments, should purchase both, and should afterwards see the other, he has then the option of rejecting both; because, as garments differ essentially from one another, a sight of one is not equivalent to a sight of both; and therefore his right of option remains with respect to the one he had not seen. He has it not in his power, however, to reject that one singly; for in such case an alteration in the bargain would take place before the completion of it,* as a bargain is not complete whilst an option of inspection remains; and hence it is that the purchaser may reject the article, independent of an order from the Kazeer, or the consent of the seller; and such rejection is a dissolution of the sale from the beginning,—in other words, it becomes the same as if the contract had never existed.

The option is destroyed by the decease of the person with whom it rested.—If a person possessing the option of inspection should die, the option in such case becomes null; for (according to our doctors) it is not a hereditament, as has already been explained in treating of optional conditions.

Cases of inspection previous to purchase.—

If a person, having once seen an article, should afterwards, at a distant period, purchase it, and the article, at the time of purchase, exist in the form and description in which he first saw it, he has not in this case any option, because he is possessed of a knowledge of the qualities from his former inspection; and an option is allowed only in defect of such knowledge.—If, however, the purchaser should not recognize or know it to be the same article, he has in that case an option; because under such circumstances his consent cannot be implied; or if, on the other hand, the nature of the article be changed, he has an option; because the qualities being changed, it becomes in fact the same as if he had never seen it.

If a purchaser and seller dispute concerning any recent † change in the nature of the

* A contract of sale, when settled by the parties, does not become complete until the execution of it; yet it cannot admit of any alteration of the terms of it in the interval. Thus, if two bushels of wheat be sold for two dirms, and the parties, before the execution of the contract, mutually agree to reduce the sale to one bushel for one dirm, this agreement, as being an alteration of the terms previous to their fulfilment, would be unlawful. In short, it is requisite, in this instance, either that the parties previously dissolve the first contract, and then enter into a new contract of sale of one bushel for one dirm; or that they formally complete the first contract by mutual seisin, and that the purchaser then sell one of the bushels to the seller for one dirm.

† Arab. Hadis [or Hadith], meaning, supervenient upon the contract.

article,—the purchaser asserting this circumstance, and the seller denying it,—in this case the allegation of the seller, confirmed by an oath, must be credited ; because the interval between the sight and the purchase being short, the probability is in favour of the assertion of the seller, that such change did not happen till after the purchase had taken place. If, however, a long period should intervene between the sight and the purchase, our doctors are in this case of opinion that the allegation of the purchaser is to be credited ; because, as it is the nature of everything to decay in course of time, it follows that his assertion is supported by probability.

If the parties dispute concerning the period when the article was inspected, the seller asserting that the purchaser had first seen and then purchased the article, and the purchaser denying this,—in that case the allegation of the purchaser, upon oath, is to be credited.

A person, after disposing of a part of his purchase, has no option with respect to the remainder.—If a person purchase a bundle of clothes of a Zoota* without seeing them, and afterwards sell or give away part of them ; in this case he has not the power of rejecting any of those that remain unless they should prove defective. In the same manner, if he purchase a bundle of clothes of a Zoota, stipulating a condition of option, and afterwards sell or bestow in gift part of them, his right of option is annulled ; because it is not in his power to reject what he has no longer any property in ; if, therefore, he were to reject the remainder, it would induce a deviation from the bargain before the completion of it (for the existence of an option of inspection, or of a condition of option, is a bar to the completeness of the bargain). It is otherwise in an option from defect ; as the bargain, notwithstanding the existence of such option, is completed upon seizing the article sold, although it be not complete before seisin ;—but the present case proceeds on the supposition of possession having been taken. If, however, the supervenient deeds of sale or gift, on the part of the purchaser, be rendered null (as if the secondary purchaser should undo the bargain on account of the discovery of a defect,—or, as if the purchaser himself should recede from his gift), in this case the option of inspection still remains.—This is from Shimsh-al-Ayma. It is related, as an opinion of Abou Yooasaf, that an option of inspection once annulled cannot again revive, any more than a conditional option ; and Kadoore has adopted this doctrine.

* A tribe of black Arabs.—“Zoot.—A tribe of Arabs who formerly inhabited the fenny region lying between Wadis and Basra ; they were defeated and reduced to servitude by Mootasim, the eighth Khalif.”—(Dr Herbelot.)

CHAPTER IV.

OF OPTION FROM DEFECT.

A purchaser discovering a defect in the article purchased, is at liberty to return it to the seller.—If a person purchase and take possession of an article, and should afterwards discover it to have been defective at the time of sale, it is at his option either to take it for the full price, or to reject it : because one requisite, in an unconditional contract [of sale], is that the subject of it be free from defect ;—when, therefore, it proves otherwise, the purchaser has no option ; for if the contract were obligatory upon him, without his will, it would be injurious to him. He is not, however, at liberty to retain the article, and exact a compensation, on account of the defect, from the seller ; because, in a contract of sale, no part of the price is opposed to the quality of the article ;—and also, because the seller does not consent to be divested of the property for a less price than that which he stipulates :—if, therefore, the purchaser were to retain the defective article, and exact a compensation from the seller on account of the defect, it would be injurious to the latter :—but it is possible to obviate the injury to the purchaser without entailing an injury on the seller, by permitting him either to retain the article, if he approve of it with the defect, or to reject it.

Unless he was aware of the defect beforehand.—If, however, the purchaser, at the time of sale, or of taking possession, be aware of the defect, and nevertheless knowingly and wilfully make the purchase, or take possession, no option remains to him ; because when he thus purchases or takes possession of the article, it is evident that he assents to the defect.

Whatever tends to depreciate an article is a defect.—WHATEVER may be a cause of diminishing the price amongst merchants is considered as a defect ; because injury is occasioned by deficiency in point of value ; and deficiency in point of value occasions deficiency in price ; and the mode of ascertaining this is by consulting merchants who are practised in estimating the value of articles.

Defects incident to children affect the sale of a slave during infancy, but not after maturity.—A DISPOSITION to abscond, or to make urine upon carpets, or to commit theft, are defects in children during their nonage, but not after they attain to the age of maturity. If, therefore, any of these defects appear in an infant slave during childhood whilst in the hands of the seller, and afterwards appear in him during childhood whilst in the hands of the purchaser, he [the purchaser] is in that case at liberty to return him to the seller, in virtue of option from defect ; because this is the same defect that existed whilst in the possession of the seller. If, on the other hand, any of these defects should occur in him, in the purchaser's hands, after he attains to maturity, the purchaser is not at liberty to return him by option from defect; because this defect is different from that which appeared during childhood in the hands of the seller, since these effects proceed from different causes in the periods of childhood and maturity; for the making of urine upon a carpet (for instance) during the time of childhood, is owing to a weakness in the bladder,—whereas, after maturity, it arises from a disease in the interior parts; and, in the same manner the running away of a child is from a desire of play; and the commission of theft from thoughtlessness; but these, where they occur after maturity, are the effect of innate wickedness. By a child is here meant one in its perfect senses; for a child not in its perfect senses is incapable of running away; whence it is that the term used in that case is lost or strayed, not absconded:—the running away, therefore, of such a one is not a defect.

Lunacy operates as a perpetual defect, provided it ever occur after the sale.—MADNESS during infancy operates as a perpetual defect;—in other words, if an infant slave be subject to lunacy in the hands of the seller, and the lunacy recur whilst in the hands of the purchaser, whether during childhood or after maturity, the purchaser is at liberty to return him to the seller; because this madness is in effect the same as had originally existed whilst the slave was yet in the seller's hands, as being occasioned by the same cause, namely, an internal malady.—It is not, however, to be understood (as some have imagined) that the return of the madness is not required as a condition to enable the purchaser to dissolve the bargain; for God Almighty, as being all powerful, may remove the madness, although that seldom happen. Hence it is necessary that the madness return, to enable the purchaser to dissolve the bargain: for, unless it actually return, he has not this privilege.

Defects which operate in the sale of female slaves, but not of males.—A BAD smell, from the breath or armpits, is a defect in regard to female slaves, because in many instances the object is to sleep with them; and the existence of such defects is a bar to the accomplishment of that object.—These, however, are not defects with regard to male slaves; because the object, in purchasing them, is merely to use their services: and to this these defects are not obstacles, since it is possible for a slave to serve his master without the necessity of the master's sitting down with him, so as to receive annoyance from these defects.—If, however, they proceed from disease, they are considered as defects with regard to male slaves also.

WHOREDOM and bastardy are defects with regard to a female slave, but not with regard to a male; because the object, in the purchase of a female slave, is cohabitation and the generation of children, which must be affected by either of the above circumstances; whereas, the object in the purchase of a male slave is the use of his services, the value of which is not depreciated by his committing whoredom.—If, however, a male slave be much addicted to whoredom, our lawyers are of opinion that it is a defect, because in the pursuit of women he neglects the service of his master.

Infidelity is a defect in both male and female slaves.—INFIDELITY is a defect in both a male and female slave;* because the disposition of a Mussulman is averse to the society of infidels; and also, because as, in the expiation of murder, the emancipation of an infidel slave does not suffice, it follows that the possession of such a slave is not what is desired, since a part of the object is thus defeated. If, on the contrary, a person should purchase a slave, on condition of his being an infidel, and he afterwards prove a Mussulman, the purchaser has no power of dissolving the bargain, since the exemption from infidelity is no defect.

Constitutional infirmities are defects in a female slave.—A TOTAL suppression of the courses, or an excessive evacuation of them, are defects with respect to a female slave, as they proceed from internal maladies. It is to be observed, however, that the want of the courses is not considered as a defect until the extreme period of maturity be elapsed, which in females (according to Haneefa) is seventeen years; and this knowledge must be had from the information of the slave herself.—If, therefore, a person purchase a female slave arrived at full maturity (that is, seventeen years of age), and learn from herself that her courses have not appeared, he is then entitled to return her to the seller before taking possession; and even after taking possession, provided the seller simply deny the circumstance, and refuse to confirm it with an oath. If, however, the seller deny the circumstance upon oath, the purchaser is not entitled to return her.

A purchaser is entitled to compensation for a defect in an article where it has sustained a further blemish in his hands; but he cannot, in this case, return it to the seller.—If an article, after being sold, should receive a blemish in the hands of the purchaser, and the purchaser should afterwards learn that it had also a blemish at the time of sale, he is, in that case, entitled to receive from the seller a compensation for the defect; but he is not permitted to return it to him, as that would be attended with an injury to the seller, since it would necessitate him to receive again into his property a thing with two blemishes which, in issuing from him, had only one. As, therefore, the return of the article is in this case impracticable, and melons, cucumbers, walnuts, or the like, and after opening them discover them to be of bad quality; in that case, if they be altogether unfit for use, the purchaser is entitled to complete restitution of the price from the seller, as the sale is invalid, because of the subject of it not being in reality property. If, on the other hand, notwithstanding their badness, they be still fit for use, the purchaser is not entitled to return them to the seller, because the opening of them is an additional defect of his own creation: he is, however, entitled to a compensation for the defect; as by this means the injury he would otherwise sustain is remedied to the greatest possible extent. Shafei has said, that he is entitled to return them after opening them; because that is the exercise of a power committed to him by the seller. In reply to this our doctors argue, that the seller has empowered him to open them in virtue of his becoming the proprietor. Hence the case is the same as where a person purchases a garment, and, having cut it, discovers a defect in it; in which case the purchaser is not entitled to return the garment upon the seller's hands, although he [the seller] had authorized him to cut it down. In short, if the articles prove defective only in a small part, the sale is valid, upon a favourable construction, because it is incident to walnuts, and such other articles, to be bad in a small part (by a small part is meant what is commonly the case, such as one or two in a hundred); but if, on the other hand, a great part prove bad, the sale is invalid, and the purchaser is entitled to a complete restitution of the purchase money; because in this case the seller has united together entities and non-entities with regard to value; and the case is therefore the same as if a person were to sell together freemen and slaves.

Case of a purchaser selling what he has purchased, which is afterwards returned to him in consequence of a defect.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should sell him to another, and that other return the slave to him on discovering him to be defective, and he agree to receive him back, on the Kaze's issuing a decree to that effect, founded on the proof of the defect by witnesses, or on the refusal of the first purchaser to confirm his denial upon oath, in that case the first purchaser is entitled to return the slave to the seller; because, although it be not lawful for a purchaser, after the sale of the article on his part, to return it to the seller, still, in this case, the second sale having been annulled by the Kaze, it becomes the same as if no such sale had ever existed.

OBJECTION.—As the first purchaser denied the defect, and obliged the second purchaser to establish the fact by witnesses, it would appear that he is not entitled to return the slave; because, if he ground his right on the defect, he is guilty of prevarication, since he first denies the defect, and then asserts it.

REPLY.—The disproof of the denial by the Kaze's decree, founded on the proof of the fact by witnesses, renders such denial of no validity in law; hence the apparent contrariety of his denial and assertion is reconciled, and as the first sale continues in force, and the defect is at the same time proved, it follows that he is entitled to return the slave to the seller. If, therefore, he choose to return him, it is a valid rejection; but if he should rather choose to keep him, the sale continues in force. It is otherwise where an agent for sale disposes of an article, and the purchaser returns it to the agent in consequence of a defect: for this is in reality a return to the constituent; and the agent is not required to return the article to his constituent, because, in this case, there is only one sale, whereas in the case in question there are two, whence the dissolution of the second sale does not dissolve the first. In short, if the second purchaser, on the discovery of a defect, return the slave, and the first purchaser receive him back, in consequence of a decree of the Kaze, he [the first purchaser] is in that case entitled to return him to the original seller. If, on the other hand, the first purchaser agree to receive him back without a decree of the Kaze, he in that case is not entitled to return him to the original seller, because, although the second sale be annulled with regard to himself and the second purchaser, still it is equivalent to a sale de novo with regard to all other persons; and the original seller is another person.—It is recorded, in the Jama Sagheer, that when the subject of the sale is returned to the first purchaser, without a decree of the Kaze, on account of such a defect as very rarely happens (such as an additional finger, for instance), the first purchaser has not the power of returning it to the original seller; and this (as our author remarks) is a direct proof that the effect is the same in both cases; that is, whether the defect be of such a nature as may have recently happened, or such as never recently happens. In some traditions it is mentioned, that in the latter case the purchaser may return the subject of sale to the original seller, as there is then a certainty that such defect did exist whilst in the hands of the original seller.

Conduct to be observed by the magistrate, in case of a purchaser, after taking possession, alleging a defect in the article.—If a person purchase a slave, and take possession of him, and then assert a defect in him, the Kaze in such case must not enforce the payment of the price on the part of the purchaser until he shall have investigated his assertion, either by the declaration of the seller, upon oath, that the slave had no defect, or by the proof of the fact on the part of the purchaser by witnesses. The suspension of the Kaze's decree with regard to the payment of the price is requisite, lest such decree should be rendered vain and useless by the subsequent proof of the defect; and also, because the tenor of such decree is that the purchaser shall pay the complete price in fulfilment of the specific claim of the seller,—whereas the purchaser, by asserting a defect, denies the obligation on him to pay the complete price. The Kazee, therefore, must first proceed to examine into the circumstance of the defect; and if the purchaser should say that his witnesses are in Syria,* he must then exact from the seller his denial upon oath. If the seller should take the oath accordingly, the Kazee must then decree the payment of the price; because in suspending the price till the arrival of the witnesses, an injury would result to the seller; and the immediate enforcement of the payment does not in so great a degree injure the purchaser, because after the return of the witnesses from Syria, if he should establish his proof, the purchase money will be returned to him on his returning the slave to the seller. If, however, the seller should refuse to take an oath in support of his denial, the assertion of the purchaser is then established, as such refusal is an argument in favour of the existence of the defect.

Case of a purchaser alleging the existence of a defective property before he had made the purchase; and the forms of deposition to be required of the seller in this instance.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should afterwards assert that “he had run away from him, and had also run away whilst in the possession of the seller,” and the seller offer to take an oath that “he had never run away from him” [the purchaser], the Kazee must in that case refuse to receive his deposition, until the purchaser first prove by witnesses that “he had run away from him” [the seller], after which the Kazee must tender an oath to the seller to this purport, “by God, I have sold the said slave and delivered him to the purchaser, and he never ran away whilst he belonged to me” (as is mentioned by Mohammed in the Jama); or to this purport, “by God, the purchaser has no right to return to me such slave, on account of the defect which he asserts;” or in this manner, “by God, such slave never ran away whilst he belonged to me.” He must not, however, tender an oath to him to this purport, “by God, I sold the said slave at a period when he had not the said defect:” nor in this manner, “by God, I sold the said slave and delivered him to the purchaser at a period when he had not the said defect;” because, in taking such oaths, the meaning of the seller may be, that “although he had such a defect formerly, yet he had it not at the identical period of sale or delivery;” and thus, without any deviation from truth, he may defraud the purchaser of his right. If the purchaser should not be able to prove, by witnesses, that the slave had run away from him [the purchaser], the oath, in that case also (according to the two disciples), must be tendered to the seller. Our modern doctors have differed concerning the opinion of Haneefa upon this point; as some of them say that, according to him, an oath is not to be administered to the seller in this instance. The argument of the two disciples is, that as the assertion of the plaintiff is worthy of regard, and such as would be attended to in case of its being proved by witnesses, it follows that in default of such witnesses the seller must be required to deny the assertion upon oath. The reasoning of Haneefa (as recorded by those who have said that, according to him, an oath is not to be administered to the seller) is that the form of swearing a defendant has been ordained by the LAW for the purpose of removing any litigation that may happen to arise,—not for the purpose of exciting litigation. Now, in the present case, the exaction of an oath from the seller will only give birth to a new litigation: because, in case he should refuse to take it, and the proof of the fact be thence established, it will become a new subject of contention whether the said defect did exist or not during his being in the seller's possession, and there will be a necessity for tendering to him another oath, upon this point, for the purpose of removing this fresh cause of dispute.

If a person purchase a female slave, and having received her from the seller, should, on the discovery of a defect, desire to return her, and the seller assert that “he had sold two female slaves to the purchaser of which he only produced one,” and the purchaser maintain, on the other hand, that “he had only sold one,”—in that case the declaration of the purchaser, upon oath, is to be credited; for, as the disagreement here relates to the quantity taken possession of, the person who took possession must be credited, as being the most competent judge;—in the same manner as holds in a case of usurpation;—that is, if the person whose property is usurped assert the usurpation of a particular quantity, and the usurper deny the quantity, his declaration upon oath is to be credited; and so also in the case in question. If, on the other hand, the purchaser and seller agree in the extent of the sale, but differ with respect to that of the seisin (as if both should allow the two female slaves to have been the subject of the sale,—the seller asserting that “the purchaser had received both,” and the purchaser, on the other hand, maintaining that “he had only received one”)—in that case also the declaration of the purchaser, upon oath, is to be credited, for the reason already explained.

Case of a person purchasing two slaves, one of whom proves defective.—If a person purchase two slaves by one contract, and take possession of one, and then discover the other to be defective, he is not in that case permitted to retain the one he had the possession of the first seller, and of which the different purchasers were not apprised at the period of concluding their respective contracts,—in that case, according to Haneefa, the last purchaser has a right to return him for a full retribution of the price to the person from whom he bought him; and he again is entitled to return him, on the same condition, to the person from whom he bought him; and in this manner the return may be made through the different gradations of purchasers to their immediate sellers, until at length the slave be returned to the seller in whose hands he committed the theft;—in the same manner as in a case of claim of right; for the existence of a cause of amputation is (according to Haneefa) equivalent to a claim of right, as was before explained. According to the two disciples, on the other hand, the last purchaser is entitled to a compensation from the immediate seller; but he again is not entitled to any compensation from his immediate seller; in the same manner as in a case of defect; for the existence of a cause of amputation is (according to them) equivalent to a defect, as was before explained.—(It is to be observed that the mention of the purchaser being ignorant of the theft committed by the slave is insisted on in the two preceding examples, on account of the particular tenets of the two disciples; for as, in their opinion, the existence of a cause of mutilation is equivalent to a defect, it follows that if the purchaser had previous knowledge of the existence of such cause, he would appear to have acquiesced in the defect, and consequently have relinquished any right to a compensation. As Haneefa, on the contrary, holds the existence of a cause of mutilation to be equivalent to a claim of right; and as the knowledge or ignorance of this circumstance makes no difference with respect to the purchaser, it follows that such specification, with regard to his tenets, is perfectly immaterial.)

Where the purchaser grants the seller an exemption from defects, he cannot afterwards return the article, whatever the defects in it may be.—If a person should sell a slave, stipulating an exemption to himself of all responsibility for his defects, as if he should say, “I have sold this slave with all his defects,”—in that case, if the purchaser acquiesces in such condition, and exempt him from any responsibility, he is not afterwards permitted to return him to the seller on account of any defect, notwithstanding the condition of the seller may have been general, that is, without specifying the particular names of the defects from the responsibility of which he exempted himself.—Shafei is of opinion that such exemption is not valid, unless the name of every defect to which it refers be specified;—for it is a rule, with him, that exemption from undefined claims is invalid; because exemption has some of the properties of investiture (whence it is that it may be rejected), and investiture of an undefined nature is invalid. The argument of our doctors is that the grant of such exemption is in fact a voluntary surrender of one's own right, the uncertainty with respect to which can be no cause of contention, since delivery is not requisite. It is to be observed that Abou Yoosaf is of opinion that the exemption, in this case, includes all defects actually existing at the time of sale, and also all which may happen in the interval between that and their delivery. Mohammed and Ziffer, on the contrary, are of opinion that the defect which may happen in the interval ought not to be included. The argument of Abou Yoosaf is that the probable object of such surrender on the part of the purchaser is to render the sale binding and conclusive, which would not be the case unless the defects that may happen in the interval between the sale and the seisin were also included.

CHAPTER V.

OF INVALID, NULL, AND * ABOMINABLE SALES.

A SALE is INVALID where it is lawful with respect of its ESSENCE, but not with respect of its QUALITY; and NULL, where the subject is not of an appreciable nature; and the terms INVALID and NULL, are often indiscriminately used.—An ABOMINABLE sale is such as is lawful both in its ESSENCE and QUALITY, but attended with some circumstance of ABOMINATION.

Distinctions between a null and an invalid sale.—A SALE in exchange for carrion, blood, or the person of a freeman, is null, because none of these cases bears the characteristic of sale (namely, an exchange of property for property), since these articles do not constitute property with any person. A sale in exchange for wine or pork (on the other hand) is merely invalid; because the characteristic of sale does exist in these instances, as these articles are considered as property with some descriptions of people, such as Christians and Jews; but they do not constitute property with Mussulmans, and a contract comprehending these articles is therefore invalid.

* The word in the original is Makrooh, which the translator (following its literal and common acceptation) has rendered abominable. The term, however, in this work, is not to be understood in the ill sense in which it is generally employed in the English language; the cases to which it relates being such as are in every respect legal, but which being attended with circumstances of impropriety, an abstinence from them is recommended.

The property purchased under a null sale is merely a trust in the purchaser's hands.—

IN a sale that is null, the purchaser is not empowered to perform any act with respect to the subject of the sale, but it remains as a trust in his hands, according to some of our modern doctors; because, as the contract of sale, in such an instance, is totally disregarded, there remains only the seisin of the purchaser with the consent of the seller: and accordingly, if the article were to perish in the purchaser's hands, in this instance, he is not responsible for it. Others are of opinion that the subject of the sale, in this case, is not a deposit, but that the purchaser is not responsible for it (in other words, if it perish in the purchaser's hands, he is answerable);—because the article is as much in his possession, in this instance, as an article detained in a person's hands with an intention of purchase, and for which he is responsible. Some allege that Haneefa is of the first opinion, and the two disciples of the second. The reasons for this difference of doctrine will be explained in treating of the decease of an Am-Walid or Modabbir, in the hands of a purchaser.

But that purchased under an invalid sale becomes his property.—IN a case of invalid sale, the purchaser becomes proprietor of the article upon taking possession of it; and is responsible for it [if it be lost in his hands] Shafei is of a different opinion, as will be hereafter explained.

THE sale of carrion, blood, or the person of a freeman, is null, in the same manner as a sale in return for those articles is null; because, as those articles do not constitute property, they are unsaleable.

A sale of forbidden things, if for money, is null; but if in the way of barter, is invalid.—A SALE of wine or pork, if in return for money, is null; and if in return for any other article (as cloth, for instance), it is invalid,—whence it is that the seller of pork or wine for cloth, becomes the proprietor of such cloth, although the actual pork or wine do not become the property of the purchaser. The distinction in these cases is, that wine and pork are held by Zimmecs to be property, whereas Mussulmans consider them as articles from which no use can be derived, because the LAW has commanded the contempt of them, and prohibited all regard to them among Mussulmans. Now, a Mussulman's purchasing either of these for specie implies a regard to them, because it is not money (which constitutes the price) that is the object of the sale, as it is merely the instrument of acquiring the object; for in fact it is only the wine or pork that is the object, and as these articles are not appreciable with respect to Mussulmans, it follows that the sale of them is null. It is otherwise if a Mussulman purchase cloth for pork or wine because that can admit of no other construction than that he regards the cloth as the object of the transaction, considering the pork or the wine only as the means of attaining such object, and not (as in the other case) as the object itself. The specification of the pork or wine, therefore, is regarded merely that the purchaser may become the proprietor of the cloth, and not in order that the seller may become proprietor of the wine or pork; and hence the mention of those articles is invalid, and the payment of the price of the cloth, and not the delivery of the flesh or liquor, is incumbent on the purchaser (and so also, where a person sells wine or pork for cloth);—for, as cloth is a saleable article, the cloth must, in this instance, be considered as the subject of the sale; for which reason this is an invalid and not a null sale; because where, in a contract of sale, the subject on both sides consists of something else than money, either may with equal propriety be considered as the subject of the sale. (This species of sale is termed a Beeya Mookayeza, or barter.)

The sale of a Modabbir, an Am-Walid, or a Mokatib is null.—THE sale of an Am-Walid, a Modabbir, or Mokatib, is null;—because an Am-Walid has a claim to freedom, as the prophet has said, "Her child hath set her free" (that is, her child is a cause of freedom to her);—and the cause of freedom, with respect to a Modabbir, is not established upon the decease of his owner, but must be considered as actually extant in him at present, as the owner is incapable of emancipating him after his decease;—and a Mokatib, on the other hand, is possessed of his own person as a right established in him, and binding upon his owner, insomuch that the owner cannot of himself break or infringe upon it:—if, therefore, the sale of any of these were valid, that which is established in them would be rendered null;—hence the sale of them is null.—Respecting a case where a Mokatib himself acquiesces in being sold, there are two opinions recorded. According to the Zahir Rawayet, the sale in such case is valid. It is to be observed that by a Modabbir is here meant such as is absolutely so, and not one whose condition of freedom is restricted to the non-recovery of his master from the illness under which he laboured at the time of granting the tadbeer.

And the purchaser is not responsible if they die in his hands.—IF, after the sale of an Am-Walid or Modabbir, and the seisin of the purchaser, one or other should die, in this case, according to Haneefa, the purchaser is not responsible.* According to the two disciples he is responsible for the value (and there is one tradition which reports that Haneefa coincides with them on this point).—The reasoning of the two disciples is, that as the purchaser took possession of the Modabbir or Am-Walid in virtue of a sale, he is therefore responsible for the loss; in the same manner as for the loss of any other property after purchase and seisin;—

reason, that an Am-Walid or Modabbir may be included* in a contract of sale; whence it is that any article united with them in a contract of sale becomes the actual property of the purchaser. It is otherwise with respect to a Mokatib, as the purchaser is not responsible for the loss of him, because, being possessed of his own person, the purchaser's seisin of him is not fully established; and the responsibility attaches in virtue of the seisin. The argument of Haneefa is, that actual sale cannot operate with respect to what is not in reality a fit subject of it; and as a Modabbir or Am-Walid are not in reality fit subjects of sale, they are therefore considered in the same light with a Mokatib. In reply to what the two disciples urge it may be observed, that an Am-Walid or Modabbir are not included in a sale for the sake of their persons, but only in order that the effect of sale may be established with respect to such articles as may have been united with them in the contract; in the same manner as where property of the purchaser happens to be involved in the contract;—in other words, if a person purchase two slaves by one contract, and one of those slaves happens to be his property, such slave is nevertheless included in the contract,—not indeed for the sake of his person, but merely in order that the effect of the sale may extend to the other slave, who is united with him in it.

The sale is null of fish in the water.—THE sale of fish which is not yet caught is null, as it is not in the state property.—In the same manner also, the sale of a fish which the vender may have caught, and afterwards thrown into a large fountain from which it cannot be taken without difficulty, is null, because there the delivery is impracticable. (It is lawful, however, in case the fountain be so small as to admit its being caught with ease.)—If fish should of themselves come into a fountain without the proprietor's having taken any means, by the erection of a dam, or the like, to prevent their egress, they are not considered as property, and the sale of them is therefore null.

Or of a bird in the air.—THE sale of a bird in the air, or of one which after having been caught is again set at liberty, is null; because in the one case it is not property, and in the other the delivery is rendered impracticable.

Or of a fetus in the womb (or its offspring).—THE sale of a fetus in the womb, or of the offspring of that fetus, is null; because the prophet has prohibited it; and also, because there is a probability of fraud, from there being a want of certainty in the case.

Or of milk in the udder.—THE sale of milk in the udder is null; because there is a possibility of fraud, in the udder's being perhaps void of milk, and full of wind; or, because there might arise a contention with respect to the mode of extracting the milk; or because it might happen that the udder contained more milk at the time of extracting it than at the time of sale; and hence there might be implicated in the sale something not properly the subject of it.

Or of hair (or wool) upon an animal.—THE sale of wool or hair growing upon an animal is null; because, whilst joined to the animal, it is considered as a constituent part of it; and also, because it cannot be exactly cut away from the animal, without either leaving a part of it or taking away part of the skin, since it is not practicable to pull it out. It is, moreover, recorded in the Nakl Saheeh, that “the prophet prohibited the sale of wool upon the animal, of milk in the udder, and of butter in the milk.”* It is recorded of Abou Yooosaf, that he admitted the legality of the sale of growing wool: but to this the above tradition is an answer.

The sale is invalid of any article which cannot be separated from its situation without injury.—IT is not lawful to sell a piece of wood sustaining a weight, such as a pillar or a beam, although the piece of wood be specified and determinate. Neither is it lawful to sell a yard from a piece of cloth which is sewed, whether the parties specify that the yard shall be cut off from it or not; because in this case a delivery without injury is impracticable. It is otherwise where a person agrees to sell ten drams (for instance) from an ingot of silver, for these may be cut off from the ingot without injury to it. It is to be observed, however, that if the seller, before the dissolution of the contract, should cut off the yard of cloth, or pull away and separate the piece of wood, the sale in that case becomes complete, since the cause of its invalidity is removed.

Or of which the quality or existence cannot be ascertained.—IT is otherwise with respect to the sale of the kernels of dates, because that continues null, although the stones be afterwards opened and the kernels taken out; since (contrary to the case of the yard of cloth, or the piece of wood) the existence of them was originally uncertain.

It is not lawful for a game-catcher to sell “what he may catch at one pull of his net;” because the subject of the sale is uncertain; and also because the purchaser may be deceived, as it is possible that none may be caught.

Or the quantity of which can only be judged of by conjecture.—IT is not lawful to sell dates growing upon a tree in exchange for dates which have been plucked, and which are computed, from conjecture, to be

* That is, before it has been extracted by churning.

† By the phrase “it is not lawful,” is here (and in the following examples) to be understood, “it is invalid.”

* That is, “may be joined with other articles.”

equal in point of measurement to those that are upon the tree. This species of sale is termed Mozabinat;^{*} and has been prohibited by the prophet, as well as the sale termed Mohakila, which is the sale of wheat in the ear, in exchange for a like quantity of wheat by conjecture. The law is the same with respect to the sale of grapes on the vine in exchange for raisins. Shafei holds these sales to be lawful, provided they be not extended to a quantity exceeding five Wusks;† because, although the prophet has prohibited a sale by Mozabinat, yet he has permitted what is termed Oraya; which he explains to be a sale of dates upon a tree, provided the quantity be less than five Wusks, in exchange for a quantity which have been plucked, and which are similar, in point of measurement, according to computation. Our doctors, on the other hand, explain Oraya in its literal sense to mean a gift; and the nature of it is this. A person makes a gift of the dates of his orchard to another, who thereupon comes and enters the orchard. This gives disgust to the proprietor, as his family reside in the orchard; but being, at the same time, unwilling to violate his agreement, he prohibits the other from entering into the orchard, and gives him a quantity of dates which have been pulled in exchange for those which were growing in the orchard. This is the proper interpretation of the traditional saying of the prophet, quoted by Shafei; and this mode of sale, which is termed Moojar, is valid in the opinion of our doctors. It is not, however, in reality a sale, because the right of property had not vested in the donee, on account of his not having made seisin of the dates, and therefore the dry dates which were afterwards given to him is considered as a new gift.

Or where the bargain is determined by the purchaser touching the goods, &c.—It is not lawful to sell goods by the way of Molamisa, Monazibee, or Alka Hidgir;—that is, the touch of the goods, the throwing of the goods; or the casting of a stone;—as where, for instance, a person having exhibited his goods to another, and specified the price, the parties agree between themselves that the contract shall be binding, either on the purchaser's touching the goods, or the seller's throwing them towards him, or the purchaser's casting a stone at them. These modes of sale were common in the days of ignorance; but were inhibited by the prophet.

The sale is invalid, of grass upon a common.—It is not lawful to sell grass growing on a common, because it is not the property of the seller; for it is declared in the traditions that “in grass all men are alike sharers”—(that is, it is common to all). Neither is it lawful to let it out on lease; because, as it is not permitted to farm anything, where the object is the destruction of it, even though it be the property of the lessor, it is consequently in a superior degree unlawful to let in lease an article of which the property is common to all, where the object of the lessee is the destruction of it.*

Or of bees (unless in a hive, or with the comb).—THE sale of bees is not lawful according to the two Elders. Mohammed is of opinion that it is lawful, provided the bees be in a place of custody,† and not wild;‡ and such is also the opinion of Shafei; because a bee is an animal yielding good; and as we are permitted by the law to enjoy the good which that creature yields, it follows that the sale of the animal is permitted. The reasoning of the two Elders is that, the animal being of an offensive nature, the sale of it is therefore unlawful, in the same manner as in the case of wasps. Besides, the good is derived from its produce, not from its substance, whence no advantage can be derived from it until the honey be produced. If, however, the comb be sold, with the honey in it, and the bees, the sale of the bees is in this case lawful, as a dependant. Koorokhee is also of this opinion.

Or of silk-worms.—It is not lawful to sell silk-worms, according to Haneefa, as they are animals of an offensive nature. Aboo Yoosaf thinks that if the silk have appeared they may then lawfully be sold, as a dependant. Mohammed is of opinion that the sale of them is lawful in any case, as being an animal whence an advantage is derived. Haneefa is of opinion, also, that the sale of their eggs is unlawful. The two disciples, on the contrary, are of opinion that such sale is lawful of necessity.

* The object of a lease is usufruct, or (in the language of the Mussulman lawyers) a destruction of the produce of the thing, but not of the thing itself: thus if a person should take a lease of a piece of ground, or a fruit tree, he would be entitled to appropriate to himself the produce of the ground, whether grain or grass, or the fruit that might grow upon the tree; but he would have no right to use the ground or the tree (the immediate subjects of the lease) so as to occasion any destruction of their substance. Hence proceeds the illegality of a lease of a field of grass, of grain, of the fruit of a tree or the like; for the lease in any of these cases would be entirely useless, since the lessee, being entitled only to the use of the produce of the subject of the lease, would not be entitled to the use of any of these which are themselves the immediate subject of the lease.

The sale of tame pigeons is valid.—THE sale of pigeons, of which the number is ascertained, and the delivery practicable, is lawful, as in such circumstances they constitute property.

—The sale of an absconded slave is invalid (unless he be in the hands of the purchaser).

—It is not lawful to sell an absconded slave, because the prophet has prohibited this; and also, because the delivery is impracticable. If, however, the purchaser should declare that "the fugitive is in his possession," the sale is lawful, because the obstacle on which the prohibition is founded is in this case removed.—It is to be observed that if the purchaser, in this instance, should have declared, before witnesses, that "he had taken possession of this slave with intent to restore him to his owner," he is not held, on the conclusion of the contract, to become seised of him in virtue thereof; because the former seisin, being in the nature of a trust, cannot stand in the room of that made on account of purchase. If, on the other hand, he should have made no such declaration, in that case he is held to be seised of the slave, in virtue of the sale, immediately on the conclusion of the contract; because the former seisin, being in the nature of an usurpation, may therefore stand in the room of a seisin for sale; for both are the same in effect, as they both equally induce responsibility. If the slave should have eloped to some other person, and the purchaser say to the proprietor, "sell me your slave who has run away to such an one," and the seller accordingly agree, the sale is in that case also unlawful, because of the impracticability of the delivery.

Although the seller should afterwards recover and deliver him to the purchaser.—If a person, having sold a fugitive slave, should after the sale recover him, and deliver him to the purchaser, the sale is nevertheless unlawful, because it was originally null, in the same manner as if it had related to a bird in the air. It is recorded, as an opinion of Hanefea, that the sale in this case is valid, provided it was not undone previous to the delivery, because it was founded on property, and there was no bar to its effect except the impracticability of the delivery, which is removed by the recovery of the slave (and such is also related as the opinion of Mohammed);—in the same manner as if a slave, after having been sold, should run away previous to the seisin of the purchaser, in which case, if the seller should afterwards recover him, and deliver him to the purchaser, the sale is binding, provided it was not dissolved in the interval.

The sale is invalid, of a woman's milk.—

THE sale of a woman's milk is unlawful, although it be in a vessel. Shafei is of opinion that if it be in a vessel the sale of it is lawful, because it is a pure beverage. The argument of our doctors is that, as being part of a human creature, it ought to be respected; and the exposure of it to sale is an act of disrespect. In the Zahir-Rawayet there is a distinction between the milk of a female slave and a free woman. It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the sale of the milk of a female slave is lawful, because the sale of the slave herself is lawful. The answer to this is that the sale of the female is legal, because of the bondage, which is a quality of her person; but such quality does not relate to the milk; the one being alive, and the other dead.

Or the bristles of a hog.—The sale of the bristles of a hog is unlawful, because the animal is essentially filth, and because the exposure of this article to sale is a degree of respect, which is reprobated and forbidden. It is lawful, however, to apply it to use, such as stitching leather, for instance, in the room of a needle, as this is warranted by necessity.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that the sale of it is warranted from necessity, in the same manner as the use of it.

REPLY.—There is no necessity for the sale of it, since any quantity of it may be had gratuitously and without purchase.—It is to be observed that hogs' bristles falling into a little water* renders it impure, according to Aboo Yoosaf.—Mohammed is of a different opinion, because the legality of the use of the article in question is (according to him) an argument of its purity. Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, argues that the legality of the use of it is founded on necessity, and not on its purity; and there exists no necessity in the case of its falling into water.

Or human hair.—THE sale of human hair is unlawful, in the same manner as is the use of it; because, being a part of the human body, it is necessary to preserve it from the disgrace to which an exposure of it to sale necessarily subjects it. It is moreover recorded, in the Hadees-Shareef, that "God denounced a curse upon a Wasila and a Moostwasila."—(The first of these is a woman whose employment it is to unite the shorn hair of one woman to the head of another, to make her hair appear long; and the second means the woman to whose head such hair is united.) Besides, as it has been allowed to women to increase their locks by means of the wool of a camel, it may thence be inferred that the use of human hair is unlawful.

Or undressed hides.—THE sale of the hides of animals is not lawful until they be dressed, because the use of them, until then, is prohibited in the traditions of the prophet. It is lawful, however, to sell dressed hides.

But animal substances of all descriptions (excepting those of men or hogs) may be either sold or converted to use.—It is permitted either to sell or apply to use the bones, sinews, wool, horns, or hair, of all animals which are dead, excepting those of men and hogs. The reason of this is that these articles are pure, and are not considered as carrion : besides, death does not affect them as it does the animal, as these articles are not possessed of life.—It is to be observed that Mohammed, considering an elephant as essential filth, like a hog, holds the sale of it to be unlawful :—but the two disciples, considering it in the nature of a wild animal, regard the sale of it, or of the bones of it, as lawful.

A right cannot be sold, unless it involve property.—If in a house, of which the upper and under apartments belong to different persons, the whole, or the upper story only, should fall down, in that case the proprietor of the upper story is not permitted to sell his right (namely, the right of building another upper story), because this, as being only a right, is not property.

OBJECTION.—It would hence appear that the sale of a right to water* (that is, of a share in water used in tillage) is not lawful, as it is not the seller's property, but merely his right ; whereas such a sale is allowed, if made along with the land, according to all authorities ; and according to one tradition (which has been adopted by the Sheikhs of Balkh) the sale of the right to water by itself is lawful.

REPLY.—THE sale of a right to water is valid, because the term Shirb means a share in water ; and that is an existent article, and in the nature of property ;—whence it is that if a person, in a case where it is enjoyed by rotation, should destroy it during the term of his right, he is responsible for the value of it ;—and also, that, when it is sold along with the ground, a part of the price is opposed to the right to water.

Anything may be sold which admits of a precise ascertainment : but not otherwise.

—If a person bestow or sell a road† it is lawful : but neither the sale nor the gift of a water-course is valid. These cases admit of two suppositions.—I. The sale may be of the absolute right to the road or water-course, without defining the length or breadth of either.—II. It may be of the right of passing upon the road, or receiving the benefit of the water.‡—Upon the first supposition, the difference between the two cases is that the road is certain and ascertained, because the known breadth of it is equal to that of a door-way :—but in the case of a water-course there is an uncertainty, because it is not known how much ground the water covers.—Upon the second supposition, there are two traditions with respect to a sale of a right of passage on the road :—according to one tradition the sale is lawful ; and according to another it is invalid.—The difference between the sale of a right of passage on the road, and a right of benefit from the water (as inferred from the first tradition), is that a right of passage is a point which admits of being precisely ascertained, as it is connected with a known object, namely, the road ; whereas the right of benefit from the water is of a nature which cannot admit of being precisely ascertained,—and this, whether the water be conveyed in a trough supported upon a wooden frame, or in a trench cut in the ground.

A deception with respect to the sex invalidates the sale in slaves, but not in brutes.—If a person sell a slave as a female, who afterwards proves to be a male, in that case the sale is utterly null.—It is otherwise where a person sells a goat (for instance) as a male, and it afterwards proves to be a female ; for in that case the contract of sale is complete : the purchaser, however, has the option of keeping the animal, or rejecting it. The difference between these two cases is founded on this general rule,—that wherever denomination and pointed reference are united, by the seller pointing to the subject of the sale, and mentioning its name (as if a person should say, “I have sold this goat, for instance”),—in this case, if the article referred to prove essentially different from what was mentioned, the sale is supposed to relate to the article named ; and therefore if the article referred to prove of a different species from what was named, the sale is null.—If, on the other hand, the article referred to prove of the same species with the article named, but of a different quality, in this case the sale relates to the article referred to ; and where the article referred to is found, the sale is complete : the purchaser, however, has in this instance an option, because of the quality mentioned not existing in the article ;—as where, for instance, a person sells a slave as a baker, and he proves to be a scribe.—Now it is to be observed that a male and a female slave are not of the same, but of two different sexes, which is accounted, in this instance, as equivalent to being of different species, because of their different uses ; whereas in goats the object for purchase (namely, to eat their flesh), is the same, with respect both to the male and the female, and therefore they are not held to be of two different species.—It is proper to remark, in this place, that, amongst lawyers, the unity or difference of the object, and not the unity or difference of the essence, determines the unity or difference of the species. Thus vinegar of the grape is held to be of a different species from the sweet juice of the grape.

the original price, before payment of that price, is invalid.—If a person purchase a female slave for a thousand dirms, stipulating either a future or immediate payment, and having taken possession of her, should sell her to the person from whom he had purchased her, for five hundred dirms, previous to his having made payment of the thousand dirms, this second sale is invalid. Shafei is of opinion that as the right of property in the slave had vested in the purchaser, because of his having taken possession of her, such sale, on the part of the purchaser to the seller, is valid, in the same manner as it would have been valid to any other person,—or as it would have been valid to the seller in case the second price had been equal to or greater than the first,—or in case it had been in exchange for other goods, although these should have been of a less value.—The arguments of our doctors are,—FIRST, a tradition that Ayesha, having heard of a woman who, having purchased a female slave from Zeyd Bin Rakim for eight hundred dirms, had afterwards sold her to the said Zeyd for six hundred dirms, spoke to her thus: "This purchase and sale on your part is bad; inform Zeyd, that certainly God will render null his pilgrimages and enterprises achieved along with the prophet unless he repent of such conduct."—SECONDLY, if the sale in question be valid, it follows that the first seller remains indebted to the purchaser for five hundred dirms, and the purchaser to him for one thousand dirms. Now if their account should be balanced, and five hundred dirms be struck off from the debt of the purchaser, in liquidation of his claim upon the seller, there remains five hundred due by the purchaser, for which he has received no return, and this is unlawful. It is otherwise where the seller, in the second sale, gives the purchaser goods in return; because there the difference is not obvious; being apparent only with respect to articles of the same kind.

But the contract is not invalid with respect to any other subject which may be joined to the original in the re-sale.—If a person, having purchased a female slave for five hundred dirms, and taken possession of her, should afterwards, before he had discharged the price, sell her, in conjunction with another, for five hundred dirms, to the person from whom he had purchased her, in that case the sale is valid with respect to the female slave whom he had not formerly purchased from that person, but null with respect to the other. The reason of this is that, as a part of the price is necessarily opposed to the new slave, it follows that he purchases a slave, and sells her again to the same person for a less price than he had purchased her for, which is not lawful, as has been already shewn.—No such reason of illegality, however, existing with regard to the sale of the other slave, it is therefore valid, in a price proportioned to her value.

OBJECTION.—It would appear that the sale of the other slave is also invalid, because the person has sold both by one contract, and as the sale of the one is invalid, it would follow that the sale of the other is also invalid (according to the tenets of Haneefa), in the same manner as where a freeman and a slave are sold by one contract, the sale of the slave being in that case invalid—as well as that of the freeman.

REPLY.—The sale of the other slave is valid; and the invalidity of sale with respect to one does not affect the sale of the other; because the invalidity, in this instance, is weak, as there is a difference of opinion regarding it amongst our doctors; and also, because it is founded on a suspicion of usury, the effect of which suspicion cannot extend beyond the subject of suspicion, namely, the first slave.

The stipulation of a specific tare invalidates a sale.—If a person purchase oil, on this condition, that it be weighed with the vessel in which it is contained, and that a deduction of fifty ratls shall be made on account of the weight of the vessel, such sale is not valid; whereas, if the condition be, in general terms, that "a deduction shall be made for the weight of the vessel," it is valid;—because the former condition is not essential to the contract, whereas the latter is essential.

Case of a dispute concerning the tare of a vessel which contained the commodity.—If a person, having purchased oil in a leathern bag, should carry it away with him, and afterwards return a bag to the seller weighing ten ratls, and the seller assert that "this is not the bag he had carried away with him, as that only weighed five RATLS;" in this case the averment of the purchaser is to be credited, whether the question of disagreement be considered as relating to the bag being different,—or to the consequent difference it creates with respect to the quantity of oil; because, if the difference be considered as relating to the identity of the bag of which the purchaser had taken possession, his assertion must be credited, since the word of the possessor is to be credited, whether he be responsible for the article (as in the case of an usurper) or merely a confident (as in the case of a trustee);—or if, on the other hand, the difference be considered as relating to the quantity of oil, this resolves itself into a difference with respect to the amount of the price, the seller claiming more, and the purchaser acknowledging less: the purchaser is therefore the defendant; and the assertion of a defendant, upon oath, must be credited.

A Mussulman may commission a Christian to sell or purchase unlawful articles on his account; and such sale or purchase, made by the agent, is valid.—If a Mussulman desire a Christian either to purchase or sell wine or a hog on his account, and the Christian act accordingly, in that case (according to Haneefa) such sale or purchase is valid: but an order of a Mussulman to this effect being in the highest degree abominable, he is therefore enjoined (where it respects the sale of those articles) to devote the price obtained for them to the poor.—The two disciples maintain that the purchase or sale of wine or a hog by a Christian, on account of a Mussulman, is invalid (and the same difference of opinion also obtains with respect to the case of a Mohrim appointing an agent for the sale of the game he may have caught, when it became unlawful for him to make such sale). The argument of the two disciples is that the constituent, as not having himself the power of selling or purchasing these articles, cannot of consequence invest others with such power; besides, as all the acts of an agent revert to the constituent on whose behalf they are performed, it is therefore the same as if the Mussulman were himself to sell or purchase these articles, which would be illegal. The argument of Haneefa is that the contractor (that is, the purchaser or the seller) is, in this instance, no other than the agent; for this reason, that he is fully empowered to perform these acts: the reverting, moreover, of the property to the constituent is a necessary and unavoidable effect, and therefore is not prevented by his Islam;—in the same manner as the articles in question may descend to a Mussulman by inheritance (in other words, if a Christian, whose heir is a Mussulman, should himself embrace the religion of Islam, and afterwards die, before releasing his hog, or converting his liquor into vinegar, in that case they would descend to his Mussulman heir). It is to be observed, however, that although Haneefa admits the validity of the purchase of these articles by a Christian agent, on behalf of a Mussulman, still he holds it incumbent on the Mussulman to convert the liquor into vinegar, and to set free the hog.

A sale is rendered invalid by the insertion of any condition advantageous to either party, or repugnant to the requisites of the contract; or which may occasion contention, by involving an advantage to the subject of the sale.—If a person sell a male slave, on condition that the purchaser shall emancipate him, or make him a Modabbir, or a Mokatib; or if a person sell a female slave, on condition that the purchaser shall make her an Am-Walid, such sale is invalid; because this is a sale suspended on a condition; and such sales are condemned by the prophet. The rule, in this particular, is founded on a tenet of our doctors, that the insertion of any condition which is a necessary result of the contract (such as where the seller bargains that “the purchaser shall become proprietor of the article sold”), can no way affect the validity of the contract, since that would be established independent of any stipulation; and, on the other hand, that the insertion of any condition which is not a necessary result of the contract, and in which there is an advantage either to the buyer or the seller, or to the subject of the sale, if capable of enjoying an advantage (such as where the seller bargains that “the purchaser shall emancipate the slave he sells to him”), renders the contract invalid; because an additional and extraneous act is, in this instance, required from the purchaser, without stipulating a recompence to him, and which of consequence is of an usurious nature; and also, because as there is an advantage in this condition to the subject of the sale, who is capable of claiming it, it follows that a contention must necessarily ensue, and hence the object of sale (namely, the prevention of strife) is frustrated. Conditions of this nature are therefore unlawful, excepting where custom and precedent prevail over analogy; as where a person purchases unsewed shoes on condition of the seller's sewing, or causing them to be sewed for him. The insertion, on the other hand, of any condition which is not a necessary result of the contract, and which, moreover, is not attended with advantage to any particular person, does not invalidate the contract. An example of this occurs where a person sells an animal, on condition that “the purchaser shall sell it again;” which condition is lawful, because there is no particular person whose right it is to claim the performance of it (since the animal is incapable of so doing), and hence neither usury nor strife can attend such a stipulation. Now, having explained the tenets of our doctors, it is proper to remark that the conditions recited in the cases in question are repugnant to the nature of the contract, as they tend to deprive the purchaser of every right to which the sale entitles him; and they also involve an advantage to the subject of the sale, who is capable of claiming it: they therefore invalidate the contract. Shafei dissents from our doctors, as he holds the sale of a slave, on condition of his emancipation, to be valid.

But such sale recovers its validity, by the purchaser performing the condition with the article purchased.—If a person should emancipate a slave whom he had purchased on that condition, then the sale, which, because of such condition, was previously illegal, becomes valid, according to Haneefa; and the purchaser is responsible to the seller for the price. The two disciples are of opinion that the emancipation does not render the sale valid; and that therefore the payment of the value, and not of the price, is incumbent on the purchaser; because, as the sale was originally invalid, in consequence of the condition, it cannot afterwards be rendered valid by means of the emancipation, any more than by the purchaser's murdering or selling the slave. The reasoning of Haneefa is, that although the condition of emancipating the slave be not, in itself, agreeable to the requisites of a contract of sale (as was before explained), still it is so in effect; because it completes the right of property on the part of the purchaser; and a thing becomes established and confirmed by its completion; whence it is that the emancipation of a purchased slave is no bar to a right of compensation from the seller in case of a defect.

Sale is rendered invalid, by a reservation of any advantage to the seller from the article sold.—If a person sell a slave, on condition that “he shall serve him for the space of two months after the sale;” or a house, on condition that “he shall reside in it for the space of two months after the sale;” or, if a person sell any other article, on condition of the purchaser’s lending him a dirm (for instance), or making him some present, the sale so suspended on any of these conditions is invalid:—FIRST, because these conditions are not agreeable to the nature of a sale, and are attended with an advantage to the seller; SECONDLY, because the prophet has prohibited a sale on condition of a loan: and, THIRDLY, because, if any diminution be made in the price, on account of the services of the slave, or the residence in the house, it follows that a contract of rent is interwoven in that of sale; or if, on the other hand, no diminution be made in the price on these accounts, it follows that a deed of loan is interwoven in the sale; and both of these are illegal.

Or, by the stipulation of a delay in the delivery of it.—If a person sell goods on condition of his being permitted to suspend the delivery for a month, the sale is in such case invalid, because a suspension with respect to the delivery of goods which are extant and specific is an unlawful condition. The reason of this is that a suspension in point of time has been ordained by the LAW, merely for the purpose of ease, and is therefore only applicable to a debt, in order that the debtor may have time to collect the sum within the prescribed period and pay it accordingly; but with respect to a thing actually extant (such as cloth, for instance), there can be no occasion for such suspension.

Or, by the insertion of an invalid condition.—THE sale of a pregnant slave, with a reservation of the fœtus in her womb, is invalid; because it is a general rule that nothing, the sale of which by itself is illegal, can be made an exception to a contract of sale; and of this nature is a fœtus. The sale, therefore, is invalid, because of the invalidity of the condition. It is to be observed that a contract of Kitabat, of hire, or of pawns, are the same with a contract of sale, in this respect, that an invalid condition is a means of invalidating the deed. In the case of Kitabat, however, the invalid condition must actually exist in the deed; as when a person enters into covenant with his slave to emancipate him on condition of his giving him wine, or a hog. It is also to be observed that in the cases of gift, alms, marriage, Khoola, and composition for wilful murder, the exception of the fœtus does not invalidate the deed; on the contrary, the deed takes place in full; but the condition is invalid. In the same manner, an exception of the fœtus does not invalidate a legacy, for in this case the exception is a valid condition.

Or of a condition which implicates the subject of another contract.—If a person purchase cloth, on condition that the seller sew it into the form of a vest on his account, the sale is in such case invalid; since this condition, besides being attended with an advantage to the purchaser, is not a requisite of the contract of sale. Moreover, this necessarily supposes the implication of terms of two different contracts; that is, either of sale and loan, or of sale and hire.

If a person purchase one shoe from another, on condition that the seller prepare a fellow to it on his account,—or purchase a pair of shoes on condition of the seller making straps to them, for the purpose of tying them, the sale in either case is invalid.—(The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this is according to analogy; for a more favourable construction would suggest that such sale is lawful, on account of its being customary amongst men.)

Or by a stipulation of the payment of the price, at a period not precisely known to both parties.—If a person should purchase an article, and stipulate the payment of the price on the day of the new year, or on the Mihrijan,* or on the fast of the Christians,† or the day of breaking lent amongst the Jews, the sale, under such conditions, is invalid, provided both parties be not informed with certainty respecting those periods. The sale, however, is lawful, if these periods be ascertained within the knowledge of both parties.

Or the date of the occurrence of which is uncertain.—A SALE is not valid where the price is stipulated to be paid on the return of the pilgrims, or on the cutting of the grain, or on the gathering of the grapes, or on the shearing of the sheep,—because in none of these cases is the period absolutely determinate: contrary to the act of giving bail; for the giving of bail, until any of these periods, is lawful; because a small degree of uncertainty does not invalidate a bail-bond, in the same manner as it does a contract of sale.

But it is valid where the time of payment is fixed by a subsequent agreement.—If, however, a sale be made in an absolute manner, and the seller afterwards agree to receive the price at any of the periods in question, it is lawful, because, this stipulation not being included in the contract of sale, it becomes a stipulation with regard to payment of DEBT (not the price), which admits of a small degree of uncertainty.

A sale, invalid in consequence of stipulating an uncertain time of payment, recovers its validity by the removal of the uncertainty.—If a sale be made, stipulating payment of the price at any of the periods above stated, and afterwards the purchaser and seller jointly, or the purchaser alone, remove the obstacle of uncertainty,* prior to the actual occurrence of the period stipulated, the sale then becomes valid. Ziffer maintains that, the sale being originally invalid, the subsequent removal of the obstacle cannot render it valid; in the same manner as a marriage originally contracted for a fixed period would not become valid by rendering it perpetual. The argument of our doctors is, that the invalidity of the sale, in this case, is merely because of the apprehension of the litigation, to which the uncertainty may give rise; and, of course, when this uncertainty is removed, the sale remains valid. Moreover, as the uncertainty, in this case, relates only to an accidental circumstance, that is, to the period when the price is to be paid, and not to the price itself, which is one of the essentials of sale, the uncertainty is capable of being removed. It is otherwise where a person sells one dirim for two dirims, and afterwards relinquishes the additional dirim; for the sale does not in consequence of such relinquishment become valid, since the invalidity related to the price itself, which is an essential of the sale. It is also otherwise in a case of marriage for a particular period, because this, in fact, is not a marriage, but a separate deed called Matat, and by no subsequent acts can one deed be transmitted into another deed.

The sale of a saleable with an unsaleable subject is invalid.—If a person expose to sale a freeman and a slave, and sell them both in one contract,—or, in the same manner, sell a carrion goat,† and one that has been slain by the prescribed form of Zibby,—such sale, according to Haneefa, is utterly invalid with respect both to the freeman and the slave, as in the first case, and the carrion, and slain goat, as in the second;—and this, whether the seller have opposed a specific price to each or not (the two disciples are of opinion that if a specific price be opposed to each, the sale is valid with respect to the slave, or the slain goat).

But if the unsaleable subject be property, the sale holds good with respect to the saleable subject.—If, on the contrary, a person unite in sale, an absolute slave and a Modabbir, or a slave that is his property, and another that is not, the sale is in either case lawful, with respect to the absolute slave, or the slave which is his absolute property, in return for a proportion from the whole price stipulated. This is, according to our doctors (namely, Haneefa and the two disciples).—Ziffer is of opinion that the sale is not lawful in either case, with respect to either subject. The two disciples argue, that where a specific price is opposed to each particular subject, the invalidity of the sale extends only to that subject which contains a cause of invalidity (namely, the freeman or the carrion) but does not reach to the other subjects (namely, the slave or the slain goat);—in the same manner as where a person marries a strange woman and his own sister by one contract, in which case the marriage is valid with respect to the stranger, although it be invalid with respect to his sister,—for that invalidity does not extend to the stranger;—and so also in the case in question. It is otherwise where the price of each particular subject has not been specified; for in that case the invalidity extends to the whole. Haneefa argues that there is a material difference between the two cases;—namely, the case of joining in sale a freeman with a slave, and that of joining a Modabbir with a slave; because a freeman, as not being property, is utterly incapable of being included in a contract of sale; and as the comprehension of him in the sale necessarily establishes the condition of the acceptance of the sale with respect to him, it follows that the sale is invalid, because of the invalidity of the condition: contrary to marriage, as that is not rendered invalid by an invalid condition. The sale, on the other hand, of a slave the property of another, or of a Mokatib, Modabbir, or Am-Walid, is merely suspended, for these may be included in a contract of sale, as they are property,—whence it is that the sale of them may be carried into execution, in the case of the stranger's slave, by the consent of the proprietor,—in the case of a Mokatib by his own consent,—and in the case of a Modabbir or Am-Walid (in the opinion of the two Elders) by a decree of the Kaze to this effect;—but as it is to be supposed that the proprietor of the slave, on account of his right to the subject of the sale, and the Mokatib, Modabbir, or Am-Walid, because of the claims established in their persons, will repel the sale, the sale therefore is executed only with relation to the absolute slave; in the same manner as where a person purchases two slaves, of whom one dies previous to the purchaser taking possession of them; in which case the sale holds good with respect to the other.

In an invalid sale, the purchaser is responsible, not for the price, but for the value, of the article, in case of its perishing in his hands, where he has taken possession of it by consent of the seller.—WHENEVER the purchaser, in an invalid sale, takes possession of the goods, with the consent of the seller, then, provided both the goods and the price

Of the Laws of Invalid Sales.

In an invalid sale, the purchaser is responsible, not for the price, but for the value, of the article, in case of its perishing in his hands, where he has taken possession of it by consent of the seller.—WHENEVER the purchaser, in an invalid sale, takes possession of the goods, with the consent of the seller, then, provided both the goods and the price be property,* the purchaser becomes proprietor of the article sold, and remains responsible, not for the price, but for the value of the goods, in case they be destroyed in his possession. Shafei maintains that the purchaser does not become proprietor, although he take possession of the article, because an invalid sale is forbidden, and therefore cannot substantiate a right of property: besides, anything which is forbidden is not sanctioned by the LAW, since prohibition is repugnant to ordinance; an invalid sale, therefore, is in no respect sanctioned by the LAW (whence it is that the purchaser of goods does not become proprietor before seisin); and the case is consequently the same as if a person should sell something in exchange for carrion, or should sell wine in exchange for money. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that, in this case, the essential of sale (namely, an exchange of property for property) exists. The subject of the sale, moreover, is property, and is therefore a fit subject. The buyer and seller also are both competent to the act:—and where all these circumstances exist, the sale is duly contracted. Besides, the prohibition is no way repugnant to the legality of the sale itself, because the prohibition relates only to an accessory circumstance, namely an invalid condition; the right of property, therefore, after seisin, accrues to the purchaser in virtue of the sale itself, which is legal, and not in virtue of any matter which is prohibited, or contrary to the LAW. The purchaser, moreover, does not become proprietor of the goods before seisin, for two reasons:—FIRST, because, although an invalid sale be a cause of right of property, yet it is a weak cause, and therefore stands in need of the aid of seisin to give it effect; SECONDLY, because, if the purchaser become proprietor previous to the seisin, it would necessarily follow that a sanction is given by LAW to the invalidity, whereas it is incumbent to remove the invalidity. With respect to the cases of a sale of any thing in exchange for carrion, or of wine in exchange for money, the essentials of sale do not exist in either of these, as has been already demonstrated. It is established as a condition, in this instance, that the seisin be made with the consent of the SELLER; it is sufficient, however (according to a favourable construction of the LAW), if this consent be by implication; as if the purchaser should make the seisin in the place of sale, and in presence of the seller. The reason for a favourable construction of the law, in this particular, is, that as the seller, by the contract of sale, virtually impowers the purchaser to make seisin, and as the purchaser does so in his presence, without his making any objection thereto, it is therefore construed to have been made with his consent: in the same manner as the seisin of a gift, in the place where the deed of gift is executed, is valid according to a favourable construction of the law. It is also a condition, that both the goods and the return be property, in order that an exchange of property for property (which is one of the pillars of sale) be established; for if this were not the case, the sale would be null, in the same manner as a sale in return for carrion, blood, the person of a freeman, air, or the like; and hence if, in these cases, the purchaser should take possession of the goods with the consent of the seller, still he is not responsible for them.

And the value must be paid in money, or in a similar, according to the nature of the article.—With respect to what was stated, that the seller “remains responsible, not for the price, but for the value of the goods,” it relates only to such goods as are of a nature to be compensated for by money; for with respect to such as are compensable by similars, the purchaser is responsible for a similar; because that which is a similar both in appearance and in effect is a more equitable compensation than that which is similar in effect only.

Either party may annul the contract before seisin.—IN an invalid sale, either of the parties, previous to the seisin, has the power of annulling the contract, in order that the invalidity of it may be removed. The law is also the same after seisin, provided the invalidity exist in the body of the contract. If, however, the invalidity be occasioned by the addition of an invalid condition, the person stipulating the condition is allowed to annul it, but not the other party.

A purchaser under an invalid sale may validly sell the article, in which case his right of annulling the sale expires.—If the purchaser, in an invalid sale, take possession of the article, and then sell it, in that case the second sale is valid,—as the first purchaser, having become proprietor in virtue of seisin, is fully competent to sell the article; and, upon his so doing, the right of returning the article to the first seller expires:—FIRST, Because the right of the individual (namely, the second purchaser) is connected with the second sale; and the annulment of the first sale, in consequence of its invalidity, is on account of the right of God;* but the right of the individual has preference to the right of God, as the individual is necessitous, whereas GOD is not so: SECONDLY, Because the first sale is legal in its essence, but invalid in its quality,—whereas the second sale is legal in point of both; and it follows that the latter cannot be obstructed in its operation by the former; and, THIRDLY, because the second sale is made with the virtual assent of the first seller, as the power to that effect was by him bestowed on the first purchaser. It is otherwise where the purchaser of a house, in which there is a right of Shaffa, sells it to another; for there the person entitled to the right of Shaffa has nevertheless a just title to it; because it is the right of the individual, in the same manner as that of the second purchaser; is equal to it in point of legality; and has not been forfeited by any power given by him to the purchaser to make the sale.

The purchaser of a lawful article in return for one which is unlawful, may after possession dispose of it as he sees fit; remaining responsible only for the value.—If a person purchase and take possession of a slave, in exchange for wine, or a hog, and afterwards either emancipate him, sell him, or bestow him in gift, all of these acts are valid, because of the purchaser, in virtue of the seisin, having become proprietor; and he is responsible to the seller for the value of the slave. In the case of emancipation, as the property immediately ceases, the slave becomes (as it were) destroyed, and hence proceeds the responsibility of the purchaser for the value. In the case of sale or gift, the responsibility arises from the right of returning him to the seller being annulled in consequence of these deeds, as has been already explained. It is to be observed that pawnage, or the making a slave a Mokatib, is equivalent to sale, and therefore annuls the right of return to the seller. The redemption of the pledge, however, or the inability of the Mokatib to perform his covenant, restores the right, because the bar to its operation is removed.

The seller cannot resume the article until he return the purchase-money; and if the seller die, the purchaser is entitled to set up the article to sale, to indemnify himself for the price he has paid.—In an invalid sale, the seller is not allowed to resume the goods from the purchaser, until he shall have first restored the purchase-money; because the goods, being opposed to the purchase-money, are retained in the nature of a pledge until the restitution of it. If the seller should die, then the purchaser has a prior claim to the subject of sale; that is, he is permitted to take payment of the price from the sale of the goods, giving the remainder (if there be any) to the other claimants; because, as he has a right in the goods superior to any other person, during the lifetime of the seller, he consequently has a right preferably to the seller's heirs or creditors after his decease; in the same manner as the holder of a pawn. It is to be observed, that if the price was paid in dirms, the purchaser has a right to exact from the seller the identical dirms he paid him; since the purchase-money, in the case of an invalid sale, remains in the hands of the seller in the nature of an usurpation. If, however, the identical dirms be not in his possession, then the purchaser is entitled to an equivalent.

Case of an immovable property, in which a change is wrought by a purchaser under an invalid contract.—If a person purchase a house by an invalid sale, and afterwards convert it into a mosque, he is in that case responsible, according to Haneefa, for the value of the house. This is also related by Aboo Yoosaf, in the Juma Sagheer, as the opinion of Haneefa; but he afterwards entertained doubts respecting it. The two disciples maintain that the house must be restored to its original state, and then returned to the seller. The same difference of opinion obtains, if the purchaser should plant trees in the court-yard of the house. The argument of the two disciples is that the right of the neighbour* is of weaker consideration than the right of the seller (whence it is that the right of a neighbour requires to be supported by a decree of the Kazee, and also, that it becomes null, by any delay in the demand of it,—neither of which is the case with respect to a seller's right); and as the right of the neighbour, which is the weaker right, would not be annulled by the conversion of the house into a mosque, it follows that the right of the seller, which is the stronger, is not thereby annulled a fortiori. The argument of Haneefa is, that the act of building or planting proceeds on an idea of perpetual possession; that the purchaser in so doing acts in virtue of a power to that effect which he holds from the seller; and that therefore the seller has no right to the restitution, in the same manner as in the case of its being resold by the purchaser. It is otherwise with the right of a neighbour, as he does not give power to the purchaser to build or plant on the place over which his right extends; whence it is that if the purchaser had either bestowed it in a gift, or sold it, his right of neighbourhood would nevertheless still have remained in force. Aboo Yoosaf, who reported what is here advanced as the opinion of Haneefa on this subject, afterwards distrusted his memory, as has been already observed. Mohammed, however, in treating of Shaffa,† expressly infers the difference of opinion here recited;—for, he says, “where a purchaser, under an invalid sale, builds upon the ground he has purchased, the neighbour has no right of Shaffa therein, according to the two disciples,” any more than previous to the purchase.” Now as Haneefa, on the other hand, has maintained that in such case the neighbour is entitled to take the place, upon paying the value, in virtue of his right of Shaffa, it clearly follows that in his opinion the right of the seller is annulled; because it is on this circumstance that he founds his opinion of the existence of the right of Shaffa, since, so long as the right of the seller remains in force, that of the neighbour cannot take place;—whereas, according to the two disciples, the right of the seller is not destroyed by the building of the purchaser, and therefore the claim of Shaffa does not take place.

The profit acquired by the purchaser, upon a definite article, purchased under an invalid contract, must be bestowed in charity.—If a person purchase a female slave (for instance) by an invalid contract, and take possession of her, and the seller take possession of the purchase-money, and the purchaser then dispose of her, by sale, to another person at a profit, it is in that case incumbent on him [the purchaser] to bestow in charity the profit so acquired:—but if the first seller should have acquired a profit upon, or by means of, the purchase-money, he is not required to bestow such profit in charity. The reason of this distinction is that as the female slave (for instance) is a definite article, the second contract of sale relates identically to her, and the profit acquired by the sale of her is accordingly base.—Dirms and deenars, on the other hand, are not definite in valid contracts; and as the second contract is of a valid nature, it consequently does not relate to them identically, and accordingly the profit acquired by them is not base. This distinction, however, obtains only where the baseness is founded on the invalidity of the right; for where it is founded on the absolute non-existence of right of property,—

And so also, profit acquired upon any article in which no right of property exists.—(As where, for instance, a usurper acquires a profit upon the property he has usurped,)—there is no difference whatever;—that is, from whichever subject the profit is obtained, it is unlawful, and must be bestowed in charity; * because, where a person sells an article, the identical property of another (such as any article of household goods), the contract of sale relates to that actual article, and the profit acquired by it is accordingly unlawful;—where, on the other hand, a person purchases a thing with money belonging to another, although the contract do not relate to that actual money (since, if other money were given instead of it, the contract nevertheless holds good), still, however, there is a semblance of the contract relating to that particular money; for if he were to give that actual money to the seller, the article purchased in return would remain appropriated to him); or if, on the contrary, he were only to point to that money, and then give other money instead of it, the amount of the price of the article is, virtually, in that money;—for this reason, therefore, there is a semblance of the contract relating to that money, and consequently that the profit is acquired by means of the property of another person. Now, as the baseness occasioned by an invalidity of right is of less moment than that occasioned by the absolute non-existence of right, it follows that the baseness occasioned by the invalidity in the right of property occasions a semblance of baseness in anything in which the absolute non-existence of right occasions actual baseness (and that is anything of a definite nature, such as a slave girl, for instance, as in the case in question);—and, on the other hand, that it occasions an apprehension of a semblance of baseness in anything in which the absolute non-existence of right occasions only a semblance of baseness;—and regard is had to a semblance of baseness, but not to an apprehension of a semblance.—It is to be observed that if a person claim a debt from another of a thousand dirms, and obtain payment of the same, and both parties afterwards agree that the debt was not due,—in that case the profit which the claimant may in the meantime have acquired by possession of the money is lawful to him; because the baseness, in this instance, is occasioned by invalidity of right; for this reason, that the debt had been owing in consequence of the demand of the claimant, and the defendant's acknowledgment of it; and it afterwards appears that this debt is not the right of the claimant, but of the other (namely, the defendant): still, however, the thousand dirms which the claimant took in satisfaction for his demand have become his property, as the satisfaction for a claim becomes the property of the claimant, although it be under an invalid right;—and as the baseness, in this instance, is occasioned by the mere invalidity of right of property, and not by the absolute non-existence of that right, it consequently cannot operate, nor have any effect with respect to a thing of an indefinite nature, such as money, for instance.

Section.

Of Sales and Purchases which are Abominable.

It is abominable to enhance the price of merchandise by a fictitious tender of a high price.—THE PROPHET has prohibited the practice of Najish,—that is, the enhancement of the price of goods, by making a tender for them, without any intention to purchase them, but merely to incite others to the offer of a higher price. The prophet has also prohibited the purchase of a thing which has already been bargained for by another; but this prohibition supposes that both parties had before come to a mutual agreement; for otherwise there is no impropriety in such subsequent purchase.

Or, to anticipate or forestall the market.—THE PROPHET has also prohibited an anticipation of the market,—as where people meet the caravan, at a distance from the city, with a view of purchasing the grain brought by the merchants, in order to sell it to the people of the city at an enhanced price. This prohibition, however, proceeds on a supposition that the forestallers deceive the merchants with respect to the price of grain in the city; for otherwise there is no impropriety in this practice.

* For an explanation of the principle on which this proceeds, see Partnership, where it is declared that "profit cannot be lawfully acquired upon a property concerning which there is no responsibility."

Or to enhance the price of grain, in towns, by a citizen selling for the farmer.—THE PROPHET has also prohibited a citizen from selling for a countryman; as where, for instance, a countryman brings grain or other goods into a city, and one of the citizens takes care of it, and acts as his agent, in order that he may sell it at a high price to the people of the city. Some have given a different explanation of this prohibition, by supposing it to allude to a citizen's selling anything at a high price to a countryman: but in the Fattahal Kadeer of Moojtibba the former is mentioned as the most authentic explanation. It is to be observed, however, that this prohibition supposes that a scarcity of grain prevails in the city, as otherwise such conduct is not improper.

Or to buy or sell on a Friday.—It is abominable to buy or sell on a Friday,* after the crier proclaims the hour of prayer, because God has said, in the Koran, "WHEN YE ARE CALLED TO PRAYER, ON THE DAY OF THE ASSEMBLY, HASTEN TO THE COMMEMORATION OF GOD, AND LEAVE MERCHANTISING." Moreover, if at such time purchase and sale were allowed, an absolute duty (namely, attendance at prayers) would necessarily be omitted. It is to be observed, however, that although such purchases and sales be abominable, still they are not invalid; for the invalidity, in such instances, exists with respect merely to points that are extraneous and additional, and not with respect to the essentials of the contract, nor with respect to the establishment of any condition essential to its obligation.

Merchandise may be set up for sale to the highest bidder.—A SALE to the highest bidder is not abominable. Thus, if a merchant, for instance, having shown his wares to a purchaser, should receive from him a tender for them, but, before he had expressed his acquiescence, should receive a higher tender from another, in that case it is not abominable in him to sell them to the latter; because the prophet sold a cup and a sheet to a higher bidder; and also, because sales of this kind are for the interest of the poor.

It is abominable to separate two infant slaves (or an infant and an adult), related within the prohibited degrees, by a sale of one of them.—It is abominable for a person possessing two infant slaves, related to each other within the prohibited degrees, to separate them from each other; and the rule is the same where one of them is an infant and the other an adult. This decision is founded on a declaration of the prophet, "Whosoever causes a separation between a mother and her children, shall himself, on the day of judgment, be separated from his friends by God." It is, moreover, related that the prophet gave two infant brothers to Alee, and afterwards inquired of Alee concerning them, and being answered by him, that "he had sold one of them," the prophet then said "take heed! take heed!" and repeatedly enjoined him to take him back. Besides, one infant naturally conceives an attachment to another, and an adult person participates in the sorrow of an infant, and hence the separation of them in either case argues a want of tenderness to a child, which has been reprobated in the traditions, where it is declared, "Whosoever does not show tenderness to a CHILD, and respect to an ELDER, is not of my people." A separation, therefore, either between two infants, or between an adult and an infant, is prohibited. It is to be observed that the cause of the prohibition, in this instance, is affinity within such a degree only as prohibits marriage between the slaves in question, and not general affinity, for which reason any distant relation, such as a step-mother, or one prohibited by fosterage, or by affinity with the fosterer, are not included; nor the son of the uncle; nor any one that is not within the prohibited degrees. Neither are a husband and a wife included in this prohibition, notwithstanding they be both infants, and they may consequently be separated, because the tradition which contains the prohibition, as being contrary to analogy, must therefore be observed in its literal sense; that is, it must be applied to such only as are within the prohibited degrees. Moreover, in the aforesaid tradition, both relations are required to be the property of one master: if, therefore, one infant brother belong to Zeyd, and another infant brother to Omar, each is at liberty to sell his respective property.

Unless in the pursuance of an indispensable duty, or in cases of unavoidable necessity.—It is allowed, likewise, to separate two infant slaves related to each other, if with a view to fulfil an incumbent duty, as where one of the two commits a crime, and is given up, as a compensation for such crime, to the avenger of the offence. In the same manner, also, one of the two may be sold, for the payment of a debt incurred by him in the course of purchase and sale, in consequence of his being a privileged slave,—or, by the destruction of the property of another,—in either of which cases that slave may be sold alone, in discharge of the debt, although this induce a separation. So also, it is lawful to return one of the two to the seller of them, in case he should prove defective. The adjudication, in all these cases, proceeds on this principle, that the object of the prophet in this prohibition was to prevent an injury to the infants without detriment to the proprietor; an object which, if the prohibition were extended to these cases, must necessarily be defeated.

But such sale is nevertheless valid.—It is to be observed, however, that if a person separate one infant from another, or an infant from an adult, by selling one of them, such sale is valid: yet still the act of separation is abominable. It is recorded, from

* Friday is the Mussulman Sabbath.

Abou Yoosaf, that a sale of this nature is invalid only where the relation of paternity (such as mother and son, for instance) exists between the parties; but that in all other cases it is valid. Another report, from Abou Yoosaf, mentions that sales of this nature are invalid in all cases where the separation is abominable, because of the tradition already mentioned with respect to Alee; for the prophet positively enjoined him to take back the slave he had sold, whence it may be inferred that he considered the sale as invalid, since a return of the commodity is not admitted but in an invalid sale. The reasoning of Haneefa and Mohammed is that, in the case in question, the sale is transacted by a competent person, and with respect to a fit subject: it is therefore valid; and the abomination does not apply to anything except what is merely a concomitant, or immediate effect of the sale, namely, the distress occasioned to the two infants, which is a degree of abomination exactly equivalent to that of a person purchasing a thing over the head of another, from whence no invalidity arises. Moreover, the order of the prophet to Alee to take back the slave must be construed either into a dissolution of the sale, or a repurchase of the slave from the person to whom he had sold him.

Adult slaves may be separated without offence.—It is not abominable to separate two slaves that are adults, notwithstanding they be related within the prohibited degrees; for this case falls not under the ordinance before mentioned; and there is an authentic tradition of the prophet having occasioned a separation between Maria and Sireen, two female slaves that were sisters.

CHAPTER VI.

OF AKALA, OR THE DISSOLUTION OF SALES.

Definition of Akala.—AKALA literally signifies to cancel. —In the language of the LAW it means the cancelling or dissolution of a sale.

A sale may be dissolved in consideration of an equivalent to the price.—THE dissolution of a sale is lawful, provided it be for an equivalent to the original price, because the prophet has said "whosoever makes an AKALA with one who has repented of his bargain, shall receive an AKALA of his sins from God, on the day of judgment;"—and also, because, as the contract of sale comprehends the rights of both parties, namely, the buyer and the seller, they have therefore the power of dissolving such contract, to answer their own purposes.

But not for anything greater or less.—If, however, either a greater or less sum than the original price be stipulated as the condition of the dissolution, such condition is null, and the dissolution holds good; and the seller must return to the purchaser a sum equal to the original price.—It is a rule with Haneefa, that a dissolution is a breaking off of the contract with respect to both the parties, but a sale de novo with respect to others. If, therefore, the breaking off be impracticable, the dissolution is null.—According to Abou Yoosaf, on the other hand, it is a sale de novo: but if a new sale should from any cause be impracticable, then it must be considered as a breaking off; and in case of that also being impracticable, the dissolution then becomes null.—The opinion of Mohammed is that it is a breaking off; and in failure of this, from impracticability, a sale de novo; and in case of that also being impracticable, it is null.—The argument of Mohammed is that Akala, in its literal sense, signifies dissolution; and, in its constructive sense, sale (whence it is a sale de novo with relation to all others than the parties): it is therefore regarded as a dissolution or breaking off, agreeably to the literal meaning of the term; or, if the breaking off be impracticable, it is regarded as a sale, agreeably to the constructive meaning.—The argument of Abou Yoosaf is that Akala means an exchange of property for property with the mutual consent of the parties, which corresponds with the definition of sale, and is also subject to the same rules; whence it is that, in case of the loss of the wares in the possession of the purchaser after the conclusion of the Akala, or dissolution, it [the Akala] is null; and also, that the seller is allowed to return the wares to the purchaser in case of their having been blemished or become defective whilst in the hands of the purchaser; and that the right of Shaffa is also established by it.—Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that Akala means a dissolution, or breaking off, and cannot, by any construction of it, be supposed to mean sale, although the breaking off should be impracticable; because sale and dissolution are terms of opposite import, which no one word can be supposed to bear:—if, therefore, the breaking off be impracticable, the Akala is null. With regard to its being a sale de novo, in relation to others, this is a mere matter of necessity, as to them it exhibits similar effects with sale; that is to say, the seller, in virtue of the Akala, becomes again proprietor of the wares; and it is accordingly a sale with respect to all others than the seller and purchaser, for this reason, and not because of the meaning of the word, which in reality is the opposite of sale.—Such are the opinions and arguments of our three doctors with regard to Akala.—Hence it appears that if a stipulation be made, that the seller shall return to the purchaser a sum greater than the original price, the dissolution, agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, would hold good to the amount of the original price; because (according to his tenets) Akala is a dissolution; and a dissolution cannot possibly relate to the excess, as there is no sale which might be opposed to such excess; and it is impossible to dissolve what does not exist:—the condition, therefore, is invalid, but not the dissolution, as that is not rendered null by involving an invalid condition.—It is otherwise with respect to sale (that is, the sale of one DIRM for two DIRMS, for instance),—for if a person should sell one dirm for two dirms, such sale would be invalid; nor could it be construed as existing with respect to one dirm, and as null with respect to the additional one, so as to be a sale lawful; because the establishment of an excess in sale is possible, as that is an establishment of a matter as yet unestablished, and it is no way difficult to establish an unestablished point; but if the excess dirm were established, it would induce usury:—a sale of this nature, therefore, is invalid.—The conclusion therefore is, that the dissolution in question is valid, but the condition is otherwise. The law is also the same where a stipulation of a smaller amount than the original price is made; that is to say, the dissolution holds good, but the condition is void; because, the sale being established with regard to the original price, and the deficiency not then existing, it follows that the dissolution can apply only to what does exist,—namely, the original price,—since it is impossible to dissolve what does not exist.—If, however, this deficiency be stipulated on account of a defect which had taken place in the wares, it is lawful.—In the opinion of the two disciples, the stipulation of a sum exceeding the original price, in a dissolution, amounts to a sale:—according to Abou Yoosaf, because (as has been already explained) he considers Akala as a sale;—and also according to Mohammed, because, although he be of opinion that a dissolution is a breaking off, yet he has said that, in case of the impracticability of a breaking off, it must be considered as a sale; and as the dissolution in question is of that nature, he is therefore of opinion it is a sale.—With respect to a dissolution in which is stipulated an amount less than the original price, Abou Yoosaf (proceeding on his general opinion concerning dissolutions), considers it as a sale; but in the opinion of Mohammed it is a dissolution with respect to the whole of the original price; because he considers the deficiency to be a silence maintained with respect to a part of the price; and as the dissolution would have been valid if a silence had been maintained with respect to the whole, so it is in a superior degree valid when the silence is maintained only with respect to a part. A dissolution, stipulating a smaller sum than the original price, in a case where the wares have been blemished in the hands of the purchaser, is considered by Mahommed as a dissolution; the deficiency being opposed to the blemish.

Dissolution, in consideration of an equivalent of a different kind, is a breaking off.—If a dissolution be agreed upon, stipulating, in lieu of the original price, an equivalent of a different kind, it is a breaking off,* according to Haneefa, for the original price; and the stipulation of a different kind is nugatory. The two disciples consider this dissolution as a sale, founding their opinion on their ideas of the nature of dissolutions, as already explained.

The sale of a female slave cannot be annulled after she has borne a child.—If a dissolution of sale take place with respect to a female slave who had borne a child whilst in the possession of the purchaser, it is null, according to Haneefa, because (agreeably to his tenets) a dissolution is a breaking off; and the birth of the child is preventive of a dissolution, as this is a supervenient addition of a separate thing; and such addition, after seisin, prevents a dissolution of the bargain.—This dissolution, however, is considered as a sale by the two disciples.

A sale may be dissolved previous to delivery and seisin of the article.—THE dissolution of a sale previous to taking possession of the article sold, whether of a moveable or immoveable description, is a breaking off, according to Haneefa. According to Abou Yoosaf, it is a breaking off with regard to moveable property only, because a sale of moveable property, previous to taking possession of it, is not lawful, and hence a dissolution with respect to moveable property, previous to the seisin of it, cannot be considered as a sale, and is consequently a breaking off. A dissolution with respect to immoveable property, on the contrary, previous to the taking possession of it, is a sale (according to Abou Yoosaf), as he holds that the sale of immoveable property, previous to the seisin of it, is lawful.

THE loss or destruction of the wares is a bar to the legality of a dissolution, but not the destruction of the price; because a dissolution is the breaking off of sale, and the breaking off of a sale rests upon the existence of the sale; and this again relates to the wares, not to the price.

Barter may be dissolved, after a destruction of one of the subjects.—IN cases of Mookayeza, or a sale of goods for goods,* a dissolution agreed upon after the destruction of one of the two subjects is valid; because each of them falls under the description of the subject of the sale; and applying this term, therefore, to the one that remains, it follows that the dissolution is lawful, because of the existence of the subject of the sale.

CHAPTER VII.

OF MOORABIHAT, AND TAWLEEAT, THAT IS, SALES OF PROFIT AND OF FRIENDSHIP.†

Definition of Moorabihat and Tawleeat.—MOORABIHAT, or a sale of profit, means

* That is, barter:—the term by which Mookayeza will be hereafter always expressed.

† Moorabihat and Tawleeat are technical terms, which (like many others, in this work)

case he is not entitled to sell it again with an addition of profit. The two disciples maintain that he is in both cases entitled to sell it for a profit on the last price, namely, ten dirms; and their reasons are, that the repurchase is a new contract, and has no connexion with the effects of the former sale; and that therefore a profit may be imposed, founded on the second contract; in the same manner as if the second purchaser should sell it to a third purchaser, and the first purchaser repurchase it from the third one, in which case it would be lawful for the first purchaser to sell it at a profit on the last price, and so also in the case in question. The argument of Haneefa is, that in the case in question, there is an apprehension of the first profit being obtained by means of the second contract, since until the person repurchased the cloth there was a possibility that he might return it upon the seller's hands in consequence of a defect, and that his [the seller's] profit might thereby have been lost, although upon his repurchasing it from the purchaser, this possibility vanishes, and the profit remains confirmed and established. The apprehension, however, had existed; and in Moorabihat sales apprehension is regarded as equivalent to certainty, out of caution (whence it is that a profit of this nature is not allowed upon anything given in composition; in other words, if a person be indebted to another to the amount of ten dirms, for instance, and he compound the debt with his creditor by a piece of cloth, it is not lawful for the creditor to sell this cloth at a profit of this nature over and above ten dirms, because in the composition it is to be apprehended that the value of the cloth was short of ten dirms, as composition is founded upon remission of a part).—In the case in question, therefore, the seller, because of the apprehension above stated, appears, in consequence of the second contract, to have purchased five dirms, together with the cloth, for ten dirms; he must therefore deduct five dirms from the whole, and declare that "the cloth has fallen to him for five dirms;" and take his profit upon those five. It is otherwise where the second purchaser sells the cloth to a third person, and the first seller then repurchases it from this person; for in this case the acquisition of the first profit is confirmed and established by means of the second purchaser's having sold it into the hands of another, and not by means of the first seller repurchasing it from the third person so as to leave any room for apprehension in this case also. There is therefore a material difference between this case, and the case under consideration, and consequently it is evident that the analogy adduced by the two disciples is unfounded.

Case of Moorabihat transacted by a privileged slave with his owner.—If a privileged slave, involved in debt, should purchase a piece of cloth for ten dirms, and afterwards sell it to his master for fifteen dirms, and the master wish to sell the said cloth in the manner of Moorabihat, he must set his profit upon ten dirms. In the same manner, if a master purchase a piece of cloth for ten dirms, and sell it to his privileged slave for fifteen dirms, the slave is not entitled to dispose of it at a profit upon more than ten dirms. The reason of this is that, in both cases, there is a semblance of illegality in the sale: because the property of the slave being, as it were, the property of his master, it appears that the master, in the first case, purchases his own property: and that, in the second case, he sells his own property to himself.

Case of Moorabihat transacted between the manager of a stock and the proprietor.—

If a person give to another ten dirms, in the way of Mozaribat, stipulating that the profit acquired therefrom shall be equally divided between them, and the Mozarib, or manager so constituted, purchase with the said money a piece of cloth, and then sell it to his constituent for fifteen dirms, and the constituent afterward wish to dispose of it by a profitable sale, he is not allowed to fix the price at more than twelve and a half dirms. The reason of this is, that although the purchase made by the proprietor of a Moorabihat stock from his manager be, in fact, the purchasing of his own property with his own property, yet such purchase is held to be lawful by our doctors: because the proprietor of the stock has no power over it whilst in the hands of the manager; and as this power, which is a desirable object, resulted to him from the purchase, the said purchase, because of its being the means of procuring to him an object of desire, is therefore lawful; nevertheless, as there is in this case an appearance of invalidity of sale (since the constituent did as it were purchase his own property with his own property, by which means a mutual exchange of respective property did not take place), the purchase is therefore reckoned null so far as regards the half of the profit; and accordingly, in the case in question, the profit must be imposed upon twelve and a half dirms.

An article may be disposed of by Moorabihat, where a defect has intervened not proceeding from the seller, or where the seller has used the article, in the wife in, without injury to it.—If a person purchase a female slave, and she afterwards, without any appearance of violence, but merely from a natural cause, become blind of an eye,—or if, being a woman,* he cohabit with her, without harm accruing,—it is in either case lawful for him to dispose of her by Moorabihat, without giving any explanation of either of these circumstances; for neither in consequence of the blindness or the cohabitation does any thing remain to him in opposition to which a deduction might be made from the price; because no part of the price is opposed to the quality of the article (whence it is that if the quality be destroyed previous to seisin by the purchaser, no deduction from the price would on that account be allowed); and in the same manner, no part of the price is opposed to the use of a woman's person. It is reported, from Aboo Yoosaf, that in the first case the slave must not be disposed of in the manner of Moorabihat, without an explanation being given of the blindness, any more than where blindness occasioned by violence: and this opinion has been adopted by Shafei.

* Arab. Sayeeba: in opposition to a virgin. The reason for restricting the case to mulubrity in this instance, is that cohabitation with a woman is not considered as a depreciation of her value:—contrary to the case of deflowering a virgin.

But if the defect be occasioned by, or compensated to, the seller, a proportionable deduction must be made from the price.—It is to be observed, that if the purchaser himself had occasioned the blindness, or if it had been occasioned by another from whom the purchaser either had or had not received an amercement, he is not in either of these cases entitled to dispose of the slave by Moorabihat, without giving an explanation of the blindness; because here the purchaser (or another) did with design or intention destroy the eye; and it is consequently requisite that a proportionable deduction be made for a defect so occasioned. The same rule also obtains where a purchaser has cohabitation with a female slave who is a virgin; because virginity, being merely a tender membrane, is a constituent part of the slave, and this the purchaser has destroyed.

If the article be damaged by an accident not proceeding from the seller, still it is a proper subject of Moorabihat.—If cloth which a person had purchased be burnt by fire, or damaged by vermin, in that case it is lawful for the purchaser to dispose of it by Moorabihat without explaining either of these circumstances; but if the cloth be torn in the folding and opening of it, it is not lawful for the purchaser thus to dispose of it without noticing the same to the party, because the damage, in this case, is occasioned by his own deed.

A misstatement of a prompt payment instead of a suspended payment, leaves it in power of the purchaser to undo the bargain in a sale either of profit.—If a person, having purchased a slave (for instance) for one thousand dirms, payable at a future period, should afterwards sell him for one thousand dirms, payable immediately, with a profit of one hundred dirms, without noticing to the other the respite of payment he himself has obtained,—in that case the other, if he should afterwards discover this circumstance, is at liberty either to abide by or undo the bargain at his option; because the suspension of the payment resembles an addition to the substance of the wares; and hence it is a custom amongst merchants, in granting a respite of payment, to increase the price of the merchandise. Now a semblance, in a sale by profit, is deemed equivalent to reality; and hence it follows that the said person did, as it were, purchase two things for one thousand dirms, namely, a slave and a suspension of payment; and afterwards sold only one of these things by way of profit, grounded on the price which he paid for both; a fraud from which an abstinence is particularly enjoined in cases of Moorabihat:—the purchaser, therefore, has an option of adhering to or undoing the bargain as he pleases, as in the option from defect. If, however, the purchaser should destroy the wares, and then receive notice of the fraud which had been practised upon him, he is not in such case entitled to make any deduction on that account from the price, because no part of the price is in reality opposed to the suspension of payment.

Or of friendship.—If a person, having purchased a slave (for instance) for a thousand dirms, payable at a future period, should afterwards dispose of him to another, by a Tawleat, for a thousand dirms ready money, without intimating the respite of payment, in that case the other, on discovery of this circumstance, is at liberty either to abide by or annul the contract, as he pleases; because an abstinence from a fraud of this nature is equally enjoined in friendly as in profitable sales.—If, however, in this case, the purchaser, having destroyed the slave, should then become acquainted with the suspension of payment that had been granted to the seller, it is incumbent on him to make a prompt payment according to the agreement; nor is he entitled to make any deduction from the price on the score of suspension of payment, as before explained.—It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the purchaser is in this case to pay the value to the seller, and to receive from him the whole of the price; in the same manner as holds (according to him) in a case where a creditor, having received payment of the debt due to him in a bad specie, discovers this circumstance after having expended them;—in which case he has a right to return to the debtor a similar number of the specie he had received, and to demand from him a like number of good specie.—Some have said that an appraisement ought to be made of the value in the case of prompt payment, and also in the case of a distant payment; and that the difference should be given by the seller to the purchaser.—All that has been here advanced proceeds on a supposition of the suspension of the payment being included in the contract of sale; for if, without such stipulation, it should happen that the payment be made at a distant period (as is often the case amongst merchants), there subsists, in such case, a difference of opinion upon this point, whether, under these circumstances, in a subsequent sale of profit or of friendship, it be incumbent upon him to make known this matter.—Some have said that such notification is incumbent upon him, since an established custom is equivalent to a condition.—Others, again, allege, that he is under no necessity of giving such notification, since it is evident that, as no condition was stipulated, the sale was therefore for prompt payment.

In a sale of friendship the rate must be specified; and the purchaser has a right of option until after the specification.—If a person dispose of a thing to another by a sale of friendship, declaring that “he sells it to him at the rate it had stood him in,”—and the purchaser be not acquainted with that rate, the sale is invalid, from the uncertainty with regard to the price:—if, however, the seller should afterwards inform the purchaser of the rate, at the same meeting, the sale then becomes valid, but it still remains in the option of the purchaser to abide by or recede from the contract as he pleases, since the acquiescence he had before expressed was not fully established, from his ignorance of the price and after the knowledge of it he has an option, in the same manner as in the case of an option of inspection. The reason of the validity of this sale is that the invalidity does not become firmly established until the departure of the parties from the meeting.—When, therefore, the purchaser, in the meeting, is informed of the price, it becomes the same as if a new contract had taken place after the purchaser had acquired this knowledge; and it is for him to withhold his acquiescence until the end of the meeting.—If, however, the parties should separate, the invalidity then becomes fixed; nor can it be removed by any knowledge which the purchaser may afterwards obtain of the amount of the price.—Similar to this is the case where a person sells cloth for the value which is marked upon it, but of which the purchaser is ignorant; for such sale is invalid, but may be rendered otherwise by the explanation of the seller, before the breaking up of the meeting.

Section.

Moveable property cannot be re-sold before seisin.—It is not lawful for a person to sell moveable property, which he may have purchased, until he receive possession of the same, because the prophet has prohibited the sale of a thing prior to the seisin of it on the part of the seller; and also, because there is an unfairness in it, since, if the merchandise should be lost or destroyed before the seisin, the first sale becomes null, and the property reverts to the former proprietor, in which case it must necessarily appear that the person in question has sold the property of another without his consent.

But land may be re-sold previous to seisin by the first purchaser.—THE sale of land,* previous to seisin, is lawful, according to Huneefa and Aboo Yoosaf. Mohammed maintains that it is unlawful; because the traditional saying of the prophet before quoted is absolute, and not particularly confined to moveable property; and also, because of its analogy to moveable property. Besides, the sale of land is similar to the hire of it; in other words, as it is unlawful to let land before seisin, so is it likewise to sell land before seisin. The reasoning of the two disciples is that, in the case in question, the sale is effected by competent parties with respect to a fit subject;—that there is no unfairness in it, since the destruction of ground is rare, whereas that of moveable property is probable;—and that the prohibition of the prophet is founded on the possibility of the unfairness already explained, which does not exist in the case of land, the destruction of it being rare.—Some have asserted that a lease of land before seisin, as adduced by Mohammed, is lawful in the opinion of the two disciples.—Admitting, however, that it were unlawful according to all our doctors, it proceeds evidently on this principle, that a lease is made with a view to the produce, the destruction of which not being uncommon, the unfairness already explained (with respect to the sale of moveable property before seisin) may consequently take place in it. This, however, cannot happen with respect to the sale of ground, the destruction of which is rare, and consequently the one case is not analogous to the other.

In the re-sale of articles of weight, and measurement of capacity, it is requisite that the article be weighed or measured again by the second purchaser.—If a person purchase articles estimable by a measure of capacity, such as wheat,—or articles of weight, such as butter,—as if he should say, “I have purchased this wheat, on condition of its being equal to ten bushels,”—or “this butter, on condition of its weighing ten maas,”—and if, having measured or weighed these articles accordingly, he should then take them and sell them to another, on the same condition of measure or weight, in that case it is not lawful for that other to sell or use these articles, until he has measured or weighed them on his own account; because the prophet has prohibited the sale of wheat until it be measured both by the buyer and the seller; and also, because there is a possibility of these articles exceeding the warranted quantity; in which case the excess, as being the property of the seller, would not be lawful to the purchaser; and an abstinence in the case of this possibility is necessary.—It is otherwise where the sale is made by conjecture, without any condition of measurement; for the excess, in that case, is the right of the purchaser; and it is also otherwise in the sale of cloth by yards, for there likewise the excess is the right of the purchaser; since yards (as has been already explained) are a description of the cloth, and not a quantity, as in the case of articles of weight or measure of capacity.—It is to be observed that the measurement of the cloth by the seller, previous to the sale, is not valid, although it should have been done in the presence of the purchaser, because the measurement of both the seller and purchaser is required, and these terms are not applicable to the parties until after the sale takes place. So also, the measurement made by the seller after the sale is invalid, unless it be in the presence of the purchaser, because the object of measurement is delivery, and delivery without the presence of the purchaser is impracticable.

It suffices, however, that the article be weighed or measured by the seller, in the purchaser's presence.—If the seller only should measure the merchandise after the sale, in presence of the purchaser, a question has arisen, whether this be sufficient?—or, whether it be not necessary that the purchaser should also examine it by his own measure?—Some have said that the measurement of it by the seller only, is not sufficient, according to the plain sense of the tradition already quoted. The more approved doctrine, however, is that it is sufficient, since by the measurement of the seller the quantity is ascertained, and delivery completely established. The tradition before quoted alludes to the junction of two contracts; as where, for instance, a person having purchased, measured, and taken possession of a thing, afterwards sell it to another; in which case it is necessary that the second purchaser himself measure it; and the measurement of the first purchaser, who stands in the relation of seller to him, is not sufficient, as will hereafter be more fully explained in the chapter of Sillim sales.

In the re-sale of articles of tale or longitudinal measurement, the telling or measuring by the second purchaser is not requisite.—It is related as an opinion of the two disciples, that articles of tale are analogous to those of longitudinal measurement; that is, if a person, having purchased and received articles of this nature on condition of their amounting to a particular number, should afterwards sell them to another on the same condition, there is, in that case, no obligation on that other to enumerate them on his own account, because such articles are not susceptible of usury.—It is related, also, as an opinion of Hanefaa, that articles of tale are similar to those of weight, because in regard to them the receipt of any excess beyond the stipulated number is unlawful to the purchaser: articles of tale are therefore analogous to articles of weight.

A seller may dispose of the price of his goods without having taken possession of it.—

ANY deeds of the seller with regard to the price of the merchandise, prior to the actual receipt of it, such as gift, sale, hire, or bequest, is lawful, whether the price be stipulated in money or goods;—because the cause of legality, namely, right of property, is established in the seller; and the act is attended with no unfairness (such as has been shown to exist in the case of selling moveable property prior to the receipt of it), because the price, if expressed in dirms and deenars, is indeterminate, and is therefore incapable of being destroyed; and if it consist of any thing else, still the sale is not invalidated by a destruction, since the value remains due from the seller.—It is otherwise with respect to the article purchased, as the sale of that before receipt of it induces fraud, as was before explained.

The parties are at liberty to make any subsequent addition or abatement, with respect either to the goods or the price; and such addition or abatement are incorporated in the contract.—It is lawful for the purchaser to make an increase of the price in favour of the seller; and for the seller to make an increase in the merchandise in favour of the purchaser;—and it is also lawful for the seller to make abatement from the price in favour of the purchaser; and this increase or abatement is incorporated in the original contract (that is to say, in case of an increase, the original and additional form the price of the article; and in case of an abatement, what remains after the deduction is the price of the article). Hence, in the first case, the seller possesses a right to the original price, together with the increase superadded to it; and, in the second case, the purchaser has a right to the original merchandise with the increase superadded. Shafei and Ziffer are both of opinion that such increase is a mere act of favour, and therefore cannot be incorporated in the original sale; for, if so, it must necessarily follow that a person gives his own property in exchange for his own property, since, previous to the increase of the price, the article was the property of the purchaser in exchange for the original price; and, consequently, if the increase be made in the price, the property of the purchaser is given in exchange for what was before his property: in the same manner, also, in the second case, as the price, previous to the increase, was the property of the seller, it follows that in increasing the wares, he gives his own property in exchange for his own property.—Neither can an abatement from the price, by the seller, be incorporated with the original contract; but it must rather be considered as an act of favour; because, prior to the abatement, an exchange of the merchandise for the whole of the price had taken place; and it is impossible to set aside any part of the price, since in such case it must follow that a part of the merchandise had no correspondent exchange opposed to it; and this is unlawful.

OBJECTION.—This consequence does not follow; because the remaining sum, after the deduction of the abatement, is considered as an exchange for the whole of the merchandise.

REPLY.—It is impossible to consider the remainder as an exchange for the whole, because no new contract has taken place with regard to the diminished price, and the old contract relates only to the full price.

which is not approved.—The reason of this is that the lending of money is, in the immediate act, equivalent to a loan of any other thing,* and an act of benevolence (whence it is that if a person should tender a loan of money to another, expressing his intention by the word Areet,—as if he should say, “I deliver these ten dirms as an Areet,”—it is valid; and also, that no person who is incapable of any gratuitous act, such as an infant or a lunatic, is competent to this deed): but in the end it operates as an exchange, since the borrower gives to the lender an equal sum, but not the identical specie he received.—In consideration, therefore, of the immediate act, a respite is not binding upon the lender, as there can be no constraint in an act purely gratuitous; and, in consideration of the end, the respite is not approved, for in this case the transaction would resolve itself into a sale of money for money, which is usury.—It is otherwise in the bequest of a loan for a fixed period; for if a person bequeath the loan of one thousand dirms to another, for a year (for instance), the performance of this is incumbent on the executor; nor is he entitled to make any demand on the legatee until the expiration of the term, since this bequest is of a gratuitous nature, and resembles the bequest of the services of a slave, or the use of a house.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF RIBBA, OR USURY.

Definition of the term.—RIBBA, in the language of the LAW, signifies an excess, according to a legal standard of measurement or weight, in one of two homogeneous articles [of weight or measurement of capacity] opposed to each other in a contract of exchange, and in which such excess is stipulated as an obligatory condition on one of the parties, without any return,—that is, without anything being opposed to it. The sale, therefore, of two loads of barley (for instance) in exchange for one load of wheat does not constitute usury, since these articles are not homogeneous:—and, on the other hand, the sale of ten yards of Herat cloth in exchange for five yards of Herat cloth is not usury, since, although these articles be homogeneous, still they are not estimable by weight or measurement of capacity.

Usury (occasioned by rate united with species) is unlawful.—USURY is unlawful; and (according to our doctors) is occasioned by rate,† united with species.—Shafei maintains that usury takes place only in things of an esculent nature, or in money.—It is necessary, in order to the operation of the illegality, that the articles be homogeneous; but an equality in point of weight or measurement of capacity annihilates the usury.—It is to be observed that a superiority or inferiority in the quality has no effect in the establishment of the usury; and hence it is lawful to sell a quantity of the better sort of any article in exchange for an equal quantity of an inferior sort.

It consists in the sale of an article (of weight or measurement of capacity) in exchange for an unequal quantity of the same article.—THE sale, at an unequal rate, of articles of weight or measurement of capacity, in exchange for homogeneous articles, is usurious, according to our doctors, although the articles be of a description not esculent (such as loam or iron, for instance);—because they hold that the cause of usury exists, in articles of weight and measurement of capacity, although they be not of an esculent nature. Shafei maintains that such sale is lawful, agreeably to his tenets with respect to usury. Supposing, however, the equality of the rate, such sale is lawful in the opinion of all the doctors.—(It is to be observed that loam is an article of measurement by capacity, and iron of weight.)

But does not exist where the quantities are not ascertained by some known standard of measurement.—THE sale of anything not measured out according to the legal standard, at an unequal rate, is lawful. Thus it is lawful to sell one handful of wheat in exchange for two handfuls; or two handfuls in exchange for four;—and also, one apple in exchange for two apples; because, in such case, the measurement not having been made according to a legal standard, it follows that a superiority of measurement (which is essential to the establishment of usury) has not, according to the rules of measurement, taken place. Shafei maintains that such sale is unlawful; because the article is, in this instance, of an esculent nature, which (according to his tenets) is the efficient cause of usury; and also because the equality destructive of usury does not here exist. (It is to be observed that whatever is less than half of a Saa is considered equivalent to an handful, since the law has fixed no standard of measure beneath that quantity.)

It is occasioned either by an inequality in point of quantity, or by a suspension of repayment; unless the consideration and the return be heterogeneous.—WHERE the quality of being weighable or measurable by capacity, and correspondence of species (being the causes of usury) both exist, the stipulation of inequality, or of a suspension of payment to a future period, are both usurious. Thus it is usurious to sell either one measure

* Literally, “a KARZ is, in its immediate occurrence, equivalent to an AREEAT.”

† It may be necessary here to observe that rate, amongst the Mussulmans, applies only to articles of weight or measurement of capacity, and not to articles of longitudinal measurement, such as cloth, or the like.—The phrase here used implies an inequality of RATE with a similarity of SPECIES.

of wheat in exchange for two measures,—or one measure of wheat for one measure deliverable at a future period. If, on the contrary, neither of these circumstances exist (as in the sale of wheat for money), it is lawful either to stipulate a superiority of rate, or the payment at a future period. If, on the other hand, one of these circumstances only exist (as in the sale of wheat for barley, or the sale of one slave for another), then a superiority in the rate may legally be stipulated, but not a suspension in the payment. Thus one measure of wheat may lawfully be sold for two measures of barley, or one slave for two slaves; but it is not lawful to sell one measure of wheat for one measure of barley payable at a future period; nor one slave for another, deliverable at a future period. Shafei is of opinion that correspondence of species alone does not render illegal a suspension of delivery; because where, in an exchange, a prompt delivery is opposed to a future delivery, there is only a semblance of a superiority of rate, founded on the preference given to prompt payment. Now if a superiority of rate, in reality, be not preventive of the legality of the sale (as in the case of one slave for two slaves), it follows that the semblance only of a superiority is not preventive of such legality, a fortiori. The arguments of our doctors are, that wherever either correspondence of species, or the quality of being weighable or measurable exists, the wares are, in one shape, of that description in which usury takes place; and accordingly, a semblance of usury takes place in them, which is repugnant to the legality of the sale in the same manner as actual usury. The ground of this is what is written in the Hadees Shireef, that “articles of different species may be sold in any manner the parties please, provided the bargain be from hand to hand.”

OBJECTION.—Since correspondence or species, or the quality of being weighable or measurable does either of them singly prevent the legality of a suspension of delivery, it would follow that a contract of Sillim sale stipulating an exchange of saffron for dirms or deenars, is invalid, as both are articles of weight:—whereas such a sale is valid.

REPLY.—The contract is lawful, notwithstanding saffron and deenars be both articles of weight, because they do not agree in the quality of the weight, as saffron is weighed by Mans, and being a subject of sale only, is therefore definite by specification; whereas dirms and deenars are weighed by stones, being only price and not a subject of sale; and therefore do not become definite by specification. In the same manner, also, if a person should sell saffron to another for one hundred dirms, ready money, that other may lawfully employ the said dirms either in purchase or in any other mode without reweighing them:—whereas if a person sell saffron, on condition of its being two Mans, the purchaser is not afterwards at liberty to dispose of it by sale or by any other mode without reweighing it; as holds with respect to all articles of weight or measurement of capacity. Now it being thus demonstrated that the weight of saffron and other articles is different from the weight of dirms and deenars, in appearance, substance, and effect, it follows that they do not unite in any circumstance with respect to the quality of the weight; and consequently, that the semblance of usury, in this case, is only an apprehension of a semblance, which is not regarded.

All articles ordained by the prophet to be articles of measurement, continue so, notwithstanding any alterations of custom;—and the same of all ordained by him to be articles of weight.—EVERY THING in which the usuriousness of an excess has been established by the prophet on the ground of measurement of capacity (such as wheat, barley, dates, and salt), is for ever to be considered as of that nature, although mankind should forsake this mode of estimation;—and in the same manner, everything in which the usuriousness of the excess has been established by the prophet on the ground of weight, continues for ever to be considered as an article of weight, like gold or silver; because the custom of mankind, which regulates the mode of measurement, is of inferior force to the declaration of the prophet; and a superior cannot yield to an inferior. (Abou Yoosaf is of opinion that in all things practice or custom ought to prevail, although in opposition to the ordinance of the prophet; for the ordinance of the prophet was founded on usage and practice of his own time:—in ordinances, therefore, the prevalent customs among mankind are to be regarded; and as these are liable to alter, they must be attended to, rather than the letter of an ordinance.) If, therefore, a person should sell wheat in exchange for an equal quantity, by weight, or gold in exchange for an equal quantity, by a measurement of capacity, neither of these sales would be lawful (according to Haneefa and Mohammed), although these modes of weighing wheat and measuring gold should become sanctified by the custom of mankind.

All articles referred to any known standard of weight are considered as articles of weight.

—WHATEVER is referred to Ratls is considered as an article of weight. This the compiler of the Hedaya explains to mean that whatever is sold by the *Awkiyat must be considered as an article of weight; for an Awkiyat is a fixed standard of weight in opposition to all other measures of capacity, as none else are standards of weight. Now as everything sold by the Awkiyat comes under the description of an article of weight, it follows that if this thing be sold by the measurement of any other vessel not of a fixed standard of weight, opposed to a similar vessel, such sale is unlawful, because of the probability of a disparity of weight, notwithstanding the equality in point of measurement of capacity; for this, in fact, is the same as if one person should sell one article of weight in exchange for another of the same kind and adjust the quantity by conjecture.

* This term has been formerly mentioned to signify an ounce. (See Vol. I. p. 9.) From the context, however, it would appear that it also signifies a measure of capacity.

Note concerning Sirf sale.—It is to be observed that a Sirf sale means the sale of price in exchange for price; and price implies dirms and deenars. In this mode of sale it is a necessary condition that the interchange of properties take place at the meeting, because the prophet has ordained the sale of silver in exchange for silver, from hand to hand,—as shall be explained at large in treating of Sillim sales: but in every other article, provided it be of that kind in which usury takes place (such as wheat in exchange for wheat, for instance), the interchange upon the spot is not a condition, it being only required that the article be specific. Shafei maintains that in the sale of wheat for wheat mutual seisin is a condition, because of the ordinance of the prophet, "Sell it from hand to hand;" and also because, if one party should make seisin, and not the other, it follows that an appearance of usury takes place inasmuch as prompt payment is superior to future payment. Our doctors argue that wheat, as being a determinate subject of sale, does not, like cloth, stand in need of seisin, since the object of the contract is the attainment of a power over the article, which is fully established by its being determinate. It is otherwise with respect to Sirf sales, for there the seisin is made a condition in order that the price and subject of the sale may be rendered determinate, which is only to be effected by means of seisin. With respect to the ordinance of the prophet, enjoining the sale from hand to hand, Obadah Bin Samat has explained it to mean the sale of one determinate thing in exchange for another. Besides, on the postponement of the seisin, no loss is reckoned to result, in the opinion of mankind:—contrary to where a prompt and future payment is stipulated; because the latter in the opinion of mankind is a detriment.

Similars may be sold for each other, without inducing usury.—THE sale of one egg in exchange for two eggs, from hand to hand, is lawful; and the same with respect to dates and walnuts; because these articles are neither subject to measurement of capacity or weight, with regard to which only usury relates. Shafei, in this case, differs from our doctors; because usury, according to his opinion, relates to articles of an esculent nature, of which kind these are.

Usury cannot take place with respect to Faloos, as they are articles of sale.—THE sale of one specific Faloos, in exchange for two other specific Faloos, is valid, according to Haneefa. Mohammed maintains it to be unlawful; because, as the fitness to constitute price is established in Faloos, with the consent of mankind, it cannot be annulled by any agreement of a seller and purchaser counter thereto; and as the fitness to constitute price still continues, the Faloos cannot be rendered determinate by means of a stipulation to that effect in the contract. The case, therefore, becomes the same as if a person should sell one undeterminate Faloos in exchange for two undeterminate;—or, as if a person should sell one dirim in exchange for two. The reasoning of the two disciples is that this fitness to constitute price in Faloos cannot subsist with relation to a buyer and seller, unless by their mutual agreement to that effect;* and, consequently, where they agree to the contrary, the fitness to represent price is, with respect to them, null; nor can the general consent of others, to admit Faloos as a representative of price, operate as an argument with respect to them, since in this matter others have no power over them. Hence it follows that, as the fitness to constitute price is, with respect to them, null, the Faloos may be identified by their specification.

OBJECTION.—Upon the fitness to constitute price being done away by the agreement of the parties, the Faloos will of consequence revert to their primary nature, namely, weight (for the Faloos was originally a weight).—It would therefore follow that the sale of one Faloos for two Faloos is not valid, although the fitness to constitute price be done away by the agreement of the contracting parties.

REPLY.—The Faloos do not revert to their original nature, because, by the agreement of mankind, they are considered as articles of tale, and this agreement remains in force. Hence they stand in the same predicament as walnuts, or other articles of tale, and the unequal sale of them is of consequence in the same manner lawful.—It is otherwise with respect to dirms and deenars, because these naturally constitute price.—It is also otherwise with respect to the sale of one undeterminate Faloos in exchange for two undeterminate Faloos; for this is, in fact, a stipulation of future payment and future delivery, a species of sale which has been forbidden by the prophet.—It is also otherwise where the stipulation of one of the parties relates to undeterminate Faloos, for this is equivalent to a postponement of payment, and such postponement is rendered unlawful by homogeneity alone.

Flour or meal cannot be sold for wheat.—THE sale of wheat in exchange for the flour or meal of wheat is unlawful, because wheat, and the meal and flour of it, are all of one

* That is to say, copper coins are not to be considered as price but by a previous agreement of the parties.

* A copper coin. (See Vol. II. p. 226.)

species.—It is impossible, moreover, to ascertain the equality between those articles by measurement, since flour and meal are of a close and compact nature, and wheat is not. Hence this kind of sale is essentially invalid, even in the exchange of one measure of the one for one measure of the other.

Flour may be sold for flour.—THE sale of flour in exchange for flour is valid, provided the quantities be equal by measurement, because the condition of legality (namely, equality) is here established.

But not for meal.—THE sale of flour in exchange for meal* is not valid, according to Haneefa, in any mode; neither at an equal, nor at an unequal rate; for as it is not lawful to sell flour in exchange for parched wheat, or meal in exchange for raw wheat, so also it is not lawful to sell either of those articles for the other, because of their homogeneity.—According to the two disciples the sale in question is lawful; because flour and meal are of different species, inasmuch as the object to be derived from each is different; for the object of flour is bread, and that of meal is a culinary preparation, mixed up with water or oil.—But the answer to this is that the original object of both is the same, namely, food; which is not affected in its nature by the modification of it, since raw wheat and parched wheat are considered as of the same species, and likewise wheat affected by vermin and wheat that is whole and preserved,—although, in answering particular objects, these kinds be different.

The sale of flesh for a living animal is not usurious.—THE sale of flesh in exchange for a living animal is lawful, according to Haneefa and Abou Yoosaf. Mohammed is of opinion that the sale of flesh in exchange for a living animal of the same species is unlawful, unless the quantity of the dead flesh exceed that of the living flesh, in order that the excess may be opposed in exchange to the other parts of the living animal, independent of flesh; and the remaining part of the slain flesh remain opposed in an equal degree to the living flesh; because otherwise usury must necessarily take place, since, if the quantities of flesh were exactly equal, it must necessarily follow that the other parts of the living animal had no exchange opposed to them;—or if, the quantities of flesh being equal, a deduction be made from the dead flesh, in opposition to the other parts of the living animal, it would necessarily create an inequality in the exchange of flesh for flesh. The sale in question, therefore, resembles a sale of sesamé seed in exchange for sesamé oil, which is unlawful. The arguments of the two disciples in support of their opinion is, that the case in question is in fact the sale of an article of weight for what is not an article of weight; since it is not customary to weigh living animals, it being indeed impracticable to ascertain their weight, as they are not at all times of equal weight, an animal being lighter when hungry, and heavier when filled with food.—It is otherwise with oil-seeds, as by weighing those may at once be ascertained the quantity of oil contained in them when separated from the dregs or refuse.

Nor the sale of fresh dates for dried dates.

—THE sale of fresh dates in exchange for dried ones is lawful, according to Haneefa. The two disciples hold a different opinion, because of a tradition, in which it is mentioned that a person having interrogated the prophet regarding the legality of such sale, the prophet, in return, desired to know whether fresh dates did not diminish in drying?—and upon that person answering in the affirmative, he declared that, such being the case, the sale of fresh dates in exchange for dry ones was not lawful. The arguments of Haneefa in support of his opinion are twofold:—FIRST, the word Tammir, expressive of dry dates, is also applicable to fresh dates, because there is a tradition that a person brought some fresh dates from Kheebir to the prophet, who, on their being presented to him, inquired if all the Tammir of Kheebir were of that kind? and as fresh and dry dates are from this circumstance held to be of the same kind, it follows that the sale of the one in exchange for the other, on condition of an equality in the rate, is lawful, since the prophet has said, "Sell TAMMIRS in exchange for TAMMIRS, at an equal rate."—SECONDLY, if it be not admitted that fresh dates fall under the appellation of Tammir, still the sale is lawful, because of another saying of the prophet, "When two things are of different species, then let them be sold in whatever manner the parties please." In regard to the saying quoted by the two disciples, it rests entirely on the authority of Zeyd Ibn Abbas, which is considered weak among the traditionists.—It is to be observed that the same disagreement subsists with respect to the sale of dried and fresh grapes, founded on the same arguments as those already cited. Some have asserted that the sale of dried grapes in exchange for fresh is unlawful, according to all our doctors, grounding this assertion on the analogy which subsists between this case and that of parched and raw wheat, the sale of which in exchange for each other is universally declared to be invalid.

THE sale of fresh dates in exchange for fresh dates, at an equal rate in point of measurement of capacity, is lawful, in the opinion of all our doctors.*

* The remainder of this case, which is of considerable length, as well as the complete succeeding case, has been omitted in the translation, because the disputations contained in them are founded entirely on verbal criticisms, which do not admit of an intelligible translation.

* Arab. Saveek. A sort of coarse meal prepared either from wheat or barley.—Also, what remains after sifting off the fine flour.

The sale of the manufactured produce of an article in exchange for a similar article, is usurious, unless it exceed that article in quantity.—THE sale of olives in exchange for oil of olives is unlawful, excepting when the actual oil is greater in quantity than the oil contained within the olives, in which case the excess being opposed to the drugs that will necessarily remain after the expression of the oil, prevents the establishment of usury.—The law is the same with respect to the sale of walnuts for the oil of walnuts, of sesamé seeds for the oil of sesamé, of milk for butter, or of the juice of the grape or dates in exchange for grapes or dates. With respect to the sale of cotton in exchange for the thread of it there is a difference of opinion. The sale of cotton, however, in exchange for calico is universally allowed to be legal.

One species of flesh may be sold for another species.—It is lawful to sell one species of flesh, in any manner, in exchange for another species of flesh, (such as the flesh of a cow for that of a camel or a goat). It is to be observed that the flesh of a cow and of a buffalo are of the same species, as is also the flesh of a sheep and that of a goat.

The sale of the milk of one animal for an unequal quantity of milk of another species of animal does not induce usury.—THE milk of a cow and of a goat are of different kinds, and may therefore be lawfully sold in exchange for each other at unequal rates. It is related, as an opinion of Shaféi, that these are of the same kind, because the object to be derived from each is the same. But our doctors argue that the flesh of these animals is evidently of a different kind, since it would not be lawful for a person, on whom the gift of a cow in alms was enjoined, to substitute a goat in lieu of a cow, if it prove defective; the milk of these animals, therefore, differs in point of species in the same manner as their flesh. It is to be observed that the vinegar of dates is of a different kind from the vinegar of grapes, because of the difference of their originals. So also, the wool of a sheep is of a different kind from that of a goat, because they answer different objects.

Bread may be sold for flour at an unequal rate.—It is lawful to sell bread made of wheat in exchange for wheat, or the flour of wheat, at an unequal weight, because bread is considered either as an article of tale or of weight, and consequently is of a different kind from wheat or flour, which are subject to measurement of capacity.—It is related as an opinion of Haneefa, that such sale is utterly invalid; but decrees pass according to the first adjudication, and this, whether the delivery of either the wheat or the bread be stipulated to take place at a future period. According to Haneefa the borrowing of bread is utterly unlawful,—that is, whether it be considered as an article of tale or weight,—because there is great difference with respect to cakes of bread, either in respect to themselves, or the workmanship of the baker. According to Mohammed it is absolutely legal; that is, whether the bread be considered as an article of tale or weight. According to Aboo Yoosaf it is lawful, if considered as an article of weight; but not if considered as an article of tale, because of the difference of the unities.

Usury cannot take place between a master and his slave.—USURY cannot take place between a master and his slave, because whatever is in the possession of the slave is the property of the master, so that no sale can possibly take place between them, and hence the impossibility of usury.

Unless the slave be an insolvent Mazoon.—This proceeds upon a supposition of the slave being privileged and free from debt; for in the case of a privileged slave who is insolvent, usury may take place between him and his master, according to Haneefa, because (agreeably to his tenets) the possessions of such slave do not belong to the master;—and according to the two disciples, because although (agreeably to their tenets, the possessions of such slave be the property of his master, still as the claims of the creditors are connected with them, the slave stands in the same relation to his master as a stranger, and consequently usury may exist in their dealings.

Nor between a Mussulman and infidel in a hostile country.—USURY cannot take place between a Mussulman and a hostile infidel, in a hostile country.—This is contrary to the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf and Shafei, who conceive an analogy between the case in question and that of a protected alien within the Mussulman territory. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. FIRST, the prophet has said, "There is no usury between a MUSSULMAN and a hostile infidel, in a foreign land."—SECONDLY, the property of a hostile infidel being free to the Mussulmans, it follows that it is lawful to take it by whatever mode may be possible, provided there be no deceit used.

It may take place between a protected alien and a Mussulman.—It is otherwise with respect to a protected alien, as his property is not of a neutral nature, but sacred, because of the protection that has been afforded to him.

CHAPTER IX.

OF RIGHTS AND APPENDAGES.

Definition of rights and appendages, as connected with sale.—The rights of a sale are things essentially necessary to the use of the subject of the sale, such as, in the purchase of a house, the right of passing through the road that leads to it; or, in the purchase of a well, the right of drawing water from it.—Appendages imply things from which an advantage is derived, but in a subordinate degree, such as a cook-room, or a drain.

Difference of rights in a purchase, with respect to a Manzil, a Dar, and a Bait.—If a person purchase a Manzil above which there is another Manzil, he is not entitled to the upper Manzil, unless he have stipulated the purchase of the Manzil "with all its rights, and all its appendages,"—or, "with everything great and small upon it, in it, or of it."—If, on the other hand, a person purchase a Bait above which there is another Bait, with a stipulation of all its rights, still he is not entitled to the upper Bait. But if a person purchase a Dar (that is, a serai) with its enclosure, he is entitled to the upper stories and the offices; because the term Dar signifies a place comprehended within an enclosure, which is considered as the original subject, and of which the upper story is a dependant part. Bait, on the contrary, simply signifies any place of residence; and as the upper story of a house is of this nature as well as the under, it cannot be included in the purchase of a Bait, unless by an express specification, since a thing cannot be a dependant of its fellow. A Manzil, on the other hand, is a man;—that is, it is greater than a Bait, and smaller than a Dar;—for although it comprehends everything necessary to a dwelling-place, still it is deficient in having no place for cattle: a Manzil, therefore, is in one respect similar to a Dar, and in another respect similar to a Bait; and hence, from its similarity to a Dar, the upper house is included in virtue of its being a subordinate part, whenever a specification of the rights is made; and, from its similarity to a Bait, the upper house is not included in the sale, unless a specification of the rights be made.—Some have said that, in the practice of the present age, the upper house is necessarily included in all the above cases; because a Bait (which means a house in the Persian language) does necessarily include the upper story.

A porch over a road, connected with a house, is not included in the sale of it, unless it be expressly specified.—A PORCH over a road, of which the beams in one end are laid upon a Dar [or house] which is the subject of a sale, and in the other end upon the opposite house, or upon a pillar, is not included in the sale of the house, unless a specification of rights be made in the sale; because the porch covering the road is held to be of the same nature as a road.—The two disciples have observed that if the said porch should form the entrance into the house, it is then virtually included in the sale.

The avenue is not included in the purchase of an apartment of a house,—nor wells or drains in the purchase of lands, unless the appendages be expressed in the contract.—If a person purchase a room [Bait] in a house [Dar] or dwelling-place [Manzil], he is not entitled to the use of the road, unless he have stipulated the rights and appendages, or the great and small belonging to it.—In the same manner, in the sale of land, a well or drain is not included, unless by a specification of the rights or appendages; because they are not considered as a part of the ground, but as a dependant on it.—It is otherwise with respect to a lease, for that virtually includes the well and road without any specification, because the object of a lease is an usufruct, which is not to be obtained but by the use of the road and well; and it is not a custom amongst farmers to rent a road or a well. But the object of a sale may be answered without the necessity of including the road or well, since it is customary, amongst purchasers, to sell and trade with the subjects of their purchase, and to dispose of them into the hands of another; whence an advantage is derived from the transaction, without the road or other appendage being included.

CHAPTER X.

OF CLAIM OF RIGHT (PREFERRED BY OTHERS TO THE SUBJECT OF A SALE).

A female slave, claimed after having produced a child whilst in the purchaser's possession, is, together with her child, the property of the claimant, provided the claim be established by evidence:—but if the claim be supported by the purchaser's acknowledgment only, the child is not his property.—If a female slave, being sold, bring forth a child whilst in the purchaser's possession, and another person afterwards establish, by witnesses, that she was originally his property, and had not belonged to the seller, such person is entitled to the female slave, and also to the child.—If, however, the proof be established by the acknowledgment of the purchaser, the claimant is in this case entitled to the female slave only, unless he also specifically include the child in the claim, in which case the acknowledgment of the purchaser entitles him to both. The distinction between a case of evidence and a case of acknowledgment is, that testimony is absolute proof, being adapted for the elucidation of the fact. By evidence, therefore, it is manifested that the slave belonged to the claimant ab initio, that is to say, from a time prior to the purchase of her; and as, at that period, the child was a dependant part of her (since it had not issued from the womb), it follows that the claimant has a right to it as well as the mother.—Acknowledgment, on the contrary, is defective proof, since it establishes the right of property of the thing claimed in the claimant, purely from the necessity of verifying acknowledgment; because an acknowledgment is a declaration; and if the establishment of the right of property did not in any degree take place, the declaration must of course be false.—Now this consequence may be prevented by the establishment of the right of property at the time of the acknowledgment: and the child, at that period, not being a dependant part, as having issued from the womb, is therefore not included in the property of the claimant.—Some have said that, in case of the establishment by testimony, when the Kasee issues his decree for the claimant to take the slave, the child, from its dependance, is virtually included; and that there is no necessity for a specification of it in the decree. Others, again, have said that the specification of the child is an absolutely necessary condition, of which the adjudication in several analogous cases is a clear proof. Thus Mohammed has declared that where the Kasee decrees the original to any person, without having any knowledge of the subordinate parts, such subordinate parts are not comprehended in the decree. Where, also, in a case of a claim of right to a female slave, purchased by another, the Kasee decrees the slave to the claimant, and it so happens that the child she has brought forth is in the hands of some other person than the purchaser, such child is not comprehended in the decree.

A person selling another as a slave, who afterwards proves to be free, must restore the purchase-money:—or if the alleged slave have excited the purchaser to the bargain, he must restore it in defect of the seller.—If a person purchase a slave, and the slave afterwards prove by witnesses that he is free, notwithstanding that, at the time of concluding the contract, he had said to the purchaser, “purchase me, for I am a slave,”—and the seller be present, or absent at a place that is known, the purchaser is entitled to recover the price from him: but if the seller be absent, and the place of his sojournment unknown, the purchaser is in that case entitled to take the price from the slave, who is to recover the same from the seller whenever it may be in his power.—If, on the contrary, a person accept of a slave in pawn, on the ground of the slave saying to him, “accept of me in pawn, for I am a slave,” and it afterwards appear that he is free, the pawnee is not in that case at liberty to take payment from the slave of the sum due to him, whether the pawnor be absent or present, but must at all events seek it from the pawnor. Abou Yoosaf holds that the same rule also obtains in the case of sale,—that is, that the purchaser has no right, under any circumstances, to an indemnification from the slave, because he has no right to take the price from any but the seller, or his security,—and the slave is neither of these, but merely a liar, which does not superinduce responsibility.—The argument of the two disciples is that, in the case in question, the purchaser engaged in the contract on the sole ground of confiding in the slave’s declaration, “purchase me, for I am a slave;” and hence it follows, that where a slave has been guilty of a deceit, he is liable for the price, in case the recovery from the seller be impracticable, in order that the injury occasioned by his deceit may be removed from the purchaser. The recovery from the seller, however, is impracticable only in case of his being absent at a place which is not known.—As, moreover, sale is a contract of exchange, it is possible to render the director of it responsible for the consideration (namely, the price), when the subject is lost or destroyed to the purchaser, this being what a contract of sale requires. It is otherwise with respect to pawn, as that is not a contract of exchange, but merely a contract of security for the receipt of the substance of the pawnee’s right; for which reason it is lawful to give a pawn as security for the price, in a Sirf sale, or for the goods, in a Sillim sale, although an exchange with respect to either of these be unlawful:—in other words, if a pledge should be destroyed whilst in the possession of the pawnee, the pawnee is in that case held to have received the substance of his right;—whereas, if a contract of pawn were in the nature of a contract of exchange, it would follow that in these cases an exchange for the price in a Sirf sale, or for the goods in a Sillim sale, had been made previous to the seisin, and this is unlawful. The person, therefore, who directs others to enter into a contract of pawn cannot be rendered responsible for the debt to which the pawn is opposed. Analogous to this is a case where the master of a slave says to merchants, “trade with this slave of mine, for I have privileged him to trade;” and the merchants having traded with him accordingly, it becomes afterwards known that the said slave is the property of another; for in this case the creditors have a right to receive payment of their debts from the master.—It is to be observed that the difficulty, in this case, arises from the tenets of Haneefa; for, according to him, a claim is a necessary condition for the establishment of freedom; and here a claim is out of the question, since, if the slave, after the acknowledgment of his slavery, should assert a claim to his freedom, he would be guilty of prevarication; and prevarication is destructive of the validity of a claim. It is therefore impossible that, after his own declaration, his freedom should be made apparent; and hence the statement of this case, according to the tenets of Haneefa, is erroneous.—But, in reply to this objection, some have observed that the proper statement of this case is,—that a person purchases a slave at a time when the slave himself said, “purchase me, for I am a slave,” and it afterwards appears that the slave so purchased was originally free; for this statement is strictly agreeable to the tenets of Haneefa, since (according to him) the claim of freedom is required as a condition only in the case of a freedman, and not in that of a person originally free.—Others again maintain that the claim of freedom, in this statement of the case also, is a necessary condition; and that the prevarication so occasioned is not destructive of the validity of the claim; for generation is a concealed circumstance; and the person not knowing that his mother was free at the time of his generation, he on that account declared himself a slave; but afterwards, attaining a knowledge of his mother's freedom at that period, he therefore claims his freedom.—If it be thus stated, that, a person having purchased a slave, it afterwards appears that the person so purchased was free, as having been emancipated by his master, such statement is correct, as it does not involve prevarication, since the master is empowered to emancipate his slave.—This case is therefore, in fact, the same as if a woman should purchase her divorce from her husband, and should afterwards establish, by witnesses, that previous to such bargain he had divorced her three times; or, as if a Mokatib should establish, by witnesses, that, previous to the contract of Kitabat, his master had emancipated him;—for in both these cases the claim and the evidences are admitted, notwithstanding the prevarication; and so also in the preceding case. The ground of this is that the master being competent to emancipate his slave, he may have done it during his absence, and the slave may afterwards have preferred his claim immediately on its coming to his knowledge; and on this supposition the prevarication is not held to be destructive of the claim.

Case of claim to an immoveable property after a composition with respect to it.—If a person claim a right in a house, in an indefinite manner, and then compound his claim with the possessor of the house for an hundred dirms, and a third person afterwards prove a right to the whole of the house excepting the quantity of a cubit, for instance, in that case the possessor of the house has no right to any restitution from the person with whom he entered into the composition; because that person, having before made an indefinite claim without explaining the extent of it, may now lawfully declare it to have been the quantity excepted by the third person.—If, on the other hand, a person, having claimed the whole of a house, should then compound with the possessor for an hundred dirms, and another person should afterwards lay claim to part of the house, in that case the possessor of the house is entitled to a restitution of a part of the sum he had paid in composition, proportionate to the amount of the second claim.—It is to be observed that a composition of an undefined right for defined property is lawful, because the annulment of an undefined right cannot occasion contention.

Section.

Of Fazoolee Beea, or the Sale of the Property of another without his Consent.

A sale contracted without authority may be dissolved by the proprietor of the subject.—

If a person sell the property of another without his order, the contract is complete, but it remains with the proprietor either to confirm or dissolve the sale as he pleases. Shafei is of opinion that the contract, in this case, is not complete; because it has not issued from a lawful authority; for that is constituted only by property or permission, neither of which exist in this case. The arguments of our doctors are, that such a sale is a transaction of transfer, performed by a competent person with respect to a fit subject: it is therefore indispensable that the contract be regarded as complete; for, besides that there is no injury in this to the proprietor (as he has the power of dissolving it), it is attended with a great advantage to him, inasmuch as it frees him from the trouble of seeking for a purchaser, settling the price with him, and other matters.—Moreover, it is attended with an advantage to the seller, whose word it preserves sacred, and to the purchaser, to whom it confirms a bargain, with which, as having voluntarily concluded it, he may be supposed to be pleased.—In order, therefore, to obtain these advantages, a legal power is established in the seller of another's property, more especially as the consent of that other has been given by implication, since a wise man naturally assents to a deed attended with advantage to himself.—It is to be observed that it is requisite that the proprietor give his consent on the condition of the subject of the sale, and the buyer and seller being extant; because, as his assent is a deed relative to the contract, it is necessary, of consequence, when he gives it, that the contract be in existence; and the existence of the contract depends on the existence of the parties, and of the subject of the sale.

If assented to, the price is the property of the proprietor, and a deposit with the Fazoolee seller.—When the proprietor of an article, in a Fazoolee sale, gives his assent to it, the price becomes his property, and remains in the hands of the Fazoolee seller as a deposit, in the same manner as if he had been an agent for sale; because the assent is equivalent to a previous appointment of agency.

Who is at liberty to dissolve the contract without his concurrence.—It is in the power of the Fazoolee, or person who sells the property of another without authority, to dissolve the contract without having obtained the consent of the proprietor. It is otherwise in the case of a marriage contracted by a Fazoolee, as that cannot be dissolved without the consent of the person on whose account he concluded it.

It is to be observed that the existence of the parties, and of the subject of the sale, is sufficient towards the consent of the proprietor only in case of the price being in money; for, if it be stipulated in goods, then the existence of the price also is a necessary condition.—In this case, however, the consent of the proprietor is not an assent to the contract of sale (because the sale is, in this instance, a sort of purchase, and a Fazoolee purchase does not rest upon the assent of the person on whose account the Fazoolee made the purchase, inasmuch as the purchase is considered in law to have been made for himself, but merely an assent to the Fazoolee purchaser making over the property he has agreed to give in return for the property which has been constituted the price of it. This price, therefore, consisting of goods, becomes the property of the Fazoolee, who remains responsible for the subject of the sale, payable in a similar, if it be of a nature that admits of similars,—or, if otherwise, for the value of it.

If the proprietor should die, then the consent of the heirs is of no efficacy in the confirmation of the Fazoolee sale, in either case; that is, whether the price have been stipulated in money or in goods; because the contract rested entirely on the personal assent of the deceased.

If the proprietor die, and the subject be not specified, the sale is invalid.—If a person, having given his assent to a Fazoolee sale, should afterwards die, and it be not known whether the subject of the sale was extant or not when he gave his assent, in that case (according to one opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, which has been adopted by Mohammed), the sale is valid, because of the probability of the existence of the subject of the sale at the period of assent. Aboo Yoosaf, however, afterwards receded from this opinion, and declared this sale to be unlawful, because of the doubt with regard to the existence of the subject of the sale, which in his opinion is destructive of its legality.

The emancipation, by the original proprietor, of a slave usurped and sold by the usurper, is valid.—If a person usurp a slave, and sell him to another and, that other having emancipated him, the original proprietor afterwards confirm the sale, in this case the emancipation, according to Haneefa and Yoosaf, is valid, upon a favourable construction. Mohammed maintains that it is not valid, since an emancipation cannot be made except with relation to property, in conformity with a tradition of the prophet to that effect; and the purchaser was not proprietor of the slave at the time of the emancipation, because the validity of the sale then rested on the assent of the proprietor; and a suspended sale does not endow with a right of property. Where, moreover, the right of property is confirmed by the master's assent to the sale, it becomes confirmed, first in the usurper and then in the emancipator, by a retrospect and devolution; and a right of property thus confirmed is established in one shape but not in another shape; and manumission is not valid except where the right of property exists in every shape, in conformity with the tradition above cited. Upon this principle it is that emancipation is not lawful where a person, having usurped a slave, gives him his liberty and afterwards makes a retribution to the proprietor;—or, where a person, having purchased a slave, allowing an option to the seller, emancipates him, and afterwards receives from the seller a confirmation of the sale. On the same principle also the sale is unlawful, where a person, having purchased a slave from an usurper, sells him again to another, and the proprietor afterwards confirms the sale of the usurper;—and emancipation is likewise invalid, where a person, having purchased a slave from an usurper, gives him his liberty, and the usurper afterwards makes a retribution to the proprietor. The argument of the two Elders is that, in the case in question, a suspended right of property is established in the purchaser in virtue of an absolute deed instituted for the purpose of enjoyment of property, namely, an absolute sale without any stipulation of option; and as, in the establishment of this right of property, no injury results to any one, it follows that the emancipation of the purchaser (which rests upon his right of property), is also established in suspense, in the same manner as the right of property. When, therefore, in virtue of the assent of the proprietor, the right of property operates, it follows that the suspended emancipation also operates:—in the same manner as where a person purchases a slave in pawn from the pawnee, and afterwards emancipates him,—in which case the emancipation remains suspended in its operation, as well as the right of property of the purchaser, until the consent of the pawnee be obtained, or the pawn be redeemed by the pawnee:—or, as where an heir emancipates a slave belonging to the deceased, at a time when the estate was encumbered with debt,—in which case the emancipation remains suspended in its operation until the debts be liquidated, when it immediately takes place. It is otherwise where an usurper, having emancipated the slave he had usurped, afterwards makes a composition with the proprietor; because usurpation does not entitle to the enjoyment of property:—or, where a purchaser of a slave, under a sale stipulating a condition of option to the seller, emancipates the said slave; because in that case the sale is not absolute, and the existence of the option is preventive of the operation of the right of property in the purchaser:—or, lastly, where a person, having purchased a slave from an usurper, sells him to another, and afterwards the original proprietor gives his assent to the sale of the usurper; because in virtue of the assent of the proprietor the right of property vests in the purchaser, upon such assent being signified, but not before: the right of property, moreover, of the second purchaser was suspended; and consequently, as the right of property vests in the first purchaser now (and not before), it necessarily follows that such suspended right of property becomes null.

The fine incurred for maiming a slave sold under a usurpation goes to the purchaser, if the former proprietor assent to such sale.—

If a person purchase a slave from one who had usurped him, and the slave be maimed* by any person whilst in the possession of the purchaser, and he [the purchaser] exact the fine of trespass from the maimer, and the original proprietor then give his assent to the sale,—in this case the fine is the property of the purchaser; because the slave is in such case considered as the property of the purchaser, from the period of the purchase, whence it is evident that he was so at the time of the maiming; and this is an argument against the doctrine of Mohammed, exhibited in the preceding case, since as the fine is, in this instance, the right of the purchaser solely in virtue of the establishment of right of property in him from the period of the purchase, it follows that the emancipation of the purchaser would be valid for the same reason. The reply of Mohammed to this is, that a right of property established in one shape only (that is, in an incomplete manner) is sufficient to entitle to a fine, but not to the performance of emancipation, which requires that the right of property be perfect and complete. It is to be observed that although the fine, in this case, be the right of the purchaser, still if it exceed half of the price, it is requisite that he bestow the excess in charity; because the fine for the destruction of the limb cannot exceed half the price, as the fine of trespass for maiming a freeman is one half of the fine of blood, and consequently, the fine for maiming a slave is one half of his value. Now nothing can be included in the responsibility beyond what may be opposed to the price, and implicated in it. Any excess, therefore, over half the price, is an acquisition to which the proprietor is not entitled, or to which his claim is doubtful, and is therefore not perfectly lawful to him.

The resale of a slave purchased from a usurper is rendered invalid by the proprietor signifying his assent to the first sale: but if the slave perish in the interim the assent is of no account.—If a person purchase an usurped slave, and sell him to another, and the proprietor afterwards give his assent to the first sale, in that case the second sale is invalid; because the right of property then established in the first purchaser destroys the suspended right of property of the second purchaser, as has been already explained; and also, because there is an unfairness in it, since it is possible that the proprietor may not give his assent to the sale. But if, after the sale of the slave by the purchaser, he should then either die or be killed, and the proprietor afterwards give his assent to the sale, such assent is not valid; because the existence of the subject of the sale is requisite to the assent, and that no longer exists in either instance.

• OBJECTION.—The reason here alleged is a

valid one where the slave dies a natural death; but it is not so where he is slain, because in that case the slave, in virtue of the existence of the amercement, is considered, as it were, to be himself in existence,—for if a slave, having been sold by a valid contract, should afterwards be murdered whilst in the possession of the seller, still the sale is not null, since the consideration for the subject of the sale (namely the amercement) is extant,—whereas, if he die a natural death in the hands of the seller, the sale is null. It would therefore appear that the assent, in case of the murder of the slave, is of no effect.

REPLY.—In the case in question it is not possible to consider the fine as the right of the purchaser, since not having been the proprietor of the slave at the period of the murder, he can have no right to the amercement, nor can the slave, in virtue of the existence of the amercement, be considered as extant with respect to him. The slave, therefore, is not extant with relation to him, either actually or virtually. It is otherwise in the case of a valid sale, because there the purchaser had acquired a right of property to the slave which may be transferred to the consideration for him; and consequently the slave may be considered as extant with respect to him.

An article purchased through the medium of an unauthorized person cannot be returned to the proprietor, although the purchaser prove the want of authority, or the proprietor's assent to the sale:—but if the seller avow his not being authorized, the sale is null.—If a person sell a slave, the property of another, and the purchaser establish by witnesses that the seller had acknowledged that he had sold him without the assent of the proprietor,—or, that the proprietor had declared that he had not given his assent to the sale, and the purchaser wish to return the slave, the evidence adduced by him is not to be admitted; because there is a prevarication in his plea, since his act of purchasing the slave amounts to a declaration of the validity of the sale, and the plea he afterwards prefers is contradictory of this: his plea, therefore, is not valid; and testimony is to be taken only where the plea it tends to establish is of a valid nature. If, however, the seller should declare before a magistrate that he had made the sale without the authority of the proprietor, the sale in that case becomes null, provided the purchaser desire the dissolution of it, because the inconsistency of the purchaser is no bar to the validity of the declaration of the seller, and when the parties both concur in the same wish the sale is rendered null of course:—but the concurrence of the purchaser is a necessary condition. What is here advanced, that “the evidence adduced by the purchaser is not to be admitted,” is the doctrine of the Jama’eeer. The compiler of the Hedaya observes that it is mentioned in the Zeeadat, that if a person purchase a female slave (for instance) for one thousand dirms, and take possession and pay the price, and afterwards, in consequence of another person claiming her as his property, and asserting his right to her, surrender her to him,—and he [the purchaser] establish, by witnesses, that the seller had acknowledged that the slave was the property of the said claimant, the testimony so given is inadmissible. Between these two cases, therefore, there is an evident contradiction, which, however, our modern doctors thus account for. In the case alluded to in the Jama Sagheer, the slave was in the possession of the purchaser when he produced the witnesses; but in that from the Zeeadat the slave was in the possession of the claimant and not of the purchaser; and the condition on which a restitution of the purchase-money from the seller is warranted (namely, non-existence of the subject of the sale with relation to the purchaser) not existing in the first case, but existing in the second, the evidence in the first case is therefore rejected, and in the second it is admitted.

In the sale of immoveable property by an unauthorized person, the seller is not responsible.—If a person sell a house belonging to another, without his permission, and make delivery of it to the purchaser, and afterwards declare that he had sold it without the permission of the owner, then (according to Haneefa and the last opinion of Aboo Yoosaf) the seller is not responsible.* The first opinion of Aboo Yoosaf was that the seller is responsible, and this opinion has been adopted by Mohammed. This case is one of the examples of usurpation over immoveable property, concerning which there is a difference of opinion, as will be fully explained under the head of Usurpations.

CHAPTER XI.

OF SILLIM SALES.

Definition of Sillim.—KADOOREE explains Sillim literally to signify, a contract involving a prompt delivery in return for a distant delivery. In the language of the LAW it means a contract of sale, causing an immediate payment of the price, and admitting a delay in the delivery of the wares. In this kind of sale, the wares are denominated Mooslim-fee-hee,† the price Rasal-Mal,‡ the seller Mooslim-ali-he,§ and the purchaser Rubul Sillim.||

A Sillim sale is lawful.—A SILLIM sale is authorized and rendered legal by a particular passage in the KORAN, and also by an express declaration of the prophet prohibiting any one from the sale of what is not in his possession, but authorizing a Sillim sale. It is to be observed that Sillim sale is contrary to analogy, because of the non-existence of the subject of it, since it is a sale of a non-existent article, as the subject, in a Sillim sale, is merely the thing for which the advance is made, and that does not appear. Analogy, however, is abandoned in this instance, because of the text and tradition above cited.

In all articles of weight (except dirms and deenars), measurement of capacity.—

A SILLIM sale, with relation to articles of weight, or measurement of capacity, is lawful, because the prophet has said, "Who-soever enters into a SILLIM sale with you, let him stipulate a determinate weight and measurement, and a determinate period of delivery." Dirms and deenars, however, are not included in the description of articles of weight, because both of these are representatives of price, and in a Sillim sale it is requisite that the subject of it be otherwise than a representatives of price. Hence if a person should enter into a Sillim sale, stipulating the immediate payment of ten yards of cloth to the seller in lieu of ten dirms to be delivered to him by the seller at a future period, the Sillim sale so contracted is invalid. Some have said that this sale is absolutely null. Others, again, have said that although, considering it as a Sillim sale, it is certainly invalid, still it is not null, since it may be executed so as to answer the views of the parties as far as possible, by considering it simply as a sale of cloth for a price payable hereafter; more especially since, in all contracts, the spirit is what is to be attended to. The former, however, is the better opinion; because, although sales may lawfully be rendered valid in every possible degree, with relation to the things concerned which the parties have contracted, yet as, in the case in question, the things so contracted for are dirms and deenars, which from an express prohibition are incapable of being made the subject of a Sillim sale, the contract with relation to them cannot in any degree be rendered valid.

Longitudinal measurement and tale.—A SILLIM sale with respect to articles of longitudinal measurement, such as cloth, or the like, is lawful, because it is possible to define them exactly by specification of the number of yards in respect to the length and breadth, and the quality and workmanship of it. (By the quality is meant the fineness or coarseness; and by the workmanship the looseness or closeness of the texture.) The specification by a recital of these particulars, moreover, is requisite, in order that ignorance may be avoided: it is therefore essential to the validity of the contract. In the same manner also, a Sillim sale is lawful with respect to all articles of tale, which do not essentially differ in their unities, such as eggs and walnuts; because, in all articles of tale between the unities of which the difference is trifling, the rate is ascertainable, the quality definable, and the delivery to the purchaser practicable: a contract of Sillim, therefore, with respect to such articles is lawful. In articles of this nature, also, the great and the small are considered as the same, because mankind have agreed in making no account of the difference. It is otherwise with respect to melons and pomegranates, because the difference in them is considerable. It is to be observed, that where there is a difference in the individuals of any kind, it may be known whether such difference be of any account or not by the effect it has on the price. Thus articles of which the individuals of the same kind bear a different price are considered as different; but where the price is the same with respect to the individuals they are considered as similar. It is related, as an opinion of Haneefa, that ostrich eggs are not similars, as they bear different prices.

It is to be observed that in the same manner as a Sillim contract is lawful with respect to similars of tale according to number, so is it lawful with respect to them according to a measurement of capacity. Ziffer has said that it is not lawful according to a measurement of capacity, as that does not apply to articles of tale; and it is also a tenet of his, that a Sillim sale with respect to articles of tale is unlawful because of the difference between the individuals of the kind. The reasoning of our doctors is, that quantity is sometimes ascertained by number and sometimes by measurement of capacity; and that similars of the same species being considered as articles of tale only because of the consent and practice of mankind, they may for the same reason be subjected to a measurement of capacity by the consent of the parties. A Sillim sale is likewise lawful with respect to Faloos. Some have said that this is the opinion of the two disciples; but that Mohammed is of a different opinion, since, according to his doctrine, Faloos are representatives of price. The doctrine of the two disciples on this head has been already explained in treating of Usury.

It is not lawful with respect to animals.—A SILLIM sale with respect to animals is unlawful. Shafei deems it lawful, as the article may be ascertained by an explanation of the genus, the age, the species, and the quality; after which only a small difference can take place, in the same manner as in the case of cloth. Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that after such explanations the difference may still be great with respect to various qualities and hidden circumstances, which must occasion a contention: in opposition to the case of cloth, because, as being the workmanship of man, there is rarely any material difference in two pieces of the same kind. Besides, it is recorded in the Nakl Saheeh that the prophet forbade the Sillim sale of animals; and this prohibition extends to every species of animals, even to sparrows.

Or the parts of animals, or skins, firewood, or hay, unless the quality be ascertained.—SILLIM sale is not lawful with respect to the parts of an animal, such as the head, or the feet, because those are not similars of tale, nor is there any measure by which the size of them might be ascertained. In the same manner also, a Sillim sale is unlawful with respect to skins, according to number, or firewood according to bundles, or hay according to packages, except the quantity be ascertained by specifying the length of the string that ties them; for then the Sillim sale with respect to them is lawful, provided the mode of binding be not such as to create a difference.

Nor unless the subject be in continued existence until the time of delivery.—A SILLIM sale is not lawful, unless the subject of it be in existence, from the conclusion of the contract, until the stipulated period of its delivery. Hence the sale is not lawful if the subject be not in existence at the formation of the contract, but be extant at the period stipulated for its delivery: or vice versa;—or if, being extant at the formation of the contract, and the time of delivery, it should have been non-existent at some period of the intervening time. Shafei maintains that the existence at the period of delivery is sufficient whether the article have been extant before or not; because in this case the seller is capable of delivery at the period on which delivery is required. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—FIRST, a saying of the prophet, "Ye shall not sell fruit by way of SILLIM until their ripeness be apparent," which evidently implies that the capability of the delivery from the formation of the contract is necessary. SECONDLY, the capability of delivery is founded on the article being fit to be taken possession of by the purchaser, and it is therefore indispensable that it be in uninterrupted existence from the formation of the contract to the instant of delivery.

If, at the promised period of delivery, the subject of the Sillim be lost or disappear, the purchaser has in that case the option of dissolving the contract, and receiving back the price from the seller,—or of waiting until the subject of the sale may be recovered. This is analogous to the absconding of a slave after the sale of him but before the delivery, in which case the purchaser has the power of either dissolving the contract or waiting until the slave may be recovered.

It is lawful with respect to articles which, although perishable in their nature, are kept in a state of preservation, or in situations where the article may always be had.—A SILLIM sale is lawful with respect to dried and salted fish, provided it be according to a standard weight, and the species be known; because in this case the subject of the sale is of an ascertained nature, the quality is defined, and the delivery is practicable, since such fish is always fit to be taken possession of. This species of sale, however, is not allowed according to tale, since the individuals amongst fish are not similar:—nor is it allowed with respect to fresh fish,—unless at such a particular period of the year as renders the procurement of them certain, in which a Sillim sale with respect to them, according to a fixed weight, is lawful, provided the species be defined. The reason of this is that fresh fish is not always to be had, being sometimes withheld, in the winter season, in consequence of the water being frozen. In any city, however, where fresh fish are always to be procured, a Sillim sale with respect to them is perfectly lawful, provided it be according to weight, and not by tale.—It is related, as an opinion of Haneefa, that it is not lawful to make a Sillim sale with regard to the flesh of fish of so large a nature as to occasion their flesh to be cut in the same manner as that of oxen or goats, for instance, because, being illegal with respect to all other animals, it follows that it is likewise so with respect to fish, of which the flesh is equivalent to that of any other creature.

It is not lawful with respect to flesh-meat.—A SILLIM sale of flesh is utterly unlawful, according to Haneefa. The two disciples maintain that it is lawful with respect to the flesh of quadrupeds, provided a notification be made of the flesh of a known and determinate part (such as the haunch, for instance), and that a description be given of the qualities (such as fatness or leanness, for instance); because in this case the weight of the flesh is determined, and the qualities are ascertained,—whence it is that, in case of its destruction, a compensation of a similar is given, and also that it is lawful to borrow it according to weight, and that usury takes place with regard to it. It is otherwise with respect to the flesh of birds, for a Sillim sale of that is unlawful, since it is impossible to specify the flesh of a particular part, inasmuch as it is not a custom to separate the parts of birds in sale, because of their smallness. The argument of Haneefa is that the quantity of flesh is uncertain, because of the difference occasioned by the bones, in regard either to their number or grossness; and also, because of the difference which takes place with respect to the fatness or leanness, as animals are fat or lean according to the seasons; and as this uncertainty is a cause of contention, such sale is therefore inadmissible;—and for the same reason, the Sillim sale of flesh without bones is not lawful. This is approved. With respect to the cases quoted by the two disciples of a compensation of a similar being made for flesh in case of its destruction, and of it being lawful to borrow it, the legality of such compensation, &c., is not admitted: but admitting the legality, still the principle on which the compensation of a similar proceeds is evidently because the retribution of a similar is more equitable than that of money, since money answers only to the object, whereas the similar answers both object and appearance; and the legality of borrowing flesh is because a seisin made by borrowing is an obvious and perceptible one; in opposition to that of a Sillim sale, which rests upon description.

The period of delivery must be specified.—A SILLIM sale is not lawful unless the period for the delivery of the wares be fixed.—Shafei has said that it is lawful in either case (that is, whether the period of delivery be fixed or not); since it is recorded in the traditions that the prophet authorized Sillim sales in an absolute manner, without any restrictions regarding the limitation of the period. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold.—FIRST, the prophet has ordained that all Sillim sales shall be made with a stipulation of a fixed period for delivery.—SECONDLY, the prophet has prohibited man from selling what is not in his possession, but has nevertheless authorized and rendered legal Sillim sales, on this principle, that poor people stand in need of such engagements, in order that, by means of the money they receive in advance, they may acquire the subject of the sale, and deliver it to the purchaser.—It is therefore requisite that a fixed period be stipulated, because if the seller were liable to an instantaneous delivery on demand, the principle on which the legality of such sale is founded would not be answered. Moreover, an indefinite period is unlawful, because of the uncertainty; in the same manner as in a sale where the price settled is to be paid at a future period without defining it. It is to be observed that the smallest term that can be fixed for a delivery, in a Sillim sale, is one month.—Some allege the smallest term to be three days; others again fixed it at any term exceeding half a day. The first opinion is authentic; and decrees are passed accordingly.

Private standards of measurement cannot be used in it.—THE stipulation of a private measure of capacity or longitude is not lawful in a Sillim sale, because of the uncertainty, founded on the possibility of the criterion being lost in the interval between the conclusion of the contract and the delivery; as has been already explained. It is necessary also that the instrument of measurement be of a substance not liable either to contract or expand, but that it be of a fixed nature, such as a large cup. Leathern bags, however (such as those in which water is contained), are allowable for this purpose, according to Aboo Yoosaf, because of the practice of mankind.

It is not lawful under a restriction of the subject to the produce of a particular place.—A SILLIM sale, with respect to the grain of a specific village, or the fruit of a specific orchard, is not lawful; for if any accident should happen to these particular places, the delivery becomes impracticable: such practice has moreover been prohibited by the prophet.—This specification is, however, lawful, according to some doctors, provided it be to define the quality, as where a specification is made of the grain of Kishmaran in Bokhara, or of Boshakee in Fargana.

And requires that the genus be and that the species, quality, quantity, period of delivery, rate, and place of delivery, be all determined.—A SILLIM sale is not lawful,

according to Haneefa, except on seven conditions. I. That the genus of the subject of the sale be specified, such as wheat or barley. II. That the species of it be fixed, such as wheat of a soil that is watered by means of a canal, or other artificial mode, or wheat of a soil watered by rain. III. That the quality of it be fixed, such as of the best or worst kind. IV. That the quantity of it be fixed according to a standard of weight, or measurement of capacity. V. That the period of the delivery be fixed, according to ordinances in the traditions. VI. That the rate of the capital advanced be fixed, provided it be of a nature definable by a rate, as where it is an article of weight, of measurement of capacity, or of tale.—And, VII. That the place of delivery be fixed, provided the subject of the sale, on account of its weight, require portage.—The two disciples have said, that if the capital to be advanced be present, and exhibited, there is then no need of any mention of the rate; and also, that there is no need of explaining the place of delivery, since the delivery must be made in the place where the contract is concluded. Thus there is a disagreement of opinion with respect to these two conditions between Haneefa and the two disciples.—The argument of the two disciples in support of their former position, is that as the price is present and exhibited, the object may be obtained by a reference to it, the case being, in fact, the same as that of cloth stipulated as the price, in a Sillim sale, of which specification is not a requisite condition, provided it be produced to view and capable of a reference. The arguments of Haneefa are twofold. FIRST, as it often happens that many of the dirms and deenars are of a bad kind, and that the purchaser during the meeting is incapable of exchanging them, the seller therefore returns them; and a proportionate deduction being made from the wares, the sale remains extant in a degree proportionate to the sum received by the seller. Now, in this case, and under such circumstances, if the amount of the dirms be not known; it follows that it cannot be known in what extent the Sillim sale exists. SECONDLY, as it sometimes happens that the seller, being incapable of acquiring the subject of the sale, is under the necessity of restoring the price, it follows that if this should not have been explained, it is impossible to judge what sum he ought to return.

OBJECTION.—These two suppositions are merely imaginary, and therefore of no weight.

REPLY.—Imaginations, with respect to Sillim sales, are equivalent to realities; because such sales are of but a weak nature, being authorized (as has been already explained) in opposition to analogy. Hence imaginations with respect to them are of weight; and it is necessary that the price be definite with respect to the rate, provided it be of such a kind as that the contract may relate to a rate; but if it be cloth, the specification of a number of yards is not required as a condition, since these are not considered as the rate, but the description.

As, also (according to Haneefa), an explanation of the rate of the price is an essential condition to the Sillim sale, it follows that (agreeably to his tenets) a sale of this nature is not lawful where the wares, being of different kinds (such as wheat and barley), are opposed to any specific sum (one hundred dirms, for instance), without a separate price being specified in opposition to each of the kinds, because the amount being here opposed generally to both, the particular price of each remains unknown.—In the same manner also, it is not lawful where, the price being of different kinds (such as dirms and deenars), an explanation is given of the quantity of one of these kinds and not of the other; for in this case the contract of Sillim is not lawful in the degree to which an unknown quantity is opposed to it; and consequently, it is also invalid with respect to the degree in which it is opposed to a known quantity, since one contract relates to both. According to the two disciples both these modes of Sillim are lawful, since in their opinion an exhibition of the price without any explanation of the rate is valid.—The argument of the two disciples in support of their second position is, that the place of the contract is fixed for the delivery, because the contract, which is the cause of the delivery, did there take place: the case is therefore the same as that of a borrower or usurer, on each of whom it is incumbent to deliver what he may have borrowed or usurped at the place in which these deeds took place.—The reasoning of Haneefa is, that as the delivery of the subject of a Sillim sale is not immediately incumbent, the place in which the contract is concluded is not absolutely fixed as the place of delivery.—(It is otherwise in cases of loan or usurpation, since the repayment of the loan and the restitution of the usurped article are incumbent upon the instant.)—Now as the place of concluding the contract is not necessarily fixed as the place of delivery, it is requisite that some place be specified, as the uncertainty in this particular may otherwise produce a contention, since the price of goods varies in different places: it is therefore indispensable that a place of delivery be specified by the parties. Ignorance, moreover, with respect to the place of delivery, is equivalent to uncertainty with respect to the quality of the goods or the quality of the price: and accordingly, some of our modern doctors have said that if a contention arise between the parties with respect to the place of delivery, then, agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, their oaths must be severally taken, as in the case of a contention regarding the quality of the price;—whereas, agreeably to the tenets of the two disciples, their oaths are not to be taken. Others, again, have said that, agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, their oaths are not to be taken; whereas, agreeably to the tenets of the two disciples, their oaths are to be taken, because, according to them, the place of delivery is virtually involved in the contract itself, and consequently a contention with respect to it induces the necessity of the oaths of both parties, in the same manner as if it related to the goods or price:—and that the delivery, in the opinion of Haneefa, not being involved in the contract, but existing only as a condition, is therefore equivalent to a condition of option, or a determination of the period of the payment of the price;—and a contention regarding these does not induce the necessity of the oaths of the parties, but is determined by the affirmation of the seller.

It is to be observed that, in the same manner as Haneefa and the two disciples disagree regarding the specification of the place of delivery in a Sillim sale, so also they disagree regarding the specification of a place for the payment of the price (where it is stipulated at a future period),—the specification of a place for the payment of rent,—and also, the specification of a place for the payment of a sum due from a partner in a division of stock. An example, with respect to payment of the price, appears where a person purchases anything in exchange for articles of weight or measurement of capacity,—or for some definite price,—in which case, according to Haneefa, it is requisite that the place of payment be specified, provided the price be payable at a future period;—whereas, according to the two disciples, such condition is unnecessary, as the place of concluding the contract is absolutely fixed for the payment. (Some have said that Haneefa, in this particular, coincides with the two disciples. This, however, is erroneous, since it is certain that a difference of opinion obtains, as has been already stated; and such, also, is the opinion of Shimsal-Ayma).—An example, with respect to rent, appears where a person rents a house, a quadruped, or the like, stipulating the price to consist of some article of weight or measurement of capacity, or of some specific article such as is capable of being a debt upon the person,—in which case, according to Haneefa, it is requisite that the place of payment of such rent be particularly mentioned,—whereas, according to the two disciples, the mention of it is not requisite, but the house itself is fixed as the place of payment,—or (in the case of hire of an animal), the place where the hirer returns the animal to its owner.—An example with respect to a division of property, appears where two persons, jointly possessing a house, agree to divide off their shares, and one of them, having obtained a larger portion than he is entitled to, agrees to compound with the other by the payment of a particular sum,—in which case, according to Haneefa, the specification of the place of payment is a necessary condition,—whereas, according to the two disciples, this is unnecessary, as the place of concluding the agreement determines the place of payment.

The place of delivery, however, need not be determined with respect to articles which are not of expensive carriage.—If the article for which the advance is made be of such a nature as does not require any expense of portage, such as musk, camphire, saffron, or small pearls, there is no necessity, according to all our doctors, for fixing the place of delivery; because the difference of place occasions no difference of price; and in this case the delivery must be made where the contract is concluded.—The compiler of the Hedaya remarks that this is the doctrine laid down in the Jama Sagheer, and also in the Mabsoot treating of sales:—but that in the Mabsoot treating of hire it is said that the seller may deliver the goods wherever he pleases;—and this is approved; because the delivery is not immediately due; and also, because, all places in this case being similar, there is no necessity for the particular determination of any. Now, the question is, if the parties agree upon a place of delivery, whether it be absolutely fixed thereby or not.—Some are of opinion that it is not fixed, because in so determining it there is no advantage.—Others, again, maintain that it is fixed thereby, as its being so is advantageous, since the danger of the roads is thereby avoided.

Nor, if a city be mentioned, need the particular street be specified.—If, in case of the goods requiring portage, a city be fixed on for the delivery, there is then no necessity for specifying the particular street or lane, because a city, notwithstanding the variety of its parts, is considered as one place.—Some have said that this proceeds on a supposition of the city not being large;—but that, if its extent be a Farasang,* the specification of a particular part is, in that case, a necessary condition.

The price must be received at the meeting.—A SILLIM sale is not valid unless the seller receive the price in the meeting, prior to a separation from the purchaser; because if the price be stipulated in money, it would otherwise follow that one debt is opposed to another debt; a practice which has been prohibited by the prophet;—or, if the price be stipulated in wares, it is invalid, because the characteristic of Sillim is “a prompt receipt of something in lieu of something to be given,” which would not be established if a prompt delivery of the price did not take place. Besides, the payment of the price is necessary to enable the seller to acquire the goods, that he may become capable of delivery;—and hence lawyers have said that a Sillim sale, containing a condition of option in favour of both or one of the parties, is invalid, because a condition of option is a bar to the completion of the seisin, inasmuch as it prevents the conclusion of the contract in regard to its effect, namely, the establishment of right of property;—and also, that the purchaser has no option of inspection, because it is vain and useless; since the goods are a debt due from the seller, and consequently undetermined: whereas a thing seen becomes determined.—It is otherwise with respect to an option of defect; because that is no bar to seisin;—and hence, if such a stipulation be made, and the parties annul it before the close of the meeting, and the seller be in possession of the price, such Sillim sale is valid; in opposition to the opinion of Ziffer.

Whence, if a debt owing from the seller to the purchaser be considered as part of it, the sale is invalid in that proportion.—If a person purchase a Koor* of wheat, by a Sillim contract, for two hundred dirms, and, the seller being indebted to him one hundred dirms, he [the purchaser] make the advance by immediately paying to him [the seller] one hundred dirms, and opposing the debt of one hundred dirms to the remainder,—in that case the contract is invalid in the amount of the debt of one hundred dirms,—because a present seisin is not made of them; but it is valid in the amount of the one hundred dirms paid down, because of the observance of the conditions of legality with respect to that proportion, and because it is not affected by the invalidity of the other proportion, as such invalidity is supervenient, the sale being valid originally; and hence, if the purchaser, in this case, should pay down one hundred dirms on account of the debt before the end of the meeting, the sale becomes valid; but as, in the present instance, the purchaser does not pay off his debt, but merely opposes a clearance of his debt in lieu of ready payment of one hundred dirms, and the contracting parties separate from the meeting, the sale is therefore invalid in that degree.—The reason of this is, that if a debt be established as the price, in a contract of sale, still that is not absolutely fixed as the price (whence if a person purchase goods in exchange for a debt due to him by the seller of the goods, and both parties afterwards agree that the debt was not due, yet the sale does not become null); and since the debt is not absolutely fixed as the price, so as to be capable of constituting capital stock, it follows that the contract, in such case, does originally take place, and afterwards becomes invalid from that circumstance.

But it cannot be disposed of by the seller until he take possession of it.—It is not lawful for the seller to convert to use, or, by deed, to dispose of the price advanced, in a Sillim sale (as if he should sell it, for instance), prior to his seisin of it, because in this case the seisin of the price, which is an essential condition in a Sillim sale, would be defeated.

Nor can the purchaser perform any act with respect to the goods, until he receive them.—In the same manner, also, it is unlawful for a purchaser, in a Sillim sale, to perform any act with respect to the goods previous to the receipt of them; because an act with relation to the subject of a sale previous to the seisin is unlawful.—For the same reason, also, it is unlawful for the purchaser, prior to seisin, to admit another to a share in the goods, or to dispose of them at prime cost.

In a dissolution of Sillim the stock cannot be applied to the purchase of any thing from the seller until it be first received back.—If both parties agree to dissolve a contract of Sillim, the purchaser is not, in that case, entitled to accept or purchase any thing from the seller in exchange for the stock he has advanced, until he has first received it back complete; because the prophet has said, "Where ye dissolve a contract of sale upon which an advance has been made, take not from him to whom ye have paid the advance any thing except that which ye have advanced to him;"—and also, because, as the capital advanced, in this instance, is resembling and like unto the subject of the sale, it follows that any act with respect to it, previous to seisin, is invalid.—The reason why the capital advanced resembles the subject of the sale is, that a dissolution is equivalent to a new sale with relation to a third person (that is, to any other than the parties themselves), and it is therefore necessary that the subject of the sale be extant. Now it is impossible that the goods contracted to be provided can be considered as the subject of the sale, since they are not extant; it is therefore necessary to consider the price in that light; and this consequently becomes a debt due by the seller, in the same manner as the goods were.

OBJECTION.—Since a dissolution is equivalent to a new contract, similar to the first, it would follow that it is indispensable that the advanced capital be received back by the purchaser at the meeting in which the dissolution is determined on, in the same manner as it is requisite that it be advanced to the seller at the time of concluding the contract: whereas it is otherwise.

REPLY.—It is not indispensable that this be received back at the interview of dissolution, because the dissolution is not in all respects similar to the first contract.

Concerning the case in question Ziffer has given a different opinion, for, according to him, any deed relating to the price, previous to the seisin, is lawful:—but the reasoning above stated is a sufficient refutation of this opinion.

An article subsequently purchased, and made over in fulfilment of a Sillim sale, is not held to be delivered.—If a person sell a Koor of wheat by a Sillim sale, and afterwards, when the period of delivery arrives, purchase the same from another, and then desire the purchaser to receive it from that other in discharge of his claim upon him; and the purchaser accordingly take possession of the same, still he is not considered to have made seisin of the subject of the Sillim sale, and consequently, if the wheat be lost or destroyed whilst in his possession, the seller is responsible for the same.

Babylonish measure of 7,100¹/₂ lib.—

Unless the purchaser receive it first on behalf of the seller, and then make seisin of it on his own account, by two distinct measurements.—BUT if the seller should have desired him to receive it first on his [the seller's] account, and afterwards on his own account, and the purchaser, accordingly, first measure it out and receive it on account of the seller, and afterwards measure it out and receive it on his own account, the subject of the Sillim sale is in that case delivered, and the purchaser becomes completely seised of the same. The reason of this is, that there is here a conjunction of two contracts; first, the Sillim sale; and, secondly, the sale between the seller of the Sillim sale and the third person; and it is a necessary condition that the measurement take place in both, because the prophet has prohibited the sale of wheat until the measure both of the purchaser and the seller shall have been applied to it; and this prohibition (as has been already explained) evidently alludes to the conjunction of two contracts, such as in the case in question.

OBJECTION.—As the Sillim sale is previous to the purchase of wheat made by the Sillim seller, it follows that the two contracts are not conjoined.

REPLY.—The Sillim contract is antecedent, but the seisin of the subject of it is posterior;—and the seisin here is equivalent to a sale de novo; because, although the subject of the Sillim sale was a debt incumbent on the seller, and what the purchaser had received was a determinate thing, and consequently, in reality, different from a debt, yet they are in this case considered as one and the same thing, lest it should follow that the exchange of the subject of a Sillim sale has been made previous to the seisin of it; for if they were to be considered as two things, it would follow that the subject of the Sillim sale prior to the seisin of it was given in exchange for what the purchaser made seisin of, namely, a determinate thing and not a debt.—Now since the seisin is proved to be in the nature of a sale de novo, it follows that two contracts are conjoined, namely, the purchase of the wheat by the Sillim seller, and the seisin of it by the Sillim purchaser, which is equivalent to a sale de novo; that is, the case is the same as if the Sillim seller, having purchased it from the purchaser, were to re-sell it to the Sillim purchaser.

A second measurement is not required in a similar receipt of article by a lender.—If a person, indebted to another in a Koor of wheat, not on account of a Sillim sale,* but on account of a loan, should purchase a Koor of wheat from another, and then desire his creditor to receive the same from the other, in lieu of what he had borrowed, and the creditor, having measured out the same, should accordingly take possession of it, such seisin is valid, and a re-payment of the loan is established; because a loan of indefinite property [Karz] is equivalent to a loan of specific property [Araat],—and hence the Koor of wheat so measured and received by the lender may be said to be his actual right, for which reason the transaction is not regarded as a conjunction of two contracts [with respect to one subject], and it is consequently not requisite that the wheat be measured a second time.

If the seller measure the article, on behalf of the purchaser, in his absence, it is not a delivery,—although it be measured into the purchaser's sack.—If a person, having purchased a Koor of wheat by a Sillim sale, should order the seller to measure it and put it into his (the purchaser's) sack, and the seller having accordingly measured it out, should put it into the sack at a time when the purchaser is not himself present, in this case a delivery of the goods is not held to have taken place (insomuch that if the wheat should in that situation be destroyed, the loss falls entirely on the seller); because the purchaser, in a Sillim sale, does not become proprietor of the article, for which he makes the advance, until actual seisin, as his right is of an indefinite nature and not determinate: now the wheat, in the case in question, is a determinate article, and hence the order given to the seller by the purchaser to measure it out was not valid,—since the order of a director is of no account except with respect to his own property.—Thus the seller, as it were, borrowed the sack of the purchaser, and put wheat which was his own property into it;—in the same manner as if a person, having a debt of some dirms due to him by another, should give his purse to the debtor and desire him to weigh the dirms and put them into it; in which case if the debtor act accordingly, still the creditor does not by the performance of this act become seised of those dirms.—If, on the contrary, a person, having purchased wheat that is determinate and present, should direct the seller to measure it, and put it into his (the purchaser's) sack, and the seller act accordingly, at a time when the purchaser is absent, the purchaser is nevertheless seised of the same in virtue of that act, because his directions to the seller were efficient, as the property of the wheat had vested in him in consequence of his purchase of it.—Hence it appears that in a common sale the purchaser becomes proprietor of the article previous to the seisin,— whereas, in a Sillim sale, the right of property does not vest until after the seisin.—Hence, also, in a Sillim sale, if the purchaser desire the seller to grind the wheat, put in the manner above recited into his bag, the flour is the property of the seller;—whereas, if the same were to be done in case of a common sale, it would be the property of the purchaser. In the same manner, also, if the purchaser should desire the seller to throw the wheat into the river, and he act accordingly, then, in a Sillim sale, the loss would result to the seller,—whereas, in a common sale it would fall upon the purchaser, and he would remain responsible for the price, since his order was efficient. Hence, in the Rawayet-Saheeh, it is declared to be sufficient that the seller, by the direction of the purchaser, measure out the article and put it into the purchaser's sack; and there is no necessity for another measurement, since in this case the seller acts as agent for measurement to the purchaser; and the seisin is completely established, because of the falling of the wheat into the purchaser's sack.

* That is, as an article for which he had received an advance.

And so also, if it be measured by the seller into his own sack, at the purchaser's instance, although the purchaser be present.—If a person purchase wheat, and direct the seller to measure it out and put it into his own sack, and the seller act accordingly, the purchaser is not seised of it, inasmuch as he borrowed the sack of the seller without taking possession of it, and consequently does not become seised of its contents.—The case is therefore the same as if the purchaser had directed the seller to measure out the wheat and place it in a particular corner of his own house, which being completely in the possession of the seller, the purchaser cannot consequently be seised of anything in it.

Case of delivery of a determinate article in the same parcel with an undeterminate article.—If an undeterminate and a specific thing be joined together, by a person (for instance) purchasing a specific Koor of wheat, and also entering into a Sillim contract for another Koor of the same (the former of which is specific and the latter undeterminate), and then directing the seller to measure out both into his own sack, in that case, if the seller first measure the specific wheat into the sack, and afterwards the undeterminate wheat, the purchaser is seised of both the measures of wheat;—of the determinate wheat, because his directions to the seller with respect to it were efficient, as it was his undoubted property;—and of the undeterminate wheat, because, upon the seller measuring it out, and placing it in the bag, it then becomes implicated with the property of the purchaser, and on account of such implication the purchaser becomes seised of it.—The case therefore is analogous to where a person, having solicited the loan of some wheat, desires the lender to scatter it on his (the borrower's) ground,—or, where a person consigns his ring to a jeweller with directions to add to it more gold, to the weight of half a deenar;—for in both these cases the seisin takes place immediately on the implication with the property.—If, on the contrary, in the case in question, the seller first measure out the undeterminate wheat, and place it in the purchaser's sack, and afterwards the specific wheat, the purchaser does not become seised of either; because his directions to measure out the undeterminate wheat were not efficient, and consequently the property of it remained with the seller, as before:—and having afterwards mixed the determinate wheat with his own property, he thereby destroys and annuls the right of property of the other.—This is founded on the doctrine of Haneefa, according to whom the implication of the property of another with one's own is destructive of the right of property of that other; and on this principle he holds the sale with respect to the determinate wheat to be dissolved.

OBJECTION.—The above implication is with the consent of the purchaser, since it was by his order that the seller made the measurement, and hence the sale ought not in this case to be dissolved.

REPLY.—The implication is not made with the consent of the purchaser, since there is a probability that his object was that the specific wheat should first be measured out.

WHAT is here advanced is founded on the doctrine of Haneefa, as above stated. The two disciples are of opinion that the purchaser has the option of either dissolving the sale or sharing with the seller in the mixed property; because, according to them, the implication of the property of another with one's own is not in all cases destructive of the right of property of that other.

If the contract be dissolved, and the article advanced perish before restitution, the seller is responsible.—If a person purchase a Koor of wheat by a Sillim contract, making a female slave the price advanced, and after the seller taking possession of the slave the parties dissolve the contract, and the slave afterwards die whilst yet in the possession of the seller, in this case the seller is responsible for the value she bore on the day of seisin.—If, also, the dissolution be made after the death of the female slave, it is valid, and the seller in the same manner remains responsible for the value at the period of seisin.—The reason of this is that the validity of a dissolution rests upon the existence of the contract, and that, again, rests upon the existence of the subject of it: now, in a contract of Sillim, the article advanced for is the subject of the contract; and as that, in the case in question, still continues in existence, it follows that the dissolution is valid:—and the dissolution being valid, and the contract of Sillim consequently cancelled with respect to the article advanced for, it follows that it is also cancelled with respect to the slave (being the price paid in advance), as a dependant of the article advanced for, although it be not valid with respect to the slave, originally, because of her non-existence, since there are many things which, although not valid originally, are yet so dependant.—The contract, therefore, being cancelled with respect to the slave, it becomes incumbent upon the seller to return her; but as this is impracticable, he must pay her value.

The dissolution of a sale is rendered invalid by the article perishing before restitution.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should agree with the seller to dissolve the bargain, and the slave afterwards die in his possession, the dissolution is invalid;—or, if the slave die first, and the parties then agree to dissolve the contract, in this case also the dissolution is invalid;—because, the slave being the subject of the sale, and his death of consequence destroying the existence of the contract, the dissolution is therefore invalid from the beginning in the second case, and becomes invalid in the end in the first case,—as the subject no longer remains. It is otherwise in a case of Bea Mookayeza, or barter; because a dissolution in that case is valid after the decay or destruction of one of the articles; since either of them being capable of becoming the subject of the sale, the existing one is therefore considered as such.

In a dispute with respect to the value of the subject, the assertion of the seller (upon oath) must be credited.—If a person enter into a contract of Sillim for a Koor of wheat, at the rate of ten dirms, and the seller afterwards assert that “he had agreed for wheat of an inferior sort,” and the purchaser deny this, asserting that “the stipulation of wheat was made in an absolute manner, and therefore the contract is invalid,” in such case the assertion of the seller, corroborated by an oath, must be credited, since he pleads the validity of the contract, by virtue of the declaration of a condition of it; and the assertion of the purchaser, notwithstanding his denial of the validity of the contract, is not credited, because it tends to a destruction of his own right, since it is a custom, in Sillim sales, that the goods advanced for be superior to the sum advanced.—If a vice versa disagreement take place between the parties, the learned say that, agreeably to the doctrine of Haneefa, the assertion of the purchaser is credited, since he claims the validity of the contract.—According to the two disciples, the assertion of the seller is credited in both cases, as he is the defendant in both, notwithstanding that, in the latter, he deny the validity of the contract. This will be more fully explained hereafter.

If the seller deny the appointment of a period of delivery, the assertion of the purchaser, fixing that period, must be credited.—If a disagreement take place between the parties to a Sillim sale, by the seller asserting that a period of delivery had not been determined in the contract, and the purchaser asserting that it had, the assertion of the purchaser must be credited, because a determination of a period for delivery is a right of the seller, and his denial is therefore a wilful injury to himself.

OBJECTION.—The seller denies the determination of a period for delivery from a view to his own advantage; since such denial is the cause of annulling the contract, by which means he obtains the property of the goods he had engaged to deliver. Hence his denial is advantageous and not injurious to himself.

REPLY.—The invalidity of a Sillim contract, because of the period of delivery being undeterminate, is not certain, since our doctors have disagreed on this point. The advantage, therefore, in this view, is of no account;—whereas the advantage to the seller, from the determination of such period, being obvious, his denial of it thereupon is an injury to himself.—It is otherwise in the case of a disagreement between the parties with regard to the existence of a condition concerning the quality of the article; because in that instance the invalidity of the contract, from a want of a definition of the quality, is certain.

If, on the other hand, the seller assert that the period had been determined, and the purchaser deny this, in that case, according to the two disciples, the assertion of the purchaser must be credited, because he denies the right which the seller claims from him, although, at the same time, he deny the validity of the contract;—in the same manner as holds with respect to the proprietor of the stock in a contract of Mozaribat;—that is to say, if the proprietor of the stock were to say to his Mozarib, or manager, “I stipulated that a half of the profit shall go to you excepting ten dirms;” and the manager deny this, and assert that he had stipulated a half of the profit in his favour, in this case the assertion of the proprietor of the stock is credited, since he denies the claim of right of the agent, notwithstanding he thereby at the same time deny the validity of the contract between them.—Haneefa says that, in the case in question, the assertion of the seller is to be credited, because he claims the validity of the contract. Besides, the purchaser and seller both agree in their having made a Sillim contract, and consequently they both apparently agree in the validity of it;—but, again, the purchaser, in denying the assertion of the seller, denies the validity of the contract, which is the denial of a thing he at the same time admits, and is consequently not worthy of credit.—It is otherwise in the case of Mozaribat, because a contract of Mozaribat is not binding upon either the manager or the owner of the stock, since the manager may refuse the execution of the Mozaribat at any time, and the constituent may dismiss him when he pleases: such a disagreement, therefore, in the case of Mozaribat, is of no consequence, the plea of invalidity, in this instance, amounting, in fact, to nothing more than a refusal to carry the contract into execution, which it is lawful for either party to do. There remains, therefore, only the claim to profit on the part of the manager; and as this is opposed by the proprietor of the stock, his declaration must consequently be credited.—A Sillim contract, on the contrary, is absolute, and therefore of a different nature.

FROM the above discussion it appears to be a general rule that the assertion of a person who denies his own right, and not the right of another upon him, is not credited in the opinion of all our doctors:—and that whoever pleads the validity of a contract must be credited in his assertion, according to Haneeffa, provided both parties be agreed in the uniformity of the contract, such as that of Sillim, which, whether valid or invalid, is of an uniform nature; in opposition to Mozaribat, which, in case of its validity, is a contract of participated profit, and in case of its invalidity is merely a contract of hire.—The two scholars are of opinion that, in the case in question, the assertion of the defendant must be credited, notwithstanding he thereby deny the validity of the contract.

In Sillim sales of piece goods all the qualities must be particularly specified.—If a person enter into a Sillim contract with respect to cloth, describing its length, breadth, and quality of fineness or coarseness, such sale is valid, because it is a contract of Sillim which relates to a known thing, and of which the delivery is practicable. If the subject of the sale be a piece of silk stuff, it is necessary, in addition, to settle the weight, that also being an object in this instance.

Sillim sale is not valid in shells, or jewels: but it is valid in small pearls sold by weight.—A SILLIM sale of jewels or marine shells is not lawful, because the unities of these vary in their value.

A SILLIM sale of small pearls that are sold according to weight is lawful, as the weight ascertains the subject of the sale.

In bricks.—THERE is no impropriety in a sale of bricks, whether they be in a wet or dry state, provided a description be given of the mould in which they are formed, because bricks, in their unities, are of a similar nature, more especially where their mould is described.

And (in short) in all articles which admit a general description of quality, and ascertainment of quantity.—IN short, everything of which it is possible to comprise a description of the qualities, and a knowledge of the quantity, is a fit subject of Sillim sale, as it cannot occasion contention; on the other hand, a Sillim sale is not lawful with respect to things incapable of being defined by a description of quality or quantity; because the subject of a Sillim sale is a debt due by the seller; and if its quality be not known there consequently exists a degree of uncertainty, from which a contention must arise.

Or which are particularly defined.—THERE is no impropriety in a Sillim sale of pots or vessels for boiling water, or of boots, or the like, provided these articles be particularly defined, because the conditions essential to the validity of a Sillim sale are here observed;—but if the articles be not defined, the sale is absolutely invalid, the subject of the sale being in such case an undefined debt. It is also lawful to bespeak any of these articles from the workman without fixing the period of delivery.—Thus if a person should desire a boot-maker to make boots on his account, of a particular size and quality, such agreement is lawful, on a favourable construction, founded on the usage and practice of mankind, although it be unlawful by analogy, as being the sale of a nonentity, which is prohibited.

Articles bespoke from the manufacturer, in a contract of Sillim, are considered as entities.—IT is to be observed that a contract for workmanship is a sale and not merely a promise. This is approved. The subject of the sale, moreover, in such case, although in reality a nonentity, is yet considered, in effect, as an entity; and the thing upon which the contract rests is considered as a substance (that is, as boots, for instance), and not as the work of a manufacturer in an abstracted manner;—and accordingly, if the manufacturer bring boots that had been worked by another, or boots which he had himself worked prior to the contract, and the person who had bespoke them should approve of the same, the contract is legally fulfilled.—Besides, articles that are bespoke are not determined for the person who bespoke them until he approve of them; and hence, if the workman should sell them to another before he had shown them to this person, it is lawful.—All this is approved.

And may be rejected, if disapproved, upon delivery.—WHOEVER bespeaks goods of a workman has the option of taking or rejecting them, because of his having purchased articles which he has not seen.—The workman, however, has no option, inasmuch that the person who bespoke them may, if he please, take them from him by force.—This is recorded by Mohammed, in the Mabsoot, and is the most authentic doctrine.—It is related, however, as an opinion of Haneeffa, that the workman also has an option, inasmuch as it is impossible for him to furnish the articles bespoke without detriment, since, in order to make boots (for instance), it is necessary to purchase hides, and instruments to cut them, and this is not free from loss. It is related, as an opinion of Abou Yoosaf, that neither party possesses an option; for the workman, as being the seller, is not entitled to an option,—in the same manner as, in a sale of goods unseen, the seller hath no option; and with regard to the person who bespeaks the goods, if an option were given to him it would be an injury to the seller, since if he rejected the goods other people might not choose to purchase them for the value; as where, for instance, a commander of high rank bespeaks goods, and the workman accordingly makes them in a style suitable to his rank, and he afterwards rejects them; in which case the common rank of people would not purchase them for their value.

An engagement with a manufacturer to furnish goods which it is not customary to bespeak is not valid.—A CONTRACT with a workman for the furnishing of goods is not lawful with respect to such articles as it is not customary among mankind to bespeak,—as cloth (for instance), because the bespeaking of goods is in itself unlawful, and is therefore admitted by the law only so far as it is authorized by the custom of mankind, which is considered as a necessary instrument of its legality.—It is also requisite, in bespeaking articles authorized by the custom of mankind, to describe their quality, in order to enable the workman to furnish them accordingly; and unless such description be given, the contract is unlawful.—It is to be observed that the prohibition of a stipulation of a period for delivery, as recited in the first of these cases relative to contracts of this kind, proceeds upon this ground, that if a period were stipulated in a contract for the supply of work of articles authorized by custom, and the price paid immediately to the workman, it would then become a Sillim sale in the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf: in opposition to that, however, of the two disciples, who hold that it would still remain merely a contract for the supply of work:—but if the period should be stipulated in the case of articles not authorized by custom, it then becomes a Sillim sale in the opinions of all our doctors.—The reasoning of the two disciples in support of their opinion in the first case, is that the word Istisna literally means a requisition of workmanship, and ought of consequence to be used in that sense, so long as the context does not determinate it to some other sense.

OBJECTION.—The stipulation of a period is a context which clearly indicates that Istisna is to be taken in a sense different from its literal meaning; and that it is to be understood as implying a Sillim agreement; otherwise what need for the stipulation of a period?—It would therefore appear that in such a case it amounts to a Sillim.

REPLY.—The stipulation of a period, as in the first case, is not a convincing argument that the word Istisna is not to be taken in its literal sense, but ought to be understood as implying an agreement of Sillim; because the stipulation of a period may be supposed to have been made with a view to expedition,—and it may be supposed that the object of the bespeaker, in fixing a period, was to prevent delays: in opposition to the case of things not authorized by custom, for there a contract for a supply of workmanship, as being invalid, is construed to mean a Sillim sale, which is lawful.

The reasoning of Haneefa is that, when a period is stipulated, it fixes the subject of the sale to be a debt, because periods are not fixed except with regard to debts; and the subject being proved to be a debt, the construction of the contract into a Sillim sale is easy and natural. It is therefore construed to be a Sillim sale, which is lawful, in the opinion of all our doctors, beyond a doubt; whereas, there is a doubt with respect to the other, since practice means the deeds of all people of all countries, and this can never be known with certainty: as, therefore, the legality of a Sillim sale is certain, and practice is not free from doubt, it follows that it is preferable to construe a contract for a supply of work to mean a contract of Sillim.

Section.

Miscellaneous Cases.

It is lawful to sell dogs or hawks.—It is lawful to sell a dog or a hawk, whether trained or otherwise. It is related, as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that the sale of a dog that bites is not lawful;—and Shafei has said that the sale of a dog is absolutely illegal; because the prophet has declared “the wages of whoredom, and the price of a dog, are in the number of prohibited things;” and also, because a dog is actual filth, and is therefore deserving of abhorrence; whereas the legality of sale entitles the subject of it to respect; and is consequently incompatible with the nature of a dog. The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. FIRST, the prophet has prohibited the sale of dogs, excepting such as are trained to hunt or to watch.—SECONDLY, dogs are a species of property, inasmuch as they are capable of yielding profit by means of hunting and watching; and being property, they are therefore fit subjects of sale; in opposition to the case of noxious animals, such as snakes or scorpions, which are not capable of yielding use. With respect to the tradition quoted by Shafei, it applies to the infancy of Islam, at which period the prophet prohibited every one from eating the price of a dog, in order to restrain men from a fondness for dogs, as it was then a custom to keep dogs for breed, and to suffer them to sleep on the same carpet. But when this custom fell into disuse, and men abstained from a fondness for dogs, the prophet ordained the sale of them. With respect to the assertion of Shafei, that dogs are actual filth, it is not admitted; but admitting this, still it follows that the eating, and not the selling of them is unlawful.

It is not lawful to sell wine or pork.—The sale of wine or pork is not lawful; because, in the same manner as the prophet has prohibited the eating or drinking of these, so also has he prohibited the sale of them, or the eating of the price of them; and also, because these are not substantial property with regard to Mussulmans, as has been before frequently explained.

Rules with respect to Zimmies in sale.—

ZIMMEES, in purchase and sale, are the same as Mussulmans;—because the prophet has said "Be regardful of ZIMMEES, for they are entitled to the same rights, and subject to the same rules with MUSSULMANS!"—and also, because, being under the same necessities, in the transaction of their concerns, as Mussulmans, they stand in need of the same immunities. They are therefore the same as Mussulmans, with respect to purchase and sale,—excepting, however, in the sale of wine and pork, which is lawful to them, as the sale of wine, by them, is considered in the same light with that of the crude juice of the grape by the Mussulmans; and the sale of pork by them is equivalent to that of the flesh of a goat by Mussulmans; because these things are lawful in their belief, and we are commanded to suffer them to pursue their own tenets. Moreover, Omar commanded his agents to empower the Zimmies to sell wine, taking from them a tenth part of the price: a proof that the sale of wine is lawful among them.

A person inducing another to sell his property to a third person, by offering an addition over and above the price, is responsible for such addition: but not unless this addition be expressed as forming a part of the price.

—If a person say to another, "sell your slave to a particular person for one thousand dirms, on condition that I be responsible to you for five hundred dirms of the price, independent of the one thousand dirms," and the said person act accordingly, it is valid, and he is entitled to one thousand dirms from the purchaser, and to five hundred dirms from the security; whereas, if he were simply to say, "I will be responsible for five hundred dirms," without mentioning the words "of the price," the seller is, in that case, entitled only to the one thousand dirms from the purchaser, and has no claim on the surety.—The reason of this is, that an increase in the price, or in the wares, is lawful, according to all our doctors, and is joined to the original contract (as has been already explained), being only an alteration of the contract from one lawful quality to another lawful quality;—and as it is lawful for the purchaser to make an alteration in the price, although he be no gainer in other respects by it (as if he should increase the price, notwithstanding it be adequate to the value of the goods before the increase), so also it is lawful for a stranger to lay himself under an obligation for an increase of price, although he have no advantage in other respects;—in the same manner as the consideration for Khoola becomes incumbent upon a wife in virtue of her assent to the Khoola, although she receive nothing in exchange, for woman is originally free, and the procurement of a divorce adds nothing to her original freedom. It is essential, therefore, to the validity of the seller's claim upon this person, that the increase be opposed to the goods by the specification of the words "of the price;" and if these words be omitted, the declaration or stipulation is of no account.

A female slave may be contracted in marriage by the purchaser without his taking possession of her.—If a person, having purchased a female slave, make her over in marriage to another before seisin, and that other cohabit with her, such marriage is lawful, as having been concluded in virtue of the authority of the proprietor:—and it also determines the seisin of the purchaser. If, however, the husband should not cohabit with her, the marriage does not, in that case, determine the seisin according to a favourable construction of the law.—Analogy, indeed, would suggest that the purchaser becomes seised of the slave on the instant of the marriage-contract, since, in consequence thereof, the right of property over the slave is rendered virtually defective;—it would therefore follow that the seisin becomes established as an effect of the contract, in the same manner as in the case of an actual defect occasioned by any act of a purchaser.—The reason for a more favourable construction, on this occasion, is that any act by which an actual defect is occasioned infers an exertion of power over the subject, which consequently established a seisin of the subject: but an act which merely induces a virtual defect does not admit of this inference, so as to establish seisin.

Case of the purchaser disappearing, without taking possession of his purchase, or paying the price.—If a person, having purchased a slave, should afterwards absent himself without taking possession, or paying the price, and the seller prove by witnesses that he had sold the slave to the absentee, in that case, provided the place of his retirement be known and ascertained, the slave cannot be re-sold on account of the exigencies of the seller, for these may be otherwise answered, and such sale would destroy the right of the first purchaser:—but if the absentee's place of retirement be not known, the slave may be re-sold, and the debt of the purchaser to the seller paid by means of the price; for the seller has proved, by witnesses, that the slave is the property of the purchaser, and that he has a claim upon him; and consequently, when the place of retirement of the purchaser is unknown, it is incumbent on the magistrate to direct the slave to be sold for the satisfaction of the seller, which could not otherwise be obtained;—in the same manner as where a pawnier dies before having released his pledge, in which case it is sold for the discharge of his debt to the pawnholder.—It is otherwise where the purchaser disappears after seisin, for in this case the slave cannot be sold to answer the right of the seller, since his right is not particularly connected with the slave, as he, in such a circumstance, stands in the same predicament with the other creditors.—It is to be observed that, in case of the slave being sold on account of the seller, if anything remain after the discharge of his claim by means of the price, the seller must keep such remainder in behalf of the purchaser, to whom it is due as an exchange for his property:—but if the price should not suffice to answer his claim, he is in that case entitled afterwards to the remainder from the purchaser.

Or of one of two purchasers disappearing under the same circumstance.—SUPPOSING there be two purchasers, and only one of them disappear, the one that is present is entitled to pay the whole of the price of the slave, and to take complete possession of him; and if, in this case, the other purchaser afterward appear, he is not entitled to receive his share until he shall have paid to his partner the price of it. This is the adjudication of Haneefa and Mohammed. Aboo Yoosaf has said that, if the present purchaser pay the whole of the price, still he is only entitled to take possession of his own share, and that, as the payment of the debt of the absentee was a gratuitous and unsolicited act in his favour, he is not entitled to receive it from him, since he paid it without his authority. Besides, as the present purchaser is, as it were, a stranger with respect to the absentee, he is not entitled to take possession of his share. The reasoning of Haneefa is that the present purchaser, in making payment on behalf of the absentee, acted from necessity, and not from choice; because it was not otherwise possible for him to enjoy his own share, since, having purchased the slave jointly with the other by one contract, it was impossible for him to detain him in his possession whilst there existed the claim of another with respect to part of him. Now whosoever pays the debt of another from necessity is entitled to repayment, notwithstanding his having acted without authority; as in the case of the loan of a pledge; for if a person lend to another something in order that he may pledge it, and that other having pledged it accordingly, the lender afterwards, from a necessary want of the said thing, redeem it from the pawnee, he is, in such case, entitled to repayment from the borrower, although he have redeemed the pledge without authority from him.—Since, therefore, the present purchaser, in the case in question, has a right to repayment from the absentee, it follows that he has also a right to detain in his possession the share of the absentee until he receive payment of the sum due to him; in the same manner as an agent for purchase, who pays from his own property the price of the goods purchased on behalf of his constituent, is entitled to retain possession of them until he receive payment of the price from his constituent.

Case of gold and silver being indefinitely mentioned in the offer of a price.—If a person purchase a female slave in exchange for one thousand miskals of gold and silver,—saying, “I purchase this slave for one thousand miskals of gold and silver,” in that case it is incumbent on him to pay five hundred miskals of gold, and five hundred miskals of silver; for the reference of the miskal to the gold and silver having been in an equal degree applicable to each, an equal proportion in the payment is of consequence incumbent.—If, on the other hand, the purchaser should say, “I have purchased this slave in exchange for one thousand of gold and silver,” in this case he must pay five hundred miskals of gold, and five hundred dirms of silver (of the septimal weight); for the term one thousand having been referred to the gold and silver in a general manner, it is therefore construed to apply to the weight in common use with respect to each in particular.

The receipt of base money instead of good money, if it be lost or expended, is a complete discharge.—If a person indebted to another in the amount of ten dirms of a good sort, afterwards pay him this amount in an inferior species, and the other, being ignorant of this circumstance, receive them, and afterwards expend them, or lose them, in this case the debt is completely discharged, and the creditor is not entitled to any compensation for the difference of quality.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Aboo Yoosaf has said, that in this case the creditor is entitled to return to the debtor a tantamount of dirms of the sort he received, and to demand from him ten dirms of a superior sort, to which he has a right; because, in the same manner as his right relates to the substance of the dirms, so also is it established in the quality. A conservation of each right is therefore indispensable: but as the conservation of the second right, by means of an allowance in exchange for the difference of quality, is impracticable (since quality in homogeneous articles is of no relative value), this mode must necessarily be adopted. The reasoning of Haneefa and Mohammed is, that the bad dirms are of the same species with the good; and that after the receipt and expenditure, or destruction of them, the debt is discharged; because the claim which remains relates to quality, and this is impossible to satisfy by the granting of a compensation, inasmuch as quality in itself bears no value.

Articles of a neutral nature do not become property but by actual seisin.—If a bird incubate its eggs in the land of a particular person, the right of property over the brood does not, in virtue of such incubation, vest in the proprietor of the ground; on the contrary, they remain free to the person who shall first seize them.—The law is also the same with respect to eggs which a bird lays upon any particular ground.—So also, if a deer should sleep for a night in a field, it does not by that act become the property of the proprietor of that field; on the contrary, it remains free to whomsoever it may be caught by. The reason of this is, that both the young ones and the deer are considered in the nature of game, and as such are free to the person who catches them, although no stratagem be used for that purpose;—and th same, also, of eggs; whence, if a Mohrim should either break or broil them, he is subject to make expiation.—Moreover, the proprietor did not purposely prepare his land that the bird should lay or incubate her eggs, or that the deer should sleep upon it.—It is therefore the same as if a person should spread out his net for the purpose of drying it, in which case, if any game should fall into it, it would not become immediately the property of the proprietor of the net, but would continue neutral until some one seize it;—or, as if game should come into a house, in which case it does not become the immediate property of the proprietor of the house;—or, as if a person, scattering sugar or dirms (for instance) among the people, should chance to throw these into the clothes of some one; in which case the property does not immediately vest in that person, until he wrap it up or prepare to seize it.—It is otherwise with respect to honey, for the property of it vests in the proprietor of the ground in which it is gathered together; because honey is considered as the produce of the ground, and hence the proprietor of the ground obtains a property in it as a dependant of the soil, in the same manner as in the trees which grow in his land, or in water which flows through it.

BOOK XVII.

OF SIRF SALE.

Definition of Sirf sale.—BEEYA SIRF means a pure sale, of which the articles opposed in exchange to each other are both representatives of price. This is termed Sirf, because Sirf means a removal, and in this mode of sale it is necessary to remove the articles opposed to each other in exchange from the hands of each of the parties, respectively, into those of the other. Sirf also means a superiority; and in this kind of sale a superiority is the only object; that is, a superiority of quality, fashion, or workmanship; for gold or silver being, with respect to their substance, of no use, are only desirable from such superiority.

The articles opposed must be exactly equal in point of weight; but may differ in quality.—THE sale of gold for gold, or silver for silver, is permitted only when they are exactly equal in point of weight: but the one may be of a superior quality to the other; or the one may be bullion, and the other may be wrought; because the prophet has said "Sell GOLD for GOLD, from hand to hand, at an equal rate according to weight; for any inequality in point of weight is USURY." And he has also declared "the GOODNESS and BADNESS of the quality is the same" (as has been already explained in the preceding book treating of sale).

The exchange must take place upon the spot.—MUTUAL seisin is an indispensable requisite in a Sirf sale;—that is, it is indispensable that each of the parties, prior to their departure from the meeting, take possession of the article respectively given in exchange; because of the tradition above quoted; and also, because Omar said to one of the parties in a Sirf sale, "If the other party require leave to go to his house, yet you must not grant it."—Besides, the seisin of one of the parties is an indispensable requisite, lest the contract prove to be an exchange of a debt for a debt:—and as the seisin of one of the parties is requisite, it follows that, in order to establish an equality, the seisin of the other is also requisite, since usury would otherwise be induced. In a sale of this nature, moreover, neither subject has a priority with respect to the other; and hence a mutual seisin is requisite, whether both the subjects be of a determinate nature (as in the sale of one silver vessel for another silver vessel), or of a nature not determinate (as in the sale of dirms and deenars in exchange for dirms and deenars), or one of them determinate and the other not (as in the sale of a silver vessel in exchange for dirms and deenars); because the tradition enjoining a mutual seisin is absolute, and makes no discrimination of these circumstances.—Besides, although a silver vessel be determinate, still there subsists a doubt with respect to its determination, inasmuch as silver is considered in its nature as a representative of price; and, in a case of this nature, a doubt is a sufficient cause for the necessity of seisin, because a doubt, in matters relative to usury, is equivalent to a reality.—It is to be observed that what is meant by mutual seisin, is that both parties make seisin prior to their separation; whence if the parties walk aside together, or sleep in the place of meeting, or become insensible, the Sirf sale is not thereby rendered null, because Omar has said "If the seller, in a Sirf sale, should leap from the top of the house, do you leap after him."

Gold may be sold for silver, at an unequal rate, provided the exchange take place upon the spot.—THE sale of gold in exchange for silver, at an unequal rate, is permitted, because these articles are of a different genus. Still, however, in such case, mutual seisin is indispensable, because the prophet has said, "The sale of gold for silver is usury unless it be from hand to hand." If, therefore, the parties separate before both or one of them make seisin, the sale is invalid; and hence it is not lawful to stipulate an optional condition, or an optional period, because such stipulations are preventive of mutual seisin, which is an indispensable condition. If, however, a Sirf sale be contracted with an optional condition, and the condition be afterwards removed previous to the separation of the parties, the Sirf sale is in that case valid, because of the cause of its invalidity being destroyed previous to its complete establishment.

No act can be performed with relation to the return until it be received.—ANY deed with respect to the return, in a Sirf sale, previous to seisin of it, is unlawful. If, therefore, a person, having sold a deenar for ten dirms, should, previous to the seisin of them, purchase a piece of cloth for them, in that case the sale of the cloth is invalid, on this principle, that the seisin of the ten dirms was absolutely incumbent; because otherwise the Sirf sale would be usurious; and as God has prohibited usury, it follows that if the sale of the cloth were licensed, an absolute commandment of God would thereby be defeated.—It is related, as an opinion of Ziffer, that the sale of the cloth is capable of being rendered valid; because dirms being undeterminate, it follows that the price of the cloth relates to ten dirms in an absolute manner, and not to the ten dirms of the Sirf sale in a specific manner. Our doctors on the other hand, argue that price, in a Sirf sale, is also a subject of the sale; because, as every sale must have a subject, and as the articles, in a Sirf sale, are both representatives of price, without any of them having a preference over the other, it follows that either of them is the subject; and the sale of the subject previous to the seisin is unlawful.

OBJECTION.—The consideration, in a Sirf sale, is a representative of price, and therefore of an undeterminate nature: whence it would follow that it cannot be considered as the subject, since the subject of a sale is required to be determinate.

REPLY.—The subject of a sale is not required to be determinate; for, in a Sillim sale, the thing on account of which the advance is made is the subject of the sale; but still it is undeterminate.

Gold may be sold for silver, by conjecture; but not gold for gold, nor silver for silver.—

THE sale of gold for silver, by conjecture,* is lawful, because equality, in a sale of this nature, is not required.—It is unlawful, however, to sell gold for gold, or silver for silver, by conjecture, because in such sale there is a suspicion of usury.

In the sale of an article having any gold or silver upon it, the price paid down is opposed to the gold or silver.—If a person sell, for two thousand Miskals of silver, a female slave whose real value is one thousand Miskals, and on whose neck there is a collar of silver equivalent to one thousand Miskals of silver, and the purchaser having paid a thousand Miskals of silver, ready money, the parties then separate from the meeting, such payment is considered to be the price of the collar, because the seisin of so much of the price of the whole was a necessary condition, as the sale in that proportion was a Sirf sale; and hence it is reasonable to conclude that the seller paid the exact amount of which he knew the seisin to be indispensably necessary. In the same manner, also, if he purchase the said slave with the collar, for two thousand Miskals of silver, of which one thousand is prompt and the other thousand postponed, the prompt payment is considered as the price of the collar, because the stipulation of payment at a future period not being lawful in a Sirf sale, and being permitted in the sale of a slave, it is reasonable to suppose that the parties, in contracting the sale, and stipulating the distant period, intended to proceed according to law.—If, also, a person sell, for one hundred dirms, a sword, of which the silver ornaments amount to fifty dirms, and the purchaser pay immediately fifty dirms of the price in prompt payment, such sale is lawful, and the payment made is considered to be for the price of the ornaments, although the purchaser may not have specified this.—The same rule, also, holds if the purchaser say to the seller, “Take these fifty dirms in part of the price of both” (that is, of the ornaments and sword), because two things are sometimes mentioned where only one is intended, and this supposition is here adopted from the probability of it. If, however, the parties separate without a mutual seisin, the sale is null with respect to the silver ornaments because of its being in that degree a Sirf sale, to the validity of which mutual seisin is essential:—or, if the sword be so framed as not to admit a separation of the ornaments without sustaining detriment, the sale of it is in this case also null, because so situated the separate sale of it is not permitted, in the same manner as it is not permitted to sell the beam of a roof.—If, on the other hand, the sword admit of a separation of the ornaments, without detriment, the sale, in the manner above mentioned, is valid with respect to the sword; but with respect to the ornament it is null.—It is to be observed that the sale of a sword with silver ornaments in exchange for dirms is lawful only where the silver of the dirms exceeds that of the ornaments; and that, if the silver of the dirms be either barely equal to, or less than, that of the ornaments,—or, if it be not known whether it be more or less, the sale is invalid. The reason of the invalidity in case of its not being known whether it be more or less, is that the probability is in favour of its being invalid; since there are two causes of invalidity, namely, equality and inferiority; whereas there is only one cause of validity, viz., superiority.

In the purchase of plate, if the parties separate before payment of the full price, the sale is valid only in the proportion paid.

—If a person, having sold to another a silver vessel, should receive payment in part, and both parties then separate, in that case the sale is null with respect to the amount remaining to be paid, but valid in the amount taken possession of; and the parties have each a share in the property of the vessel;—because this sale is Sirf, or pure, with regard to the whole of the subject, and consequently country* do not pass decrees agreeably to this doctrine; for as base money is there much in use, it follows that if the sale of it at an unequal proportion were permitted, the door of usury would thereby be opened.

With respect to money in which the base metal predominates, it is to be remarked that, if it pass current by weight, purchase, sale, and loans are transacted in it by weight. If, on the other hand, it pass current by tale, all matters are transacted in it by tale.—If, however, both modes prevail, it is in that case permitted to follow either; for custom is decisive with respect to matters of this kind, provided they be not otherwise determined by the ordinances of the law.—It is also to be observed, that money of this kind, whilst it continues in use, is a representative of price, and is therefore incapable of being rendered determinate: but if it should not be in use, it is considered as other wares or articles of merchandize, and is therefore capable of being rendered determinate.

If dirms be adulterated to such a degree as to pass current with some, but not with others, they are equivalent to Zeyf or base dirms. Hence, if a person enter into a contract for something in exchange for a hundred specific dirms of this description, the contract does not relate to those specific dirms in particular, but to a similar amount of base dirms, provided the seller were aware of the circumstance;—but if otherwise, it relates to a similar number of pure dirms;—because in the first case the assent of the seller to receive the base species is established by his knowledge of the baseness,—whereas in the second case his assent is unestablished because of his ignorance of the baseness.

A sale for base dirms is null, if they lose their currency before the period of payment.

—If a person purchase wares in exchange for base dirms, and, previous to the payment of them, they should fall into general disuse, in that case the sale, according to Haneefa, is null. Aboo Yoosaf maintains that it is incumbent on the purchaser to pay the value which these dirms bore on the day of sale. Mohammed, on the other hand, alleges that it is incumbent on him to pay the value which they bore on the last day of their currency. The arguments of the two disciples are that the contract in itself is valid; but the delivery of the dirms becomes impracticable from the disuse of them; a circumstance, however, which does not induce invalidity;—any more than where a person purchases an article for fresh dates, and the season for those passes away;—in which case the sale is not invalid; and so also in the case in question.—As, therefore, the contract is not invalid, but still endures, it follows that, according to Aboo Yoosaf, the value the dirms bore at the time of the sale is due, because from that period responsibility for them takes place; in the same manner as in a case of usurpation;—and that, according to Mohammed (on the other hand) the value they bore on the last day of their currency is due, since at that period the right of the seller shifted from them to their value.—The argument of Haneefa is, that the price is destroyed by the disuse; for money is the representative of price solely from custom, and hence this property is annulled from disuse. The sale, therefore, remains without any price being involved in it, and is consequently null; and as the sale is null, it is of course incumbent on the purchaser to restore the goods to the seller, provided they be extant; or, if otherwise, the value which they bore on the day he obtained possession of them; in the same manner as in an invalid sale.

Rules with respect to copper coinage.—A SALE in exchange for Faloos is valid, because they are considered as durable property. If, therefore, the Faloos pass in currency, the sale is lawful, although they may not have been specified,—because Faloos are, from custom, representatives of price, and consequently stand not in need of specification. If, however, they should not pass in currency, it is in that case requisite that they be particularly specified, in the same manner as other articles of merchandize.

If a person purchase wares for Faloos, which at that time passed in currency, but which previous to the payment of them fall into disuse, the sale is in that case null, according to Haneefa: contrary, however, to the opinion of the two disciples.—The difference of opinion upon this point is analogous to what has been already mentioned in treating of dirms in which the alloy is predominant.

If a person borrow Faloos, and their currency should afterwards cease, then, according to Haneefa, the borrower must make repayment in similars; * because Karz [a loan of money] is equivalent to Areet [a loan of substance], and therefore requires the restoration of the actual article with respect to its nature, that is, its value.—The property of representing price, moreover, is merely an adventitious property, in copper coin, to which no regard is had in the borrowing of them; on the contrary, they are borrowed on the principle of their being similars; and this quality they retain after the disuse of them as money, whence it is that a loan in them is valid after they have lost their currency.—According to the two disciples, on the contrary, the borrower must in this case pay to the lender the value of the Faloos; for their quality of representation of price being annulled by the disuse,

* By similars is always understood any articles compensable by an equal number of the same description, such as eggs for eggs, Faloos for Faloos, &c. It is treated of at large in various other parts of the work.

it is therefore impracticable for the borrower to restore them with the qualities they possessed when he received them; and hence, as the payment of similars would be an injury, it is required that he pay the value: in the same manner as holds where a person borrows any articles of which the unities are similar, and the whole genus of which afterward becomes extinct. According to Aboo Yoosaf, their value must be fixed from the day of seisin; and according to Mohammed, from the last day of their currency, in conformity with what has been already explained. This difference of opinion originates in a difference of doctrine respecting a case where a person usurps an article of the class of similars, and of which the similars afterwards become extinct,* when, according to Aboo Yoosaf, the usurper is responsible for the value the article bore on the day of usurpation; and, according to Mohammed, for the value it bore on the last day of its existence. It is to be observed, that the opinion of Mohammed is founded upon tenderness to mankind, and that of Aboo Yoosaf on convenience.

It is lawful for a person to purchase any thing in exchange for a half dirm of Faloos;† and in this case he is required to pay the number of Faloos adequate to the price of half a dirm. In the same manner, it is lawful to purchase any thing for the Faloos of a danik ‡ of silver, or a Kerat § of silver. In all these cases, Ziffer is of opinion that the bargain is unlawful, because Faloos being an article of tale, estimated by number and not by their relation to dirms or daniks, a specification of the number ought therefore to have been made. The reasoning of our doctors is, that the exact number of Faloos adequate to the price of a half dirm, or a danik, is known (for the case in question proceeds on the supposition of such a knowledge), and that a specification of the number is therefore unnecessary. If the purchaser were to say, "I have bought this thing for the Faloos of one dirm, or two dirms," the bargain in that case also is valid, according to Aboo Yoosaf; for this expression means the number of Faloos to which the price of one or two dirms is adequate, and not the weight. It is related as an opinion of Mohammed, that a sale for the Faloos of one dirm is not lawful; but that a sale for the Faloos of any thing under a dirm is lawful, as it is customary to purchase things for Faloos, where the value is not adequate to a dirm, but not otherwise. Lawyers have observed, that the opinion of Aboo Yoosaf is the most approved, especially in countries where the practice of selling and purchasing for Faloos is common, and where, of course, the rate they bear, with respect to dirms, is known and ascertained.

If a person, having delivered a dirm to a Sirraf, or money changer, should say to him, "Give me Faloos in exchange for one half of this, and a half dirm wanting one grain of silver in exchange for the other half," in this case the sale, according to the two disciples, is valid with respect to the one half in exchange for Faloos, and invalid with respect to the other; because the sale of a half dirm in exchange for Faloos is lawful (as has been already explained); but the exchange of a half dirm in exchange for a half dirm wanting one grain of silver, is usurious, and, consequently, unlawful. Agreeably to the tenets of Haneefa, the sale is in this case completely null, because the whole is comprehended under one contract, and the invalidity being strong, with respect to a part, does therefore communicate itself to the whole. If, however, the word "Give" be repeated, by the person saying, "Give me Faloos in exchange for one half, and give me a half dirm wanting one grain in exchange for the other half," the opinion of Haneefa, in such case, accords with that of the two disciples, because here exist two separate sales, one valid, and the other invalid. If the purchaser, without opposing the halves of the dirm, were to say, "Give me, in exchange for this dirm, the Faloos of half a dirm, and a half dirm wanting one grain;" the sale is valid in full, because, in this case, it is construed to be an opposition, on the one hand, of one half dirm wanting a grain in exchange for one half dirm wanting a grain; and on the other, of a half dirm with the super-addition of a grain for the Faloos of a half dirm; and this is lawful.

OF KAFALIT, OR BAIL.

Definition of the terms used in bail.—KAFALIT, literally, means junction. In the language of the LAW it signifies the junction of one person to another in relation to a claim (some have said, in relation to a debt only; but the first is the most approved definition).—The person who renders obligatory on himself the claim of another, whether it relate to person or property, is termed the Kafeel, or surety:—the claim itself, in favour of which bail is given, whether it relate to the person or property, is termed Makfool-be-hee:—the claimant is termed Makfool-le-hoo; and the principal, or person who gives bail, is termed Makfool-an-hoo.—In cases of bail for the person, however, the terms Makfool-be-hee and Makfool-an-hoo relate to the same thing.

Chap. I.—Introductory.

Chap. III.—Of Bail by Freemen in behalf of Slaves, and by Slaves in behalf of Freemen.

CHAPTER I.

Distinctions.—BAIL is of two descriptions. I. Bail for the person, which is termed Hazir-Zaminee. II. Bail for property, which is termed Mal-Zaminee.

Bail for the person.—BAIL for the person is valid; and in virtue of it the surety is bound to produce the principal, or person whom he has bailed.—Shafei is of opinion that bail for the person is not valid, because the surety undertakes and renders obligatory on himself a delivery which he is not capable of performing, inasmuch as he possesses no power or authority over the person of the principal: contrary to bail for property, as in that case the surety possesses power and authority over his own property is thereby enabled to discharge the obligation he has contracted.—The arguments of our doctors upon this point are twofold. FIRST, the prophet has said, "The surety is responsible," which is a proof that both modes of bail are lawful. SECONDLY, the surety is in a degree capable of delivering the person for whom he is bail, as he may inform the claimant of his place of abode, and thus remove the bar between them, since, after obtaining such knowledge, the claimant may demand the aid of the officers of the Kazee, by whose means he may secure his presence. There is, moreover, a necessity amongst mankind for this kind of bail; and the characteristic of bail, namely, a junction of one person to another in relation to a claim, is observed in it.

Under what forms contracted.—BAIL for the person is contracted, where any one says: "I have become bail for the person of a particular man," or, "for his neck," or, "for his soul," or, "for his body," or, "for his head," or "for his face;" because some of these words really mean, in their common acceptation, the whole of the person, and others bear that sense metaphorically, as has been already explained under the head of divorce.—The effect is also the same when a person says, "I have become bail for the half of a certain person," or "for a third of him," or "for a part of him;" because the person, in the case of bail, being incapable of division or dismemberment, the mention of a part indefinitely is therefore equivalent to the mention of the whole. It is otherwise where a person says, "I have become bail for the hand" (or "the foot"), because neither of these parts are ever used to denote the whole of the person, and the bail so given is therefore invalid.

If a person say, "I am responsible [Zamin]" for such a person," it is a valid bail; because this is an express declaration of the intention of bail. It is also a valid bail, if a person say, "This is upon me," or, "This is towards me," because both these expressions indicate an obligatory engagement. In the same manner, also, bail is contracted by the words Zeyim and Kabeel, for both of these signify bail, and hence it is that bail-bonds and other instruments of obligation are termed Kabala. If, on the contrary, a person say, "I am responsible for the notoriety of a certain person," bail is not contracted, since the responsibility, in such case, relates merely to the notoriety and not to the claim. Hence, if a person should say, in the Persian language, "His acquaintance is upon me," he does not thereby become bail.—If, however, he should say, "He is my acquaintance," lawyers are of opinion that he becomes bail because of ancient custom.

The surety must deliver up the person for whom he is bail at the stipulated period; and in failure of this, is liable to imprisonment.—If, in a contract of bail, it be stipulated that "the surety shall, at a fixed period, deliver over the principal or person bailed to the claimant," it is in that case necessary that he be delivered to the claimant, if it be required, either at the fixed period, or at any time afterwards, in order that the surety may acquit himself of the engagement into which he has entered. If, therefore, he deliver the person bailed on the demand of the claimant, he then becomes released from his engagement; but if he refuse to deliver him, the magistrate must in that case imprison him for failure in the performance of his engagement. He is not, however, to be imprisoned on the first summons, as he may not then know for what reason the Kazee summoned him.

If the principal disappear, the surety must be indulged with time to search for him; and the contract is fulfilled by delivering up the principal at any place which admits of litigation.—If, in a case of bail for the person, the principal should disappear, it is in that case incumbent on the Kazee to afford the surety a sufficient period to go and come in search of him; and afterwards to imprison him, in case of his not producing the principal, because he is then proved to have failed in his engagement.—If, however, he produce the principal, and deliver him to the claimant, in such a place as may enable him to litigate his suit with him, the surety is then released from his engagement of bail, because of his performance of the obligation he had contracted; and the end of the contract is likewise answered, as it only requires that he deliver him once. If he should have agreed to deliver him "in the assembly of the Kazee," and afterwards deliver him in the market-place, still he is released from his engagement, because the object of the bail is answered. (Many have observed that in the present age the surety would not in such case be released from his obligation; because, as the probability in this age is that the people would aid the defendant in preventing his appearance in the assembly of the Kazee, and that they would not assist the claimant in enforcing it, such a clause is therefore beneficial.)—If, however, the surety deliver over the principal in a desert, he is not released from his engagement, because the claimant could not in such place litigate his suit with him, and the object of bail remains therefore unaccomplished. In the same manner, he is not released from his obligation in case he deliver him up in a village where there is no Kazee; because, where there is no Kazee, the claimant can obtain no decree. If he should deliver him up in another city than that in which he had entered into the contract of bail, he is then (according to Haneefa) exempted from any further obligation.—The two disciples are of a different opinion, because it may often happen that the witnesses are in the city in which the contract was formed.—If, moreover, he deliver over the principal in the prison, where he has been previously confined by another for a different cause, he is not released from his engagement, because the claimant has no power, in such situation, to litigate his suit with him.

The death of the principal releases the surety.—If, in a case of bail for the person, the principal should die, the surety is then released from his engagement; first, because of the impracticability of producing the person; and, secondly, because, in the same manner as the appearance of the principal is by such event defeated, so also is the enforcement of it on the part of the surety.

And the death of the surety annuls the contract.—THE same rule also holds in case of the death of the surety; because it then becomes impracticable for him to deliver up his principal; and, also, because his property is not of an analogous nature, so as to admit a discharge of the obligation by means of it. It is otherwise in the case of bail for property, for if the surety for property die, the obligation of bail does not then cease, since it is necessary to discharge it by means of his property, to whatever amount he may have rendered himself liable.

If the claimant die, the heirs or executors may demand the fulfilment.—If the claimant should die, his executor (if there be any), or otherwise his heirs, are entitled to claim the fulfilment from the surety; because heirs and executors represent the dead.

The surety is released by delivering up his suretee.—If, in a case of bail for the person, the surety should not stipulate his release from the bail on the delivery of the person, he is nevertheless released on such delivery, because this being the intention of the contract, it is consequently established independent of an express declaration. It is to be observed, likewise, that the surety becomes exempt from his obligation on the delivery of the person, without the acceptance of the claimant being required as a condition, in the same manner as in the payment of a debt.

Or, by delivering himself up.—THE effect is also the same, in case the principal should of himself present his person, as if he should say, "I have presented myself on account of the bail of a particular person who has become surety for me." This is approved, because the surety being entitled to contend with him, in order that he may deliver himself up, it is therefore permitted to him to deliver himself up voluntarily to prevent contention.

Or, by his being delivered up by a messenger.—It is also lawful for the agent or messenger of the surety to deliver the person, as these are the representatives of the surety himself.

The payment of the claim may be suspended upon the non-production of the principal.

—If a person become bail for the appearance of another, on this condition, that, if he do not deliver him within a particular period, he shall then be responsible for the claim upon him (a thousand dirms, for instance), and he afterwards fail of producing him within the fixed period, he is then bound to make good the claim upon the suretee; because, in this case a bail for property is suspended on the condition, namely, the failure in producing the person within a fixed period; and such suspension is valid, because of the custom of mankind.

But still the bail for the person remains in force.—HENCE, when the condition is not fulfilled, the surety becomes responsible for the claim; and he is not, nevertheless, released from the bail for the person; because bail for the person and bail for the property are not incompatible.—Shafei maintains that the bail in this instance is not valid; because bail for property induces a responsibility for property in the same manner as sale; and hence it is unlawful to suspend it on a matter of doubt and uncertainty; in the same manner as in the case of sale.—The reasoning of our doctors is that bail for property is ultimately like sale, inasmuch as it entitles the surety to repayment from the principal of what he advanced to the claimant on his account,—and that in the beginning it resembles a gift, being an acquiescence in responsibility without any exchange.—In due observance, therefore, of both these circumstances, it is declared that the suspension of it, on an uncertain condition (such as the blowing of the wind, the falling of the rain, and the like), is invalid; but that it is valid if suspended on a certain condition, such as in the case in question.

If the time be fixed, and the suretee die in with relation to himself; for he has power over his own person.

Bail may be contracted with or without the consent of the principal.—It is lawful to become bail either with or without the desire of the principal; because the tradition with respect to it is absolute, and does not restrict it to the desire of the principal. Bail, moreover, being an obligatory engagement, is a deed relative to the surety himself, in which there is an advantage to the claimant and no detriment to the principal: for if he should have become bail without the desire of the principal, then he has no right to apply to him for what he may pay on his account; or if, on the other hand, the bail was contracted by his desire, then the principal has expressed his acquiescence in his claim of repayment from him, to which he is entitled because of his having made the payment in virtue of authority from him,—whereas he has no right to repayment in case of having become bail without the desire of the principal, as the payment so made was a gratuitous deed.

Circumstances under which a surety has or has not a right to demand compensation from his principal.—It is to be observed that the surety has a right to a repayment, from the principal, of the sum which he may have advanced on his account in virtue of the responsibility he contracted by his desire.—As for instance, if the debt be one thousand good dirms, and he pay the claimant one thousand good dirms, he is then entitled to the repayment of one thousand good dirms.—But if he should make a payment of a nature different from his engagement,—as if, having become bail for one thousand good dirms, he should pay the claimant one thousand bad, or vice versa,—he is in that case entitled to receive from the principal the full amount for which, by his desire, he had become responsible; because the surety, from the payment of the debt, becomes proprietor of it, and stands therefore in the place of the creditor;—in the same manner as if he had become proprietor of it by virtue of a gift, or of inheritance (that is, as if the claimant had bestowed on him a gift of the debt due to him by the principal, and permitted him to take possession of it,—or, as if the surety had succeeded to the debt in right of heritage;—or, in the same manner as where the person to whom a debt has been transferred acquires a property in the debt by either of these modes).—It is otherwise in the case of a person instructed to pay a debt; for if a person be desired by another to pay a debt on his account, and pay it accordingly, he is in that case entitled to receive from the other the exact sum he has paid on his account, although the debt relate to bad dirms, and he pay it in good; because a person so instructed, having incurred no responsibility, has therefore no right to become proprietor of the debt in virtue of his having paid it.—It is otherwise, also, if a person, having become bail for a debt of one thousand dirms, should compound with the claimant for the payment of five hundred dirms;—for in this case he is entitled to receive only five hundred dirms from the debtor, because composition is similar to annulment of part of the debt, and the case is therefore the same as if the claimant had remitted part of the debt to the surety; and as in case of remission of the debt by the claimant, the surety has no right to receive anything from the debtor,—it follows that, in the case of composition also, he has no right to receive more than he has actually paid.

He cannot claim reimbursement until he has actually discharged the claim upon the principal.—A SURETY has no right to advance any claim on the principal until he make payment on his account, because he does not become proprietor of the debt until he pays it. It is otherwise with respect to an agent for purchase; as he is entitled to receive from his constituent the price of the merchandise previous to the payment of it on his part. The reason of this is that there virtually subsists a contract of exchange between the constituent and his agent; because the right of property is first established in the agent, and afterwards shifts to the constituent;—and hence they stand to each other in the relation of buyer and seller;—whence it is permitted to the agent to detain the merchandise from his constituent until he receive the price from him.

But he may proceed as the claimant proceeds.—If the claimant importune the surety in pursuit of his claim, then the surety may in the same manner importune the principal or suretee. If, also, the surety be imprisoned by the claimant, he is in the same manner entitled to imprison the principal.

He is released by a discharge to the principal; but the principal is not released by an exemption to him.—If the claimant remit the debt to the suretee, or receive payment of it from him, the surety is in that case released from his engagement, because the debt, in reality, is due by the suretee;—but if he exempt the surety, the suretee (or principal) does not thereby become exempted from his debt; because the surety is merely a dependant; and, also, because he is liable only to a claim, whereas the debt exists in the principal independent of such claim.

And the same of a suspension of the claim.—If the claimant allow the principal a respite from his claim, or suspend his claim upon him to a more distant period, such respite or suspension of claim operates also in favour of the surety;—but if he grant a respite of his claim to the surety, it does not operate in favour of the principal;—because respite or suspension, as being a temporary remission, is therefore analogous to an absolute remission.—It is otherwise where the debt, being immediately due, the creditor accepts bail for the payment at the period of a month afterwards; for this suspension of his claim for a month operates also in favour of the principal, because here the period of suspension agreed upon is a circumstance annexed to the debt, which, at the time of contracting the bail, was immediately due.

A surety, compounding the debt of the principal with the claimant, discharges both from any further demands.—If a surety, in a debt of one thousand dirms, compound with the creditor for a payment of five hundred dirms, in that case both the principal and the surety become exempted from their respective obligations for the remaining five hundred dirms;—because the surety having referred the composition to the thousand dirms due by the principal, the principal becomes thereby released from his obligation by the payment of five hundred dirms; for composition is a cancelling of part of the debt;—and the release of the debtor from his obligation occasions the release of the surety.

And has a claim upon the surety for what he pays in composition.—He is also in this case entitled to five hundred dirms from the surety, provided he entered into the bail with his consent.—It were otherwise if the surety should compound the debt for some thing of a different species (as if, instead of the dirms, he should agree to pay a particular number of denars, or any article of merchandise); for in such case he is entitled to a full payment of the debt, since such composition is in the nature of a contract of exchange, and the surety becomes proprietor of the debt in virtue of his having given a consideration for it.

A surety compounding for an exemption on his own behalf does not discharge the principal.—If the surety compound with the creditor for an exemption from the obligation contracted by him in virtue of the bail, the principal is not thereby exempted, because the said composition is merely an exemption granted to the surety from a claim upon him.—Thus, for instance, if the surety for one thousand dirms compound with the creditor for one hundred dirms,—in other words, if the creditor agree that, on condition of his paying one hundred dirms, he will exempt him from the rest of his obligation,—in that case he becomes exempted from responsibility; and, provided he had become bail by desire of the principal, he is entitled to receive one hundred dirms from him, whilst the creditor retains his claim on the principal for the remaining nine hundred dirms.

Cases in which the surety's right against the principal depends upon the terms of his exemption or discharge.—If a claimant say to the surety, who had become bail by desire of the principal, “You are enlarged from the claim towards me,” in that case the surety is entitled to receive the amount in question from the principal; because, according to the rules of grammar, this sentence, in which the preposition from with respect to the object, and that of towards with respect to the claimant of such object, are used, means that the claim has been discharged.—Hence the claimant, in this case, is held to have made an acknowledgment of the discharge of the claim; and for this reason the surety is entitled to receive the principal.—But if he should merely say, “I have enlarged you,” the surety is not entitled to anything from the principal; because his enlargement, being here expressed without any mention made of its operation towards another, is considered as an annulment, and not as a declaration of discharge.—If he should only say, “you are enlarged,” without adding, “towards me,” in that case there is a disagreement amongst our doctors.—Mohammed alleges that it is similar to the second instance—“I have enlarged you.” Aboo Yoosaf, on the other hand, is of opinion that it is similar to the first instance,—“You are enlarged from the claim towards me.” Some, again, have said that, in all these cases, if the claimant be present, it is requisite to demand an explanation from him, since he has used a dubious expression.

An enlargement from bail cannot be suspended upon a condition.—The suspension of enlargement from bail on a condition is not lawful; because an enlargement of this kind, as well as that of other descriptions, involves an endowment with right of property, and the suspension of an endowment with right of property is not lawful.—There is a tradition that such suspension is lawful; because, in fact, a surety is responsible for a claim, and not for a debt,—whence such enlargement is, like divorce, a mere annulment,† and therefore cannot be undone by the rejection of the surety:‡—and the enlargement

*An endowment with a right of property (such as a gift, for instance) must operate immediately, otherwise it is not valid.

† This doctrine is founded on the metaphysical distinction which the Mussulmans draw betwixt a debt and a claim. Thus where a person remits to another a debt contracted by borrowing, purchase, or the like, he, as it were, conveys or makes over so much property to that other:—but where he remits an obligatory claim upon another to answer the debt of a third person, he then merely annuls a right of his own; for as that other had not in reality received any property from him, he cannot by such remission be said to have made over so much property to him.

‡ A gift, or any deed vesting property in another, cannot operate without the consent of that other. On this principle a gift is not held to take place until the seisin of the donee, as, until then, it is in his power to render it void by a rejection. But it is not in the power of the surety to prevent the operation of the exemption in his favour by the rejection of it, as it is held to be an annulment of a right on the part of the claimant, and not a deed conveying property to him.

from bail being a mere annulment, it follows that the suspension of it upon a condition is lawful, in the same manner as the suspension of divorce or emancipation: in opposition to the enlargement of the principal; as that is an endowment with right of property, and may therefore be rejected by him.

Bail, in cases of punishment or retaliation, is valid only for the person.—BAIL is not valid with respect to any right of which the fulfilment is impracticable by means of bail, as in cases of punishment or retaliation,—because proxies are not admitted in case of corporal punishment. But bail for the persons of criminals under the sentence of such punishments is lawful.

Bail may be given for the price, but not for the goods, in a sale.—A PERSON may lawfully become bail, on the part of a purchaser, on the payment of the price, because price is a debt: but it is not lawful to become bail, on the part of the seller, for the merchandise; for that is substance, of which the compensation, in case of destruction, is insured, by means of something of a different kind, namely, the price; and although bail for insured substance be lawful in the opinion of all our doctors, still it is required that the substance be insured for a similar in kind, such as the subject of an invalid sale, an article seized in virtue of an intention to purchase, or an article usurped; but not for any substance which is insured for something of a different kind, such as the subject of a valid sale, or a pawn; nor for any substance held in the nature of trust, such as a deposit, a subject of rent, a loan, Mozaribat stock, or partnership stock.—If, after the purchaser, in a case of sale, had paid the price, a person become bail for the delivery of the goods to him,—or if, in a case of pawnage, a person become bail for the pawnee's restitution of the pledge,—or, in a case of hire, for the renter's restoring the article hired,—in all these cases the bail is valid, because of the surety having engaged for the performance of what was due and incumbent.

Bail for the performance of work by a specific animal is not valid.—If a person hire a quadruped for the carriage of a burthen, and another be bail for the animal carrying the said burthen, it is not valid, because of the animal being the property of another.—This, however, proceeds on a supposition of the hire having related to a specific animal; for, if the animal be not specific, the bail is valid, as in that case it is in the power of the surety to supply an animal of his own for the carriage of the burthen. In the same manner, in case of a person hiring a slave for service, bail given for his performance of the service is invalid, as the slave is not the property of the surety, and he has consequently no power of enforcing what he has undertaken.

A contract of bail must be formed with the consent of the claimant.—A CONTRACT of bail is not valid unless it be formed with the consent of the claimant.—This is according to Haneefa and Mohammed.—Abou Yoosaf alleges that a contract of bail is valid, if, having been formed without the knowledge of the claimant, it receive his assent on its being notified to him: and (according to several copies of the Mabsoot) his assent is not a condition.—This disagreement relates equally to bail for the person, and bail for property.—The reasoning of Abou Yoosaf, in support of his opinion, is, that as bail signifies an obligatory engagement, it is therefore binding on the person who undertakes it; and hence it would appear that it does not depend on the assent of the claimant: but the reason for suspending it upon his concurrence is the same as occurs under the head of marriage, treating of Fazoolee marriages; “The declaration of the surety that he has become bail for a particular thing, on the part of a particular person, renders the contract complete; but as it is a deed affecting the claimant (inasmuch as it invests him with a right to a claim), it is therefore suspended upon his assent.”—The reasoning of the other two doctors is that bail creates a right; in other words, the surety constitutes the claimant proprietor of a claim upon him, which he accordingly demands from him after the completion of the contract.—Hence it follows that two points are necessary to the completion of the contract, namely, the speech of the surety (which is equivalent to a declaration with respect to the claimant), and the speech of the claimant (which is equivalent to acceptance).—Now in the case in question there exists only one of these two requisites: the contract, therefore, is not suspended beyond the meeting; and consequently a contract of bail is not valid but through the consent of the claimant at the meeting.

Except where the debtor is dying.—EXCEPTING only in one instance,—namely, where a sick* person says to his heir, “be you bail for whatever debts I may owe,” and the heir becomes bail accordingly in the absence of the creditors; for in this case the bail is effectual, notwithstanding the absence of the creditors, upon a favourable construction,—for two reasons: FIRST, the bail so contracted is, in effect, a will, and is therefore valid without the intervention of the claimant (and hence lawyers have remarked that this species of bail is not lawful unless when the sick person is in possession of property; because a will would not otherwise be lawful); SECONDLY, the sick person is the representative of his creditors, because he stands in need of being so, in order that he may divest himself of his obligations; and also, because this is attended with an advantage to the creditors.—The case is therefore the same as if creditors had themselves been present.

OBJECTION.—If the sick person represent his creditors, it follows that his acquiescence is a necessary condition, in the same manner as that of the creditors, had they been present; and that the expression of "Be you bail on my part for whatever I owe," is not conclusive of the contract; whereas this renders it conclusive.

* Arab. Mareez.—Always meaning a person sick of a mortal illness.

REPLY.—The bail founded on this speech of the sick person is valid, and his acquiescence is not required as a condition; because the meaning to be deduced from the speech is, evidently, a desire on the part of the sick man that the bail be concluded, and not merely a consultation respecting it; and his speech therefore resembles an order for the conclusion of a marriage, as already explained under the head of marriage.—(It is to be observed that if the speech of the sick person be addressed to a stranger, there is in that case a disagreement with respect to the validity of the bail.)

Case of bail gratuitously entered into on behalf of an insolvent defunct.—If a debtor die without leaving any property, and another become bail to his creditors, such bail is not valid, according to Haneefa.—The two disciples allege that it is valid; because it is undertaken on account of a debt, established as the right of the creditors, and which is still extant, since no person has discharged it, whence it still exists, so far as relates to the laws of futurity; that is to say, the debtor, if it be not discharged, becomes a criminal before God Almighty.—As, also, if the surety were actually to discharge the debt, such discharge would be valid, being a gratuitous act of justice, in the same manner bail for it is consequently valid.—The argument of Haneefa in support of his opinion is, that the bail is in this case given for a debt which is annulled with relation to the laws of this world; and the validity of bail being founded on the laws of this world, it cannot be legally given for what no longer legally exists.

A debtor paying his surety the sum for which bail has been given, before the surety has satisfied the creditor, cannot reclaim it.—If a person, by desire of another, should become his bail for one thousand dirms which he owes, and the debtor give the surety one thousand dirms by way of payment, prior to his [the surety's] having paid the creditor, he [the debtor] is not in that case permitted to take from the surety the money he has advanced to him, for two reasons. FIRST, the right of the possessor (namely, the surety) is connected with the one thousand dirms on the probability of his having occasion to pay them to the creditor, and therefore whilst such probability exists the principal surety has no right to take them from him; similar to a case where a person hastily (that is, before the stated time) pays Zakat to the collector, in which case he would not be entitled to take it back from him. SECONDLY, the surety becomes proprietor of the said sum in virtue of the seisin, on a principle which shall be presently explained.—It is otherwise where the debtor gives the sum to the surety by way of commission (as if he were to say to him, "Take this sum and deliver it to the debtor"); because the surety does not become proprietor in virtue of such a seisin: on the contrary, he is in such case merely a trustee.—It is to be observed that where the surety thus receives the thousand dirms, and becomes proprietor in virtue of such receipt, he is not required to devote in charity whatever profit he may acquire from it; * because in this instance the property vests in him immediately on the receipt. Where he receives it after having himself paid the debt, the reason of the property then vesting in him is evident; and where he receives it before he has paid the debt, he becomes proprietor immediately on the receipt.—The reason of this is, that the surety has a claim on the debtor for an article similar to that for which the creditor has a claim upon him: but the claim of the surety upon the debtor is suspended until he pay the debt to the creditor.—The claim of the surety, therefore, is in the nature of a debt to become due hereafter (whence it is that if the surety should, previous to his having discharged the debt to the creditor, exempt the debtor from the claim he had upon him, such exemption would be valid).—Now as an article similar to that for which the surety is responsible to the creditor is due to him by the debtor, it follows that on his receiving payment from the debtor he becomes proprietor in virtue of such receipt.—The degree of baseness, moreover, which obtains in such a transaction (as shall be hereafter set forth), does not take effect, where a right of property exists, with respect to indefinite things; as has been already explained in treating of invalid sales.

Case of a delivery of substance by the principal, to guard his surety against loss.—If bail be given for a Koor of wheat, and the principal deliver a Koor of wheat to the surety, and he sell and acquire profit by the same, in that case the profit so acquired is, in the eye of the LAW, the right of the surety, on the principle already explained, of the property having vested in him in virtue of the receipt.—The author of this work observes, that in his opinion it is most laudable that the surety give the said profit to the debtor, although, in the eye of the law, this be not incumbent upon him: and such (according to one passage in the Jama Sagheer) is the opinion of Haneefa upon this point.—The two disciples maintain that as such profit is the right of the surety, he ought not therefore to give it to the debtor:—and this also is related as an opinion of Haneefa, as well as another, namely, that the surety ought to bestow it in charity.—The argument of the two disciples is that the profit, as having resulted from the property of the surety, becomes of consequence his right.—Haneefa, on the other hand, argues that, notwithstanding the existence of the property, there is still a degree of baseness in it, because it was in the power of the debtor to retake the Koor of wheat from the surety, and deliver it himself to the creditor; or, because, in delivering it to the surety, it is probable that he did it with a view that he should deliver it to the creditor.—Now the baseness here operates in consequence of the thing to which it relates being definite; and the mode of purging such baseness is (according to one tradition) by devoting the profit in charity, or (according to another) by giving it to the debtor, as the baseness is occasioned by his right, and not by the right of the LAW.—This latter is the most authentic doctrine; but it prescribes only a laudable, and not an incumbent duty; for the right of the surety is clear.

Case of bail discharged by an aynit sale.—If a person become bail, by desire of the principal, for a debt of one thousand dirms, and the principal afterwards desire him first to purchase on his account silks to the value of one thousand five hundred dirms, in the manner of an aynit, and then to resell the same, and discharge the debt by means of the price, and the surety act accordingly, the purchase so made is considered as on his own account, not on account of the principal, and he must, of consequence, sustain the loss arising from the aynit sale.—An aynit sale is where a merchant, for instance, having been solicited by a person for a loan of money, refuses the same, but offers to sell goods to the other on credit at an advanced price; as if he should charge fifteen dirms for what is worth only ten, and the other person agree to the same. This is termed an aynit or substantial sale, because it is a recession from a loan to a specific substance (in other words, the merchant declines granting the loan required of him by the borrower, but agrees, in lieu thereof, to sell him the cloth, which is a specific substance);—and it is abominable, as being a recession from a loan of money, which is a laudable action, on a principle of avarice, which is a sordid quality.—With respect to the nature of the case in question, our doctors have disagreed.—Some have asserted, that the direction given by the principal to the surety infers his [the principal's] being responsible for any loss that may be sustained by the purchaser in consequence of the aynit sale; and that his direction in this particular is not a commission of agency; for this reason, that the order of the principal ("purchase silks on my account") implies this assumption of responsibility:—but a responsibility of this nature is invalid, since responsibility cannot hold except in an article in which the person who is responsible has some interest; and no person has any interest in the loss on the present occasion. Others again say, that the direction in question amounts to a commission of agency: but that it is an invalid commission, as the silks to which it relates are not definite, neither is the price of them definite from an ignorance of how much it may exceed the amount of the debt.—The purchase of the silks is, in fact, considered as having been made on account of the surety, and the loss resulting from it falls entirely upon him (not upon the principal), since it was contracted by him.

Evidence cannot be heard in support of any claim against a surety which does not come within the description in the contract of bail.—If a person become bail on the part of another, for whatever may be proved to be due by him, or for whatever the Kazee may decree against him, and the debtor afterwards disappear, and a claimant offer to prove, by evidence, that the sum due to him is one thousand dirms, such evidence is not to be admitted; because here the bail is limited to whatever the Kazee may decree, as it is evident from the expression "Whatever the Kazee may decree," and likewise from that of "Whatever may be proved to be due by him," since nothing can be proved but by the decree of the Kazee, and the claim in question has not this limitation:—it is therefore invalid, and accordingly the evidence in support of it cannot be heard.

A decree passed against a surety in the absence of the principal cannot affect the latter unless the bail were entered into by his desire.

—If a person prefer a claim before the Kazee to this effect, "That an absentee owes him a thousand dirms, and that a particular person present is, by desire of the debtor, bail for the same," and establish his assertion by testimony, in that case the Kazee must pass a decree against both the debtor and the surety.—If, however, the bail have been given without the desire of the debtor, the Kazee must in that case decree the debt solely against the surety; and in this instance the evidence adduced by the claimant is admitted as sufficient, because the bail is absolute, and not qualified, as in the preceding case.—It is to be observed that the different decrees which the Kazee gives in the case of bail with, and without, the desire of the debtor (that is, the decree against both, in the one case, and against the surety only in the other), is founded on the difference which obtains in the nature of these two modes of bail;—for bail by desire of the debtor is a gratuitous deed in the origin, and a contract of exchange in the end; but bail without the desire of the debtor is a gratuitous deed both in its origin and its consequences.—Now where the claim relates to one only, the decree cannot be extended to the other. But if a decree should be passed relative to a surety by desire, it must necessarily include the principal, since the desire he expressed is a virtual acknowledgment of the existence of the debt.—It is otherwise with respect to a voluntary surety; for as the existence of the debt in that case is proved by his belief of it, in having undertaken the bail with regard to it, and not by any virtual acknowledgment of the debtor, the decree is therefore solely referred to him.—In the former case (namely, that of bail by desire), the surety is authorized to receive from the seller what he may have been obliged to pay on his account.—Ziffer maintains that he is not entitled to such compensation; because, having himself refused to pay, and having been compelled to it, he is of consequence in his own opinion oppressed; and it is not permitted to such as are oppressed to oppress others.—Our doctors, on the other hand, argue that whenever a refusal is undone by law, the opinion founded upon it becomes of consequence null.

Case of Kafel-be'l-dirk.—If a person sell a house, and another become Kafel-be'l-dirk, or security against accident,* on his behalf, the security so given is a direct declaration of the house being the property of the seller.—If, therefore, the surety should afterwards prefer a claim of right to the house, such claim is inadmissible.—The reason of this is, that if the security be a condition of the sale (as if the purchaser should have said, "I will buy the said house, provided a particular person will be security against any future claim to it"), in that case the completion of the sale rests upon the agreement of the surety; and afterwards, when he prefers a claim of right to the house, he endeavours to destroy that which he had himself rendered complete.—If, on the other hand, the security should not be a condition of the sale, the surety, in that case, by agreeing to the bail, did, as it were, incite the buyer to the bargain (since his desire of purchase was founded on the procurement of bail).—The bail so given, therefore, is equivalent to a declaration of the right of property of the seller.

An attestation to a contract of sale is not equivalent to Kafel-be'l-dirk.—If, in the sale of a house, a person should attest the bill of sale, and put his seal to it, without giving any security, such testimony and affixture of seal is not an acknowledgment of the seller's right of property, and hence the witness may, if he please, afterwards claim the house, because attestation is neither a condition of sale, nor a declaration of the property of the seller, as it sometimes happens that men sell their own property, and sometimes that of others.—Besides, the witness may have made this attestation merely as a memorandum of the transaction; a supposition which the case of bail could not admit of.—Lawyers have remarked that if it be expressed, in the bill of sale, that "a certain person had sold such a house, which is his property, by a complete and valid sale," and the person attest the writing to this effect, "Witness thereto," this is an acknowledgment and declaration of the seller's right of property.—If, on the other hand, he attest it thus, "Witness to the agreement of the buyer and seller," this is not a declaration of the seller's right of property.

Section.

Of Zamins, or Guarantees.

The guarantee of agents to their employers is null.—If an agent sell the cloths of his constituent, and hold himself responsible for the payment of the price to his constituent,—or, if a Mozarib sell the goods of his employer and hold himself responsible for the payment of the price,—the responsibility in either case is null: FIRST, because surety or bail is an engagement compelling the undertaker to answer a claim; and as, in these cases, the agent and Mozarib are themselves the claimants for the price of the goods, it follows that if they were responsible for the same, they would be security on their own behalf, which is absurd;—and, SECONDLY, because the goods remain in their hands in the nature of a trust; and trustees are not held by the LAW to be liable to responsibility.—If, therefore, they were held responsible, it would be contrary to the precepts of the LAW.—Hence the taking of security from them is null, in the same manner as a condition of responsibility is null with respect to a trustee or a borrower.

The guarantee of partners, in a purchase and sale to each other, is null.—If two sharers in a slave sell him by one contract, and each of them be security to the other, on behalf of the buyer, for his payment of the proportion of the price due to that other, such security is null; because if the security were valid under a general copartnership in the price, it necessarily follows that each is in part security on behalf of himself, since every member of the slave is indefinitely shared between them;—or if, on the other hand, the security of each were valid with respect to the other's share in particular, this induces a division of a debt before the receipt of it, which is unlawful.—It is otherwise where two partners in a slave sell their shares by different contracts; as their security to each other, for the prices respectively due, is valid, since there is no partnership in this instance, because whatever is owing to each, respectively, in virtue of his particular contract, appertains solely to him, without any participation of the other;—whence it is that the purchaser is at liberty to accept the share of one of them only and to take possession of it, after the payment of the price; and also that he may take possession of the share of one of them only after paying to him his proportion, notwithstanding he may have purchased both shares.

* Dirk signifies, properly, any possible contingency. Kafel-be'l-dirk, therefore, means bail for what may happen.—In the present instance it alludes to the possibility of a claim being afterwards set up to the house by some other person, which, if substantiated, would annul the sale.

Guarantee for land-tax, and all other regular or justifiable imposts, is valid.—If a person become security in behalf of another for tribute due by him, or for a nawayeeb* levied upon him, or for his kissmat, all such securities are valid.—Security for tribute is valid, because tribute is in the nature of a debt, and may be a lawful subject of claim, as has been already explained (in opposition to Zakat, as that is a matter solely affecting him who pays it, in the manner of a gift, and of which his property alone can be the subject; whence, after his death, it cannot be discharged out of his effects, unless prescribed in his will):—and with respect to nawayeeb, if it extend only to what is just (such as exactions for digging a canal, for the wages of safe guards, for the equipment of an army to fight against the Infidels, for the release of Mussulman captives, or for the digging of a ditch, the mending of a fort, or the construction of a bridge), the security is lawful in the opinion of the whole of our doctors.—But if nawayeeb extend to exactions wrongfully imposed, that is, to such as tyrants extort from their subjects (as in the present age), in that case, concerning the validity of security for it, there is a difference of opinion amongst our modern doctors.

—Sheikh Imam Alee is of the number of those who hold the security in this instance to be valid.—With respect to kissmat, there is a difference of opinion concerning the meaning of the word.—Some allege that it signifies the same with nawayeeb; whilst others define it to be same with Mowzifa Ratiba, that is, fixed imposts which are exacted at stated periods, such as once in the month, or once in every two or three months.—Now nawayeeb means the casual exactions made by the sovereign, which have no fixed or stated period. The law, however, is as above explained, with respect to both. If, therefore, the exaction be right, then the security for it is lawful, according to all our doctors; or if wrong, there is a disagreement with respect to the validity of the security.

Difference between a suspended debt and suspended bail.—If a person say to another, "I owe you a debt of one hundred dirms, payable a month hence," and the other assert that the debt is immediately due, his assertion, as claimant, is to be credited.—But if a person should declare to another, "I am security to you, in behalf of another, for a debt of one hundred dirms, payable a month hence," and the other assert that the debt is due immediately, the declaration of the surety is to be credited.—The difference between these two cases is, that in the former case the debtor makes an acknowledgment of the debt, and then claims his right to a suspension of payment for one month; whereas in the latter case the surety makes no acknowledgment of the debt, inasmuch as the obligation of the debt does not rest upon the bail or surety, as has been often before explained.—In fact, he has simply acknowledged a claim, to which he is responsible after the lapse of a month, which the claimant denies, asserting that he is answerable for such claim immediately;—and regard is paid, in Law, to the affirmation of the defendant.—A clause of suspension, moreover, is merely an accidental property of a debt, and not an essential, whence it is that it cannot be proved unless it have been expressly stipulated.—The affirmation, therefore, of the person who denies the stipulation of such condition is creditable,—in the same manner as in the case of a condition of option, in sale.—Bail under a suspension, on the contrary, is one species of bail, in which the being suspended in its operation is an inherent quality, and not an accident; whence this species of suspension may be proved without having been stipulated; as where, for instance, the debt due by the principal is a suspended debt. According to Shafee, the affirmation of the claimant is to be credited in either case; and the same is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf.

Bail against accident, in the sale of a slave.—If a person purchase a female slave, and another warrant her to be the property of the seller,* and she afterwards prove to be the property of some other person, the purchaser is not entitled to exact the price from the surety, until the Kazee shall have first passed a decree against the seller for the restitution of the price;—because, according to the Zahir Rawayet, the sale does not become null immediately on the proof of the subject of it being the property of another, but endures until the Kazee pass a decree in favour of the purchaser, directing the seller to return the price. Since, therefore, previous to the issuing the said decree, it is not incumbent on the principal (that is, the seller) to make restitution of the purchase-money, so neither is it incumbent on the surety. It would be otherwise if the slave were proved to be free, and the Kazee pass a decree to that effect, for in such case the sale becomes null immediately on the issuing of such decree, since freedom is incapable of being the subject of sale, and the buyer would, therefore, be entitled to exact the purchase-money either from the surety or from the seller, without waiting for a decree of restitution from the Kazee.—It is related as an opinion of Aboo Yoosaf, that sale becomes null immediately on the proof of the subject of it being the property of another; and that, consequently, the buyer has in such case a right to exact the price either from the surety or the seller, without waiting for the decree of the Kazee to that effect.

Security for fulfilment is null.—If a person purchase a slave, and another be security for the fulfilment of the bargain,† such security is null; because the word Ohda [fulfilment] is of a comprehensive nature, as having a variety of meanings. I. It relates to the former bill of sale, which the seller received from the person who sold the slave to him; and this being the property of the seller, any security with respect to it is invalid. II. It relates to the contract and its rights. III. It relates to a warrant or security against accidents. And, IV. To option.—As, therefore, the term comprises so many things, the particular application of it is dubious; and hence practice cannot take place upon it.—It is different with respect to the term dirk, for although that signify whatever may happen, yet the custom of mankind has restrained the application of it to one particular sense, namely, a security against any future claim; and Ziman-bel-dirk, or security against accident, is therefore valid.

* Nawayeeb are all extraordinary aids beyond the established contributions, levied at the discretion of government to answer any particular emergency of the state.

* Literally, "and another be bail against accident."

Security for a surrender of the article to the purchaser is invalid.—If a person sell an article, and another be security to the purchaser for the release * of that article, such security is invalid, according to Haneefa, as the intention of it is the release of the article, and the delivery of it to the purchaser, which the security is not competent to perform.—The two disciples hold this to be valid, as in their opinion it is equivalent to a security against accident;—in other words, it imports an obligation to deliver to the purchaser either the article sold, the value, or the price;—and such being the case, it is valid of course.

CHAPTER II.

OF BAIL IN WHICH TWO ARE CONCERNED.

Case of two persons who are joint principals in a debt, and bail for each other.—If two men owe a debt in an equal degree, and each be security on behalf of the other,—as where, for instance, two persons purchase a slave, jointly, and each is security on behalf of the other,—in this case, if either of them pay off a part, he has no right to make any claim on the other:—unless, however, the payment so made exceed a half of the whole debt, in which case he has a right to exact such excess from the other.—The reason of this is, that each of them is a principal with respect to one half of the debt, and a security with respect to the other half;—for what each owes in virtue of his being a principal is no bar to the obligation upon him as a security, the one being founded on debt, and the other on a claim, which is subordinate thereto.—Whatever payments, therefore, either of them may make are held to be in virtue of the former, namely, the debt, as far as that extends; and any excess is referred to the latter, namely, the security.

Case of two persons who are bail for a third, to the amount of the whole claim, and also, reciprocally, bail for each other's security.—If two persons be bail for property in behalf of another,—in this way, that each surety, respectively, holds himself responsible for the other surety,—in this case, whatever either surety may pay [in virtue of the bail], whether the sum be great or small, he is entitled to exact the half of it from the other surety.—This proceeds upon a supposition that each of these two sureties, respectively, is bail for the whole property on the part of the principal, and likewise for the whole obligation on the part of his co-surety. Hence in each of the two sureties two bails are united; one on behalf of the principal, and one on behalf of the co-surety; and bail on behalf of a surety is lawful, in the same manner as on behalf of a principal, or as a transfer on behalf of a transferee; because the intention of a contract of bail is undertaking the obligation of a CLAIM; and this end is answered by bail on behalf of a surety.—As, therefore, two bails are in this case united in each of the sureties, it follows that whatever payments are made by either of them are made, in an indefinite manner, on account of both; for the payment so made was purely in virtue of the bail; and each, with respect to the bail, stands in the same predicament; that is to say, neither has a superiority over the other.—(It is otherwise where each surety is a principal with respect to part of the debt, as in the first example; for in this case neither has a right to exact anything from the other on account of the payments he may make, unless such payments exceed the sum for which he is a principal, because the principal has a superiority.)—Now since, in the case in question, whatever payments either of the two may make are made indefinitely, on account of both, it follows that the person making such payments is entitled to exact the half of them from the other. And this induces no unnecessary revolution, because the intention of the contract, in the present instance, is that the parties be on a footing of perfect equality with respect to the bail, which can only be answered by the one party taking from the other the half of what he may have paid. The other, therefore, is not entitled to retake it again from the person who has first paid, because this, if permitted, would destroy the equality already established.—(It is otherwise in the preceding case, for there each of the parties is a principal with respect to a portion of the debt, and consequently they are not on a footing of perfect equality with respect to the bail.)—When, however, one of the parties shall have taken the half from the other, then they are jointly entitled to exact the whole of what has been paid from the principal; since they paid the same on his behalf; the one making the payment immediately from himself, and the other doing it, as it were, by his substitute :—or the surety who paid is at liberty, if he please, to exact the whole of what he paid from the principal, because he was bail for the whole of the property by his desire.—If, in this instance, the creditor exempt one of the two sureties, he has a right to claim the whole from the other, because the exemption of a surety does not operate as an exemption in favour of the principal, and therefore the whole of the debt remains due by the latter ; and the remaining surety being still bail for the whole of the property, it is consequently lawful to claim the whole from him.

In the dissolution of a reciprocity partnership, each partner is responsible for any debts contracted under their partnership.—If two partners by reciprocity dissolve their copartnership, and separate, whilst some of their debts still remain due, the creditors have in that case a right to claim the whole from whichever of them they please ; because each of these partners is surety for the other, as has been already explained in treating of partnership.—Neither of the partners, moreover, has a right to make any claim upon the other for whatever payment he may have made to the creditors, unless such payment exceed the half of the debt, in which case he has a right to exact from him the payment of such excess, for the reason already explained, in discussing the case of reciprocal bail by two.

Case of two Mokatibs, bail on each other's behalf, for their ransom.—If a master constitute two of his slaves Mokatibs, by one contract, for a thousand dirms (for instance), and each of them become bail for the other, in that case, whatever sum, from the whole amount covenanted to be paid by the master, is discharged by either, the half of that sum may be exacted from the other.—Analogy would suggest that the bail, in this instance, is not valid ; because bail is valid only when opposed to a valid debt : and the consideration of Kitabat, or the degree of freedom bestowed upon a Mokatib, is not a valid debt, as has been already explained.—It is lawful, however, upon a favourable construction, by considering each of the slaves as a principal with respect to the obligation of the whole consideration of Kitabat, namely, a thousand dirms ;—in other words, by considering each of them, respectively, as being responsible to the master for the payment of the whole ; and, consequently, that upon his making payment of the whole, the other obtains his freedom as a dependant,—in this way, that the freedom, of both is suspended on their payment of one thousand dirms, and the master is at liberty to claim the said thousand from each of them respectively, as a principal, not as a surety. Each, however, is considered as surety on behalf of the other, with respect to exacting a moiety of what he pays on account of the consideration of Kitabat (a particular explanation of this will hereafter be given in treating of Mokatibs).—From the explanation of the law in this case it appears that both slaves are equal with respect to the payment of the thousand dirms, which is the consideration of their Kitabat ; and hence each is respectively entitled to take from the other a moiety of whatever part of the said thousand dirms he may pay.—If the master, in this case, should emancipate one of the slaves prior to his having made any payment on account of his Kitabat, in that case he becomes free ; because his master, whose property he then was, chose to emancipate him.—He becomes likewise exempted from any obligation to pay his half of the consideration of Kitabat, because he acquiesced in that obligation merely as a means to obtain his freedom ; but upon his becoming free in consequence of the emancipation of his master it exists no longer as a mean, and therefore ceases altogether.—The obligation, however, for the payment of an half still continues incumbent upon the other, who remains a slave ; because the whole amount of the consideration was opposed to the bondage of both ; and the whole was considered as due from each, respectively, merely as a device, in order to render the bail of each in behalf of the other valid, and thereby to enable each to take from the other a moiety of what he pays.—But when the master emancipates one of them, there exists no further necessity for this device ; whence the debt is then considered as opposed to them both, jointly (not, in toto, to each respectively), and is accordingly divided into two separate parts, of which one still continues due from him who remains a slave.—In taking this portion, the master is at liberty either to exact it from the freedman, in virtue of his being security, or from the slave, because of his being the principal.—If he take it from the freedman, the freedman is then entitled to retake it from the slave, because of his having paid it by his desire : but if he take it from the slave, he [the slave] is not entitled to take anything from the freedman, because he merely pays a debt which he justly owes.

CHAPTER III.

OF BAIL BY FREEMEN IN BEHALF OF SLAVES, AND BY SLAVES IN BEHALF OF FREEMEN.

A person becoming surety on behalf of a slave for a claim, to which the slave is not liable until after emancipation, must discharge it immediately.—If a person be surety in behalf of a slave, for some thing not claimable from the slave until after he recover his freedom, without specifying whether the thing in question is claimable immediately, or hereafter, in that case it is to be considered as immediately due ;—that is to say, it is claimable immediately from the surety.—For instance, if an inhibited slave acknowledge his destruction of the property of any person,—or that he owes a debt which his master disavows,—or if, having married without the consent of his master, he should have had carnal connexion with the woman on the supposition of such marriage being valid (in all which cases nothing could be exacted from the slave immediately, nor until he become free), and a person be a surety for the compensation eventually claimable from the slave, he is liable to an immediate claim for it. The reason of this is, that the slave ought immediately to discharge the compensation, because there exists an evident cause of its obligation upon him, and a slave, in virtue of his being a MAN, is capable of being subject to obligation. He is, however, exempted from an immediate claim for the compensation, because of his poverty, since everything he possesses is the property of his master, and his master is not assenting to the obligation. The surety, on the contrary, is not poor, and is therefore liable to the claim immediately, in the same manner as a person who becomes surety for an absentee or a pauper.—It is otherwise where a person becomes bail for a debt not immediately due, for there the surety also is not liable to an immediate claim, any more than the debtor, since the debt is suspended in its obligation to a future period by the consent of the creditor.—It is, however, to be observed, that in the case in question, the surety, on discharging the claim upon the slave, is not entitled to demand it from the slave until he shall have obtained his freedom; because the creditor had no right to demand it until that event; and the surety stands in the place of the creditor.

Bail for the person of a slave is cancelled by his death.—If a person advance a claim on an unprivileged slave, and another become surety for his person, and the slave afterwards die, the surety is in that case released from his engagement, because of the principal being released.—(The law is the same where the slave, in whose behalf bail for the person is given, is emancipated.)

Bail to a claim of right in a slave subjects the surety to responsibility in the event of the slave's decease.—If a person claim the right of property in a slave, and another become surety in behalf of the possessor of him, and the slave then die, and the claimant establish his right by witnesses, the surety is in that case responsible for the price;—because it was incumbent on the possessor to repel the claim, or, if he failed in so doing, to give the value for which the surety became answerable; and as the obligation, after the slave's death, rests upon the principal, so also it now rests upon the surety.—It is otherwise in the preceding case; for there the obligation was merely to produce the person of the slave, which is cancelled by his death.

Bail by a slave in behalf of his master, or by a master in behalf of his slave, does not afford any ground of claim by the surety upon the principal.—If a slave, who is not in debt, be surety for property in behalf of his master, or any other man, and be afterwards made free, and then pay the amount for which he was surety,—or, if a master become surety for property in behalf of his slave, whether he be indebted or not, and after emancipating him, pay the amount for which he stood security, in neither of these cases is either of the parties entitled to take any thing from the other.—Ziffer maintains that in both these cases the parties have a right to recur to each other; that is, each is entitled to take from the other what he may have paid.—(It is here proper to remark, that the reason for restricting the slave, in the first case, to one that is free from debt is, that if he were otherwise, he could not be surety for property in behalf of his master, since this would affect the right of his creditors.—The argument of Ziffer is that a ground of claim (namely, bail by desire of the principal) exists in both cases; and the bar to its operation (namely, slavery) is removed and done away.—The argument of our doctors is that the bail in these cases is not in the beginning a ground of claim, since neither can the master have a debt due to him by his slave, nor can the slave have a claim of debt upon his master.—Hence as no ground of claim existed in the beginning, it does not afterwards take place, in consequence of the removal of the bar to it (namely, slavery); for the law here is the same as where a person becomes surety for another without his desire, in which case the subsequent assent of the surety is of no effect.
